Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Chris Smith and Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody.

Whereupon Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER declared that the Question was not decided in the affirmative, because it was not supported by the majority prescribed by Standing Order No. 32 (Majority for Closure).

It being after half-past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Friday next.

Private Members' Bills

DOG FIGHTING (PENALTIES) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Second Reading what day? No day named.

PENSIONERS' RIGHT TO HEAT, LIGHT AND COMMUNICATIONS BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 13 June.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speker. You may know which hon. Member makes an objection and from whom you accepted the objection in this matter but others do not. This is of great importance. The Bill affects millions of people in Britain and they have a right to know for what reason the Bill has been opposed yet again in the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman will know that that matter has been raised many times before. The procedure is that, if I hear an objection, I take that objection. It does not matter from what source it comes. It is the hearing of the objection which matters. That is the procedure.

Mr. Corbyn: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I understand and accept what you say, but the problem is that hon. Members are not aware who made the objection in this case. It is a matter of public record that an objection has been received. All other entries in Hansard are ascribed to an hon. Member and are so recorded. Why is it different in this case?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. It is my job to carry out the rules of the House as they exist. If he wishes to have them changed, the correct procedure is for him to suggest that the Select Committee on Procedure should look at this point.

Mr. Norman Hogg (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not the case that "Erskine May" lays down that the hon. Member who objects to a Bill is required to rise in his or her place when making an objection?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: No, that is not the position. As long as the objection is clearly made, the Chair is obliged to take it.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I should like your guidance on how that ruling has come about. As you rightly said, it has been raised before. Indeed, I have raised it myself in relation to a private Member's Bill to which I put my name some years ago. Since, for many people in Britian, there is no greater obscenity than that old people should go without fuel and light, which it is the object of this Bill to eradicate, we need an answer to the question whether people have a right to object or whether it is only by convention——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. He has raised it before when I have been in the Chair. As I have said to the House, this is a well-established procedure and it is the job of the chair to carry out the procedures of the House. If hon. Members want to have those procedures changed, there is a course open to them. But it would be wholly wrong for me to, as it were, do a private enterprise operation and alter the procedures of the House. I must abide by the procedures which have been laid down by the House and that is exactly what I am doing.

Mr. Corbyn: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. Member for Newham, North-West making a different point of order? I have dealt fully with that point of order.

Mr. Banks: Yes, Sir. That ——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Does the hon. Gentleman have a different point of order? If he does not, I am not prepared to rule a third time.

Mr. Banks: It is related, Sir, but it is different. The point that was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr.Corbyn) was that hon. Members are entitled, for their own information, to know who has raised an objection. That is the point.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have already dealt with that. If hon. Members do not like the existing procedures, I have explained the correct course which is open for them to follow.

Mr. Corbyn: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not seek to challenge your ruling, but I wonder if any Conservative Members ought to catch your eye to identify themselves as being opposed to this progressive Bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We are on the same point. I have given my ruling and there is nothing further I can add. I do understand the points which hon. Members are making and I have given a clear outline of the way in which they can proceed.

IMMIGRATION ACT 1971 (AMENDMENT) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 13 June.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Notwithstanding your earlier rulings, which I fully understand and appreciate, may I ask for your guidance in circumstances where a Bill is not opposed when leave was sought to introduce it? That was the case with this Bill of mine, which seeks to give a right of appeal to visitors who are refused entry to this country. When there was no opposition to a Bill when it was introduced, do you believe that the ruling that you have given should still apply? Surely, if there was opposition to the Bill it should have been demonstrated by the person who has today objected to it, so that the arguments of that person could have been deployed and the House could have been given the opportunity of voting on this important measure.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to disappoint the hon. Gentleman, but the rule still applies.

INDECENT DISPLAYS (NEWSPAPERS) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Second Reading what day? No day named.

TOBACCO PRODUCTS (SPORTS SPONSORSHIP) BILL

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Second Reading [21 February].

Hon. Members: Object.

Ms. Clare Short: On a point of order——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We must complete proceedings on this Bill first.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 2 May.

Ms. Clare Short: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is relevant to the points of order raised before. Obviously, any of us who have gone to the trouble to introduce a Bill are interested in who objects to it from the Conservative Benches. You moved so fast that, as I simply moved around to try to see who objected, you had moved on and not allowed me to name a day. The day I wanted to give was 13 June and I am grateful to you for accepting it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I accept the hon. Lady's date of 13 June.

Mr. Corbyn: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Am I right in thinking that the hon. Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight) was the one who opposed that Bill?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is not in order for hon. Members to try to have a debate on this. I have told hon. Members the procedures which we follow and I have given a clear indication of the course of action that is open to them if they object to the procedures.

REDUNDANT CHURCHES AND OTHER RELIGIOUS BUILDINGS (AMENDMENT) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Not moved.

POLICE COMPLAINTS PROCEDURE (AMENDMENT) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Second Reading what day? No day named.

Mr. Norman Hogg: I am trying to make that very point, Sir. With the leave of the hon. Member in charge of the Bill, Friday 9 May.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I beg the hon. Member's pardon.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 9 May.

MARRIAGE (PROHIBITED DEGREES OF RELATIONSHIP) BILL [LORDS]

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 16 May.

COMPANY POLITICAL DONATIONS (GOVERNMENT CONTRACTORS) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Not moved.

Prosecution Policy

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Neubert.]

2.48 pm

Mr. Graham Bright (Luton, South): I am grateful for this opportunity to bring to the attention of the House the tragic death of my constituent, Mr. John Williams. He was one of the many young men and women whose lives and careers have been cut short by the criminals who exploit the spread of drugs in Britain. It is impossible to measure the harm that has been caused to the families of such victims. Their suffering, which I know is understood throughout the House, makes deterrent action by the police, the prosecuting authorities and the courts essential.

Had it not been for the remarkable courage of John Williams's family and, in particular, of his mother, in bringing a private prosecution for manslaughter, the criminal justice system would have failed completely. The role of the Director of Public Prosecutions in these events has to be clearly justified and explained.

The circumstances of John Williams's death were particularly distressing. During a visit with friends to a flat in Dumfries court, Luton on the evening of 2 September, 1982, he was persuaded by the occupant, Gary Austin, to try an injection of a drug called Palfium, which is usually given in tablet form to relieve the pain of cancer sufferers. Austin gave him this injection at about 7 pm, John Williams collapsed almost at once and, according to the medical evidence, died shortly thereafter.

For the rest of that evening, Austin prevented any expert help being sought by those present in the flat. Some of them even went out to local bars and an off-licence. It was not until 11 pm, that Austin decided to have the body removed. It was left in the street outside propped against a wall, where it was found at about 11.15 pm by the ambulancemen Austin had summoned under a fals. name.

On arrival at the Luton and Dunstable Hospital, John Williams was found to be dead.

The subsequent police inquiries revealed that the drugs given to him had been stolen from a chemist's shop in Crewe by a man called Peter Panko. Both Panko and Austin were arrested and charged. The post-mortem conducted by Dr. Tan, the pathologist, revealed the presence of Palfium in John Williams's blood, admittedly at a relatively low level compared to that of patients taking the drug therapeutically.

This evidence, it is worth stating, was sufficiently convincing for the jury at the inquest held in June 1983 to bring in a unanimous verdict of unlawful killing. But although Panko was convicted of theft and of supplying the drugs at Bedford Crown court in March 1983, Austin was charged only with possessing dangerous drugs and with theft. The two men were sentenced to terms of five and three years' imprisonment, respectively. To the surprise of the Bedfordshire police and to the amazement of Mr. and Mrs. Williams, the Director of Public Prosecutions decided that no other charge could be brought. It was a decision to which he was to adhere throughout until he was forced to change his mind.

I have set out the facts as clearly and as objectively as I can. Of course, I accept that criminal prosecution can take place only when there is sufficient evidence to make conviction likely. No one's interests are served by poorly mounted prosecutions resulting in inevitable acquittals.

The disquieting feature of this case is that no public action was taken until new evidence had been privately assembled and leave obtained from the magistrates' court to bring a rare private prosecution for manslaughter. There are, therefore, some extremely serious questions about the conduct of this case which have to be answered if public concern is to be satisfied.

First, there is the issue of the evidence from the post-mortem conducted by Dr. Tan. Presumably, what he told the inquest jury—that John Williams's death was due to heart failure and that this did not occur spontaneously in a healthy person — was also told to the police. Logically, to use his own words, there had to have been an unnatural cause of death. He was perfectly clear about the presence of Palfium in John Williams's blood. No other possible cause of death was mentioned.

Mr. Peter Corderoy, the senior scientific officer from the Home Office laboratory at Aldermaston, testified that deaths had been recorded from the injection of relatively small amounts of the drug. There was some published evidence already available from the work of Dr. Patrick Toseland, the specialist at Guy's hospital, to show that deaths had occurred with levels of Palfium in the blood even lower than that recorded in John Williams's case.

I am bound to ask my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General to explain what happened when the DPP and his officials first looked at the medical evidence. Which experts, apart from Dr. Tan and Dr. Toseland, were consulted and what was their view of the reason for the death? Was it ever suggested to or by them that John Williams had taken Palfium on the morning of his death? If such a suggestion was made, who put it forward? The police's inquiries and the evidence at the inquest, so far as I am aware, revealed nothing of the sort. Were they aware of the distinction between the oral method of administering the drug which, due to its slower passage into the blood stream, permits higher levels to be tolerated and the more dramatic effects of injecting it?

There is a further point that I must raise here. In a letter to me on the 12 December 1984, my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General, explained that the DPP reached his decision not to prosecute Gary Austin in 1982. The police officers dealing with the case at Luton did not learn of this until 11 March, 1983. Austin had been remanded in custody since his arrest because it was thought more serious charges might be preferred. This delay in informing the police has to be explained.

I have been equally concerned to learn that Austin was informed by the DPP then — and again in September 1983 — that no prosecution for manslaughter would occur. The failure, moreover, of the DPP to offer any rationale for his decision to John Williams's parents at that time was quite mystifying. It left them without hope of justice. Their anguish and distress was inevitably increased by the inquest proceedings in June, 1983. The verdict of "unlawful killing" returned by the jury convinced them that criminal proceedings against Austin were possible.

I know that the DPP looked at the case again, that he took further advice from counsel and that he adhered to his original view, that, without better scientific evidence, no prosecution could succeed. But simply informing Mr. and Mrs. Williams and their solicitor that his unexplained decision stood was hardly satisfactory. No explanation of the need for a more specific link betwen the injection of the drug and John Williams's death was offered until December, 1983, six months after the inquest and at least a year after the DPP's original decision. Once again, I find that delay exceptionally difficult to understand.

Every parent will know why Mrs. Williams refused to accept the DPP's decision. In fact, she was prepared to go out and pay for the necessary inquiries to be conducted by medical researchers. One expert had already informed her that he was convinced that Palfium had killed her son and that Austin should have been charged. By July, 1984, more specific evidence was available. Dr. Toseland had been able to analyse how the injection of the drug paralysed the brain centres controlling the heart very shortly after it entered the bloodstream. Taken in tablet form, it opperated much more slowly and much higher levels could be tolerated. That was the key piece of work which ultimately unlocked the case.

Naturally, that analysis and the supporting views of Professor Spector, the head of the department of pharmacology at Guy's hospital, were forwarded to the DPP. Both men were prepared to state their views in public. I know that the Luton police and the DPP's representatives heard the new evidence directly from Dr. Toseland at a conference in the town on 2 Ooctober, 1984. What is more, Dr. Tan, the pathologist who had conducted the post-mortem, had been contacted by Dr. Toseland and was prepared to state that, in the light of his research, there could have been no other cause of death than the injection of Palfium. Professor Spector himself expressed the identical view in a further conference at Guy's hospital on 22 October 1984. Both Dr. Toseland and Professor Spector were sure that the possibility of John Williams having taken Palfium on the morning of his death was irrelevant.

The DPP's subsequent observations that no proceedings could be brought against Austin because the new evidence was not good enough to link the injection of the drug to the victim's death make remarkable reading. What or who was his authority for this view? Even when Dr. Tan's letter to the Luton coroner in April 1985 with its explicit statement that it was now his oponion that came into the DPP's hands, nothing was done. If his opinion was sound enough for the DPP to rely on in not bringing a prosecution in late 1982 or early 1983, why was his revised view not valid enough to start one in 1985? I cannot accept that an undertaking given on the basis of medical knowledge in 1983 not to prosecute was still binding when new medical evidence was available.

It is extremely difficult, if not impossible, to understand why the professional judgments of the pathologist who conducted the post-mortem and of two of the country's leading experts in this field of medicine were rejected by the DPP and his colleagues. I have no doubt that they were afraid that a prosecution would fail. Why this was their view has to be explained.

There is equally no doubt that they were wrong. It is greatly to the credit of Mrs. Pauline Williams that she has the courage, after all the setbacks that she had suffered in her struggle for justice, to bring her private prosecution against Gary Austin. The Magistrates before whom she made her application were convinced that there was a case to answer. It was her largely unaided efforts and the testimony of her expert witnesses that resulted in the case going to trail at the Crown court. The jury there brought in a unanimous verdict of guilt against Austin. I cannot think of a more complete vindication of one person's determination to see justice done, however inadequate the sentence passed.

The struggle that Mr. and Mrs. Williams have endured to ensure that the criminal justice system worked has won them great respect, but they have had to pay a high price for it. They have sacrificed their time and money and a great deal of effort to get it. Mrs. Williams has been attacked and threatened. It is a matter of absolute principle that these costs—for legal representation at the inquest and in the magistrates' court, for the costs of transcripts, photographs, telephone bills and scientific tests, for the cost of letters, envelopes and stationery—should be met from public funds. So, too, should the charges of her solicitor. Is there any possibility of some compensation for Mrs. Williams for the thousands of hours that she has spent in marshalling the evidence. Whatever charges are incurred in altering the terms in which the coroner's inquisition recorded her son's cause of death ought also to be met from public funds. This is a matter on which her judgment was not only better than the DPP's but on which she was proved absolutely right.

Unfortunately, this tragic case has revealed the weaknesses of our system more clearly than its strengths. As long as drugs are available from criminal sources, other families are in danger of suffering similar tragedies. That is why it is so important that those who have the responsibility for initiating prosecutions exercise it correctly. There were grounds enough for questioning whether the right decision was made by the DPP in the autumn of 1982. It is alarming that nothing—not the verdict of the inquest jury, not the new medical evidence supplied by Dr. Toseland and his colleagues, not even the pathologist's explicit change of view, could persuade the DPP to change his mind. The outcome shows that his judgment was mistaken. Had it not been for the existence of the right to bring a criminal prosecution, justice would never have been done to John Williams or his family. The failure of the responsible public authorities to act must be fully explained and justified if our confidence is to be sustained. That is the fundamental issue that the death of John Williams raises.

3.2 pm

The Solicitor-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South (Mr. Bright) on securing this opportunity to raise an important matter in the House. Although my hon. Friend has very properly been concerned with the matter over a long period, in the interest of his constituents, it raises wider considerations. My hon. Friend's presentation of the matter today has again been a model of fairness and care.

I agree strongly with my hon. Friend's opening remarks in which he condemned the evil nature and consequences of the criminal exploitation of drug abuse in this country. The death of his young constituent John Williams in 1982 constituted a tragic addition to the grim toll. Parliament has provided stern penalties for those convicted of offences of such a nature. The strict enforcement of the law by means of prosecution in every proper case is a policy to which the Director of Public Prosecutions rightly attaches the highest importance. That is a policy to which the Director of Public Prosecutions rightly attaches the highest importance. In that approach he has the full concurrence of my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General. The public would rightly expect nothing less. No one need expect a lenient attitude on the part of the DPP. I shall come in a moment to the evidence in this case that was available at material times to the Director to place before a court, including the expert medical evidence bearing on the crucial question of the cause of John Williams's death.

I shall, of course, answer my hon. Friend's question, but, first, I must acknowledge gratefully what my hon. Friend fairly said in an early passage in his speech. He said:

> "Of course, I accept that criminal prosecution can take place only when there is sufficient evidence to make conviction likely."

That is correct, and it forms an important part of the guidelines for prosecutors published by the Attorney-General in February 1982 and deposited in the Library.

Justice must be even handed and it would be a cause for complaint if the formidable prosecuting power of the State were to be exercised against a citizen where, to take a purely hypothetical example, it was thought useful to clear the air by means of a public trial. In all criminal proceedings arising from an unlawful killing, the onus rests on the prosecution to prove guilt. The standard of proof required is that guilt shall be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. Therefore, the prosecutor has initially to assess the likely outcome of a prosecution by reference to this high standard. In the case of John Williams's death, a finding of guilt against Gary Austin demanded that the prosecution should prove beyond reasonable doubt that death was caused by Austin injecting him with Palfium. I have already described this as the crucial factor, and from the outset the prosecutor's difficulties centred here.

My hon. Friend asked when the Director's officials first looked at the medical evidence. The professional officer assigned to the case had three meetings with Dr. Tan, the pathologist who carried out the post-mortem examination, the last of which was also attended by counsel. These meetings took place on 23 November 1982 and on 26 January and 23 February 1983. On each of those occasions Dr. Tan was pressed as to whether he could say that the cause of John Williams's death was the injection with Palfium. He repeatedly replied that he was unable to say what the cause of death was. He could only affirm that the mode of John Williams's death was pulmonary oedema.

The Director consulted a further expert, a question asked by my hon. Friend, additional to Dr. Tan and Dr. Toseland and that was Mr. Neville Dunnett, an expert in toxicology and drugs at Aldermaston. On the basis of the expert evidence available to him at that time, the Director concluded that a prosecution was likely to fail for lack of the necessary proof of causation.

My hon. Friend referred to Mr. Peter Corderoy, the senior scientific officer at Aldermaston. I have seen a transcript of his evidence at the inquest. He said:

> It is impossible to say whether the amount of drug in a 5 or 10 mg tablet if taken by intravenous injection would prove fatal or not. I cannot say that it would or would not prove fatal.".

He did however say, after dealing with the ill-effects to be expected, that a person could acquire a tolerance to Palfium, and that factor too had relevance to the Director's decision. It brings in a further question asked by my honourable friend: was it suggested that John Williams had previously taken Palfium on the day of his death?

Statements had been made to the police by Mark Clews and Anthony Denton providing strong evidence that that indeed had been the case.

The Director concluded, on a review of all the circumstances that a prosecution would be likely to fail and he so informed the police. There was no delay in informing the police of the Director's first decision. There was a final meeting with Dr. Tan, which counsel attended on 23 February 1983, and after that counsel advised. His advice is dated 2 March 1983. The Director then considered the advice, and informed the police of his decision by letter, dated 14 March. I apologise to my hon. Friend that a letter to him from me gave a misleading impression in this respect.

My hon. Friend has asked why Mrs. Williams was not informed of the reason for the Director's decision. The Director, in a letter to the chief constable of Bedfordshire, who had reported the facts of the case to him, gave his reasons for concluding that a prosecution for any offence relating to the death of John Williams would not succeed and advised the chief constable against such proceedings. That letter was not confidential, but it is the Director's policy not to publish reasons for his decisions, especially where he has decided not to prosecute. I think that for reasons of fairness, that policy is correct. I can very well appreciate, however, the feelings experienced by Mrs. Williams and her family, which my hon. Friend has described, and I much regret them.

I can understand only too readily how those feelings would have been exacerbated after the inquest's verdict in July 1983. The coroner's jury was evidently satisfied as to causation. That, however, did not relieve the Director of the responsibility of applying the standard of proof that would be required in a criminal court. The transcript records Dr. Tan as having been asked:

"As far as your post mortem is concerned, is it possible for you to bridge the gap between the administration of an injection and the death as a result of pulmonaryoedema?"

Dr. Tan replied: "It is not possible". The Director's opinion, having further consulted experienced counsel after the inquest's verdict, accordingly remained unchanged.

It was not until 1984 that any significant advance was made—to the knowledge of the Director—in the state of medical knowledge about the actions of Palfium. My hon. Friend has asked whether the Director was aware of any difference between the effects of oral and intravenous administration of that drug. In 1983 no such information was available to him.

It was not until after Dr. Toseland's letter to Mrs. Williams, dated 16 July 1984, reached the DPP in September of that year that he became aware of any difference. Dr. Toseland's views, expressed in that letter, were far from firm conclusions. He said:

"If it can be shown that this was the first time your son had been injected with Palfium then it can be stated he would have no protection from a first administered dose, and that the amount injected is only as important as the speed of the injection."

I have already referred to the evidence in that regard.

Dr. Toseland conferred with a member of the Director's staff on 2 October 1984, but at a conference with Professor Spector on 24 October much stronger views as to causation were put forward. I believe that it is fair to say that from 24 October 1984 onwards —that is, two years after John Williams's death— there was a prima facie case against Austin. Why, then, were proceedings not begun?

I must here refer to another factor that was now faced by the Director. When the decision has been taken not to prosecute a suspect, it is normal for the suspect to be so informed. I believe that to be fair. The Director has taken the view—I believe it to be generally fair—that once a suspect has been so informed, that decision should not remain open for reappraisal and possible reversal, however long a period may elapse. In very rare cases where there is still a practical possibility that further facts sufficient to incriminate the suspect may be uncovered, the decision is expressed to have been taken only on the present state of the evidence. I can tell my hon. Friend that the Director has agreed to revise his practice in this regard. If, on a review of each relevant case, it appears that the public interest would be served by a prosecution in all the circumstances, this policy will be overriden. However, I must emphasise that that action will be taken only in exceptional circumstances and I think that my hon. Friend would understand that.

In the case of Austin, the suspect had twice been informed that he would not be prosecuted—the second time being after the inquest verdict in 1983. The Director considered that his policy as to double jeopardy should be observed in the case of Austin after a careful review of the circumstances.

No one can fail to salute the determination of Mrs. Williams to secure a criminal trial and the courage with which she pursued that aim. Once the magistrates' court had found that there was a case to answer and had committed Austin to trial, the Director stepped in and took over the case. The outcome is well known.

I would now like to consider the question of Mrs. Williams's costs. The matters outlined by my hon. Friend have formed the subject of a claim for costs which was taxed by the clerk at Luton magistrate's court. It is fair to say that Mrs. Williams's costs, as claimed in the magistrates' court; either have been paid in full or will be paid in full. It is also fair to say that I know that there is an outstanding claim for costs in relation to the time which Mrs. Williams has spent on preparing the case. Apparently, some 6,000 hours was spent on that. The courts have ruled that a private prosecutor cannot be reimbursed out of central funds for time spent on the preparation of a case. The Director has no funds for the making of such payments, nor is there any precedent for doing so. I regret that I can accordingly offer no prospect of reimbursement.

However, with regard to the question of the costs of the application to the High Court, in connection with the amendment to the death certificate which Mrs. Williams has also requested, I am able to say that the Attorney-General has agreed to act for Mrs. Williams ex officio and therefore no costs will be incurred by her in respect of that application.

I have referred to the change in the Director of Public Prosecution's future policy. I only wish to add that, as a safeguard, no reversal of a decision not to prosecute will take place without the express authority of the Director or Deputy Director of Public Prosecutions.

In conclusion, these decisions are always exceptionally difficult for the Director and his staff to take. In this case, the decisions were taken after the most careful and conscientious deliberation and they were taken for the reasons that I have given. I am extremely grateful for this opportunity to explain the background to the Director's decisions in this most painful case, which has caused Mrs. Williams and her family such understandable anguish.

Question put and agreed to.

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

WALES

Transport Infrastructure

1. Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales what further proposals he has for improving transport infrastructure in Wales in general and in Clwyd in particular.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Wyn Roberts): My proposals for the motorway and trunk road network in Wales, including Clwyd, are in set out in "Roads in Wales 1985"—a copy of which is in the Library of the House—and I have also published a consultation document "Roads for Wales, the 1990's and beyond". I shall also continue to encourage and assist where appropriate those bodies responsible for the provision of other elements of the transport infrastructure in Wales.

Dr. Marek: Is the Minister aware of my early-day motions on British Rail management, Nos. 2 to 5 inclusive, and Nos. 7 to 16 inclusive, which illustrate merely some of the horrors being perpetrated on the people of Wrexham following the singling of the line between Wrexham and Chester? As the Minister did not take my advice that he should try to stop British Rail from singling the line, now that the evidence of incompetence and dreadful services is before his eyes, will he encourage British Rail to reinstate double track as soon as possible?

Mr. Roberts: I had noticed the early-day motions tabled by the hon. Gentleman, which appear to be rather more regular than the services that they describe. I must emphasise to the hon. Gentleman that the Wrexham-Chester line is an operational matter for British Rail. I understand that British Rail remains firmly of the view that when the singling work is complete this, together with other measures — for example, new signalling at Chester, automatic level crossings and new rolling stock —will greatly improve the services.

Mr. Best: Bearing in mind the tremendous increase in traffic that has been occasioned by the A55, and particularly the traffic going along the A5 on Anglesey, will my hon. Friend look carefully at the possibility of a bypass around Holyhead and instruct a survey to be undertaken? Will he also accelerate the provision of bypasses around the five villages on Anglesey?

Mr. Roberts: I am aware of the pressure that my hon. Friend is bringing on my Department about traffic on Anglesey, and particularly on the A5. We have been studying the situation in various villages on Anglesey and we shall look at the Holyhead position as well.

Mr. Wigley: Will the Minister convey to the Secretary of State our best wishes for a speedy recovery and return to the House? As the Cabinet has been considering grave transport matters, particularly airports, and as no Welsh Office Minister has been in Cabinet, is this a reflection on the Welsh Office, or of the indifference of the Prime Minister towards Wales in general?

Mr. Roberts: I shall gladly convey the hon. Gentleman's good wishes to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, and I am pleased to tell the House that he is making a good recovery. As to Wales's interest in airports, I assure him and the House that the interests of Wales have not been neglected in any way.

Mr. Raffan: During the last Welsh Grand Committee my hon. Friend said that the Mold bypass was scheduled for the latter end of the orginal time band, in other words, no later than December 1988, but my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said that it was planned for the early part of the new band, in other words, soon after January 1988. Will my hon. Friend confirm that the Mold bypass will be started during 1988? Will it be started early or late that year?

Mr. Roberts: The timing of the Mold bypass was discussed in the last Welsh Grand Committee, and I have nothing to add to what I said about it then. I assure my hon. Friend that we shall use our best endeavours to make sure that the bypass is started on time.

Mr. Roy Hughes: May I express my good wishes to the Secretary of State, and express the wish that he will make a speedy recovery? Does the Minister appreciate that, far from improving the transport infrastructure in Wales, British Rail has proposals completely to decimate the rail-freight netword in south Wales. Therefore, will he intercede with British Rail management to prevent that ill-conceived plan coming to fruition?

Mr. Roberts: Although that is a matter for British Rail, I assure the hon. Gentleman that British Rail does not intend to decimate the freight service. Indeed, it is quite the reverse — British Rail wishes to strengthen the service. Although one can be critical of British Rail's activities in Wales, one must not neglect the fact that it is to invest some £55 million in improving Welsh services during the next four years.

Planning Appeals

2. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many planning appeals have been made to his Department during the last year for which figures are available.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Mark Robinson): In 1985 my Department received 912 planning appeals, 239 enforcement appeals and 11 other miscellaneous appeals.

Mr. Wigley: Is the Minister aware of the grave misgivings in many parts of Wales, particularly in Gwynedd, at the way in which the Welsh Office upholds appeals about second homes in sensitive areas? As, in a project for 700 second homes in the village of Morfa

Bychan, which will become a town as large as Porthmadog if the project is implemented, an application going back to 1964 is now in dispute, will he give an assurance that the Welsh Office—in view of its acceptance of the local infrastructure plan and its designation of an SSSI on that exact spot in 1971 — will stand up with the local community against such an outrageous development?

Mr. Robinson: Our view on the general use of occupancy conditions has not changed. As the hon. Gentleman is aware, all planning appeals go to the Secretary of State's inspectors, who take the decision. They have not been given any recent or fresh instructions. It is open to local authorities to purchase homes which they fear may be used for secondary purposes. In that event, they may use their in-year receipts, and it is always open to them to come to the Secretary of State with proposals if their in-year receipts have already been utilised. We have a recent example of a local authority where that has been done. The Morfa Bychan case is a matter for the local planning authority, Dwyfor district council, not for my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: As my right hon. Friend will know, this week his Department is holding a public inquiry into two planning appeals for Tongwynlais in my constituency. What provisions are possible for last minute representations, in view of the present postal strike in Cardiff in south Wales?

Mr. Robinson: Obviously I cannot comment on individual cases. However, if my hon. Friend is aware of people wishing to make such representations, and can get them to send their representations to the Welsh Office, we shall ensure that they are delivered to the inspector. Where planning appeals have not come to the Welsh Office because they have been affected by the postal dispute, we shall make arrangements for them to be taken into account.

Dr. Marek: Is the Minister aware of the ground rules for these appeals, that inspectors, in deciding these appeals, are influenced by his Department, and that there have been many decisions within the Principality which have been resented by the community, including in Wrexham, where appeals have been allowed for supermarkets on completely unsuitable sites and for cramped housing in areas where it should not have been built? Will the Minister see whether he can pay more attention to the expressed wishes of the community in deciding appeals when they come before him?

Mr. Robinson: The Government regard the right of appeal as extremely valuable in the planning process. The inspectors must take into account all material and relevant factors, including the wishes of the local community. The Secretary of State relies on the inspectors' reports.

Opencast Mining

4. Mr. Raffan asked the Secretary of State of Wales when he will next meet the chairman of the National Coal Board to discuss opencast mining in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: No meeting has been arranged at present.

Mr. Raffan: Will my hon. Friend seek a meeting to dissuade the NCB from again applying to start opencast mining at Pont Einion Northop, on high-quality land in an attractive rural area? Will he take the opportunity to remind the chairman of the NCB that the last application was rejected on the gound that need had not been demonstrated? Does my hon. Friend agree that one would be hard put to prove that need now that coal stocks are higher and oil prices have collapsed?

Mr. Roberts: It is for the NCB to decide whether there has been sufficient change in circumstances since the earlier decision on the Pont Einion site to warrant its making a fresh application. I cannot comment on the merits of the case, because the matter may eventually come before my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for decision. The procedure on applications for opencast mining has changed since March 1984. Such applications are now dealt with as part of the normal planning procedures.

Mr. Coleman: Will the hon. Gentleman be careful in handling the applications, especially in view of the sensitivity in many areas of south Wales about opencast mining? Will the hon. Gentleman take care in granting applications by the NCB, in the face of often strong local opposition?

Mr. Roberts: I am well aware of that position. That was part of the purpose of changing the procedure, to which I referred in my previous reply. The Housing and Planning Bill provides for a simplification of the opencast procedures by abolishing the need for ministerial authorisation. Planning permission will still be required. We shall ensure that any proposals that come before us for decision are publicised and that full opportunity is given for representations to be made by interested persons. That is, in any event, our current practice.

Mr. Livsey: Will the hon. Gentleman do all that he can to encourage the NCB to become involved in deep mining, which is labour intensive, instead of opencast mining, which tends to be capital intensive and is highly destructive of the environment and the community in south Wales?

Mr. Roberts: Again I must stress that that is a matter for the NCB. Obviously opencast coal is not only cheaper but has a much lower ash and chlorine content than deep-mined coal, but the health of many deep mines depends on opencast coal for blending to provide an acceptable product for customers. Opencast mining and deep mining are complementary rather than competitive.

Mr. Barry Jones: We look to the Under-Secretary of State to assist the House, especially with the position in Wales as described by hon. Members. Does the hon. Gentleman know that in my constituency, in the Ewloe area, there is widespread condemnation of proposals to undertake opencast mining close to a primary school and housing development? The hon. Gentleman said that deep mining and opencast mining are complementary. Will he therefore tell the chairman of the NCB that, if the Bersham colliery in north-east Wales closes, the economy of north-east Wales will rock on its heels following the Courtaulds closure? Will the hon. Gentleman assure the House that, in spite of the steep drop in oil prices, there will be no new proposals for pit closures throughout the south Wales coalfields? I remind the hon. Gentleman that one in four men in the Welsh valleys is unemployed? That is far too high.

Mr. Roberts: The hon. Gentleman has asked a number of questions. I think I have said sufficient to show that opencast mining is complementary rather than necessarily an alternative. The hon. Gentleman mentioned Bersham colliery. Of course, it is always a matter of great concern when a pit has to be closed. If such an agreement is reached on Bersham, the board is confident that it can offer alternative jobs to those wishing to remain in the industry. There are generous redundancy terms for those who choose to leave. It is too soon to judge the longer-term effect of the current movement in oil prices, but lower oil prices obviously emphasise the need for the NCB to be competitive and make every effort to improve productivity.

Housing Stock

6. Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales what provision he has made in the current financial year for improvement of the housing stock and a reduction in the backlog of renovation grants.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Housing allocations for this year total £141·3 million, which is an increase of almost 30 per cent. over last year. Within this total we have made specially targeted supplements of £53 million for improvement of the housing stock and reduction of the grants backlog.

Mr. Best: Does that welcome and generous announcement not show that the Welsh Office is more than playing its part in providing better housing for Wales and that it is now a matter for the local authorities to complement it?

Mr. Robinson: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. It is now important that local authorities fully spend the allocations which have been made available to them, as it will strengthen their case when we decide resources next year.

Mr. Anderson: Does the Minister agree that it is not only proper to compare this year against last year, but to compare the current allocation with the actual need of our housing stock in the Principality? Given that, is the Minister seriously telling the House that his expert's advice to him is that our housing stock is staying about the same, is it, as people tell us, declining into obsolescence?

Mr. Robinson: We are this year in the process of embarking on the biggest and most extensive house condition survey ever undertaken by the Welsh Office. We shall consider the results of that. I should also point out that the figure of spending of allocations this year compares with the equivalent figure in 1978-79, which was only £51 million at 1986-87 prices. Therefore, I think that it is a favourable improvement.

Sir Raymond Gower: In future consideration of this matter, will my hon. Friend and his right hon. Friend take account of the age of the Welsh housing stock? Does my hon. Friend anticipate a reduction in the great backlog in the various housing authority areas?

Mr. Robinson: That is specifically why we have decided to target certain parts of this year's allocation on the backlog of home improvement grants. Local authorities are aware of that.

Mr. D. E. Thomas: Will the Minister explain to the House and to his hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best) the reason for the very low level of capital allocation for that authority, which stands as low as £29 per head for 1984-85?

Mr. Robinson: The hon. Gentleman should know that we have also made available to Ynys Môn a special allocation to tackle the backlog, and it is aware of that.

Mr. Roy Hughes: Will the Minister realise that during the seven-year period of office of this Government the housing problem throughout Wales has got dramatically worse? When will the Government launch a real major housing drive to build the new dwellings that are required to tackle the massive problem of the huge stock of pre-1919 dwellings which lack even basic amenities? Surely, with this period of heavy unemployment, now is the time for action.

Mr. Robinson: That comes well from the hon. Gentleman. When the Labour party was in power between 1974 and 1979 it spent a mere £57 million on restoring the older housing stock, whereas we have spent £275 million. The Labour party also talks much about the public sector. It spent £86 million in Wales, while we have spent £208 million in the public sector. Therefore, our record stands comparison.

Assisted Areas

7. Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the percentage of the working population residing in assisted areas qualifying for regional development grant in Wales (a) March 1984 and (b) March 1986.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Almost 90 per cent. of the economically active population of Wales reside in an assisted area. Those residing in areas qualifying for regional development grant were 79·6 per cent. in March 1984 and 38·2 per cent. in March 1986 because of the Government's decision to focus that particular scheme on the areas of greatest need.

Mr. Wardell: Is the Minister not ashamed of himself? The percentages he has just given mean that the Government have reduced the percentage of the working population of Wales who qualify for regional development grant from almost 80 per cent. to 35 per cent. Does that not mean that the Government are using regional policy in a far less effective a way now and are contributing to Wales being one of the poorest regions within the European Economic Community?

Mr. Roberts: I completely disagree with the hon. Gentleman. He underestimates the value of regional selective assistance, which is available throughout the assisted areas. He is also underestimating the activities of the Welsh Development Agency, which has built over 1,100 advance factories in Wales since May 1979. There have been 1,153 offers of regional selective assistance since May 1979, giving 57,000 new jobs and safeguarding 31,000.

Mr. Abse: Will the Minister note that the anxieties in Wales over the administration and lack of monitoring of grants for selective assistance increased on Friday when it was made clear by the Attorney-General that investigations into fraud in the Parrot Corporation were being extended, and apparently will include members or past members of the WDA? As the Parrot Corporation now has writs issued against it for more than £15 million, and its latest report showed that it had lost £500,000, will the Secretary of State make a full statement to the House and relieve the anxieties of the work force in my constituency in Gwent, who believe that there is something amiss in the administration, structure and relationship of the WDA with the Minister and the Parrot Corporation?

Mr. Roberts: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that the police are investigating the circumstances of the original investment in the Parrot Corporation. It is, as he understands, a matter for the Director of Public Prosecutions. I have no intention of making comments that might prejudice that matter.

Writs have been issued in the United States of America against the Welsh Development Agency and others, although the agency has not yet had such a writ served upon it. It is well known to the House that the Public Accounts Committee has made known its intention to look into the WDA's investment in the Parrot Corporation.

Mr. Best: Does my hon. Friend accept that resources should be concentrated on the areas of highest unemployment, such as the Holyhead travel-to-work area? Can he assure the House that the welcome initiative of enterprise in rural areas that was announced recently will be able to assist the small business sector in gaining finance and developing, which is so critical to overcoming unemployment in areas such as Anglesey?

Mr. Roberts: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Of course, assisted area status has helped many parts of Wales, including Ynys Môn, which my hon. Friend represents. Unemployment was a significant factor in the review, but account was taken, too, of many other factors, such as the likely relative need for current and future employment. Account was also taken of long-term unemployment, occupational and other structures, economic activity rates and so on. The rural enterprise package will help rural areas—in other words, areas outside centres of population of 10,000 people or more.

Mr. Barry Jones: My hon. Friend the Member for Torfaen (Mr. Abse) made an important request for a full statement. When will the Minister make the statement for which my hon. Friend has been asking for many months?

Mr. Roberts: I understand that, in addition to the Public Accounts Committee, the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs will consider the affairs of the Welsh Development Agency. While police investigations are continuing and the matter is still with the Director of Public Prosecutions, it would not be advisable for me to make any further comment.

Mr. Gareth Wardell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman should raise his point of order after Question Time.

Later——

Mr. Wardell On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I raise this point of order in my capacity as Chairman of the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs. Earlier this afternoon, the Minister, I am sure inadvertently, said that the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs was undertaking an investigation into the Welsh Development Agency. It is not so doing. Even if it were, can you confirm, Mr. Speaker, that this would in no way prejudice the Minister's making a statement about the Parrot Corporation?

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am happy to confirm that it is the Welsh Grand Committee, rather than the Select Committee which is to discuss the Welsh Development Agency.

Rhondda

8. Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will pay an official visit to Rhondda.

Mr. Mark Robinson: My right hon. Friend had intended to visit the Rhondda last Friday, but had to cancel his engagement. I undertook the visit on his behalf.

Mr. Rogers: I commiserate with the Secretary of State on his unfortunate illness. At the same time, I welcome back my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Colman) after his recent illness.

I welcomed the Minister's visit last Friday as an interesting development in the Rhondda valley. Will he make the Secretary of State aware of the fact that male unemployment in the Rhondda valley is now almost 27 per cent., and that on the Penrhys housing estate, where more than 4,000 people live, male unemployment is more than 80 per cent.? An injection of capital and expertise are desperately needed to relieve the enormous problems that arise from those horrific unemployment figures.

Mr. Robinson: I join the hon. Gentleman in welcoming the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Coleman) back to the Chamber after his recent illness.

In this financial year, £732,000 has been allocated from the urban programme to Rhondda borough council, and since 1982 £1·37 million in urban development grants has been allocated to Mid Glamorgan, promising 345 permanent jobs and 229 temporary jobs. As the hon. Gentleman is aware, six projects have been approved for Rhondda borough council at a cost of more than £1 million, promising 310 permanent and 142 temporary jobs.

NHS (Medical Staff)

9. Mr. Grist asked the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the increase in medical staff serving the National Health Service in Wales since 1979.

Mr. Mark Robinson: There was a 13·2 per cent. increase in total whole-time equivalent HNS medical staff in Wales between 1979 and 1985. The whole-time equivalent increased from 2,001 to 2,266 over the period.

Mr. Grist: I should have liked my hon. Friend to give a clearer answer than that slightly jargonised one. Nevertheless, does not those figures give the lie to those who say that the Government are trying to run down and abolish the Health Service? Could he give the figure for centrally-funded operations for heart disease, which is, after all, one of the most dangerous aspects for the Health Service in Wales?

Mr. Robinson: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend's latter sentiments. South Glamorgan district health authority has been provided with funds to achieve a target of 600 cardiac operations a year, and in 1985 605 such operations were performed. In addition, a new cardiac unit capable of carrying out 1,100 operations a year is being planned and will be funded by the Welsh Office.

Mr. Wigley: Is the Minister aware of the crisis in Bangor with the lack of psychiatric beds in Ysbyty Gwynedd hospital and a lack of staff to serve them? Is he aware that, compared with the standard 0·5 beds per 1,000 population, which should give 80 beds, there are now only 40, and that, to bring that up to a more acceptable level of 46, there would have to be 10 extra staff? Will he ensure that the resources are available to recruit those staff?

Mr. Robinson: There are new beds in Gwynnedd precisely for that purpose. The management of psychiatric beds is a matter for the health authority.

Employment Statistics

10. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the latest unadjusted figures for unemployment in (a) Newport, (b) Gwent and (c) Wales; what were the equivalent figures in May 1979; and what was the percentage increase in each case.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The unadjusted March 1986 figures of unemployment for Newport, Gwent and Wales are, respectively, 10,047; 30,219; and 184,247. Unadjusted figures for 1979 were produced on a different basis and cannot properly be compared with this year's figures.

Mr. Hughes: Does the Minister recognise that seven years is a milestone in the life of any Government and that throughout that period we have had more or less catastrophic unemployment in Wales? The trend is still upwards and Welsh Office Ministers seem to have no answer to the problem. Therefore, is it not time for them to consider their position, or are they determined to con the people of Wales right to the very end?

Mr. Roberts: We are doing our utmost to help employment in Wales. A few moments ago I referred to the number of advance factories that have been built by the Welsh Development Agency, and it is now embarking on a further programme of factory building involving an outlay of £27 million. I can also safely refer to the special employment measures, which give help to 43,850 people, and there are welcome developments in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. I am always astonished that we never hear about those good developments from the hon. Gentleman.

Mrs. Clwyd: In that case, will the Minister act on the advice given by the coalfield communities campaign to the Select Committee on Energy last week, when it suggested that a package was needed for coalfield communities similar to that which the Government have put aside for the inner city areas? Will he also tell us how many jobs for ex-miners NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. has produced in south Wales?

Mr. Roberts: The entire purpose of the valleys initiative announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is to focus support on the valleys of south Wales, and, of course, the moneys to be spent under that initiative are additional to the moneys already being spent under the urban programme and other programmes intended to support the valley communities. NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. has £20 million to invest, and I know from my visit to the enterprise train in Cardiff last week that it is doing extremely valuable work.

GCSE Examination

11. Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the latest preparations for the new general certificate of secondary education examination and on the resources that have been made available.

16. Sir Anthony Meyer asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he is satisfied with the progress of arrangements for the introduction of the general certificate of secondary education examination in Wales.

18. Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the extent of preparations for the introduction of the new general certificate of secondary education in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Preparation for the introduction of the GCSE is well on course in Wales. We have made significant resources available for the special programme of teacher training, and have offered local education authorities funds to supplement the secondary school capitation allowance during the first two years of the new examination courses.

Mr. Jones: Does my hon. Friend agree that we should not lose sight of the fact that this new examination was generally welcomed as being superior to the existing examinations and therefore of advantage to school children? Accordingly, what reassurances can my hon. Friend give to parents in my constituency and throughout Wales who are gravely concerned that those advantages to their children are being jeopardised, or, at best, severely impaired, as a consequence of the teachers' dispute?

Mr. Roberts: My hon. Friend is right to say that when the GCSE was announced, as long ago as June 1984, it was very much welcomed by all educationists, and there is no doubt that it is superior to the O-level and CSE examinations. Those who desire to delay the start of the course in September this year and the subsequent examination must think seriously about their motives for doing so. The GCSE has had unprecedented support from the Government—far more financial support than any previous examination and course.

Sir Anthony Meyer: In view of the importance of making it clear beyond peradventure that this examination will be introduced on the stated date and that action by the teachers' unions, which could conceivably damage the examination, cannot possibly postpone it, will my hon. Friend none the less consider giving additional weapons to those teachers who are doing their best to introduce the examination on time by considering whether there should be an increase in the capitation grant, particularly for science subjects?

Mr. Roberts: I assure my hon. Friend that the Government do not regard alteration of the timetable as an option. The additional moneys that have been made available, particularly for books and equipment, to supplement the capitation fees amount to about £2,500 per secondary school per annum over the next two years and to about £18 per GCSE pupil.

Sir Raymond Gower: Is my hon. Friend aware that numerous teachers, including some headmasters, insist that they have no knowledge of these preparations? Does that not suggest a lack of communication between my hon.

Friend's Department, the education authorities and the schools? Will he therefore take emergency measures to get this message across?

Mr. Roberts: I do not think that that can be right. In written answers to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas) I have listed the GCSE inset seminars that took place between 20 January and 7 April this year. Notice of the start of the new examination course was given as far back as June 1984, explanatory leaflets were issued in January 1985, national criteria have been published and a great deal of money has been spent on seminars, training materials, inset funding and books.

Mr. Barry Jones: This is a good examination which is to make a lame start because of a tight-fisted Government. Will the Minister make available additional cash and give more time off to teachers so that they are able to prepare for the examination? There is a morale crisis among teachers and very great worry among parents, who are upset by the shortage of textbooks, equipment and teachers. Headmasters of high schools throughout Wales are anxious and are looking to the Minister for initiatives that will result in additional money and teachers.

Mr. Roberts: A will and a commitment are needed by all concerned to go ahead with the start of this examination course. I was glad to hear the hon. Gentleman commend it. We have spent £45,000 on seminars for teacher preparation and we are to spend an additional £15,000 on further seminars. A sum of £150,000, to be spent on training materials, is under consideration. Inset funding has received £427,000, at a rate of grant of 90 per cent. I have already given details of the amount of money to be spent on books and materials during the next two years. I am entitled to repeat that that kind of financial commitment represents unprecedented expenditure on a course of this kind.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Income and Expenditure

22. Mr. Chapman asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, what amount and proportion of the Church Commissioners' total revenue derives from income arising from its assets; and what total amounts and proportion of expenditure goes in support of stipends and pensions.

Sir William van Straubenzee (Second Church Estates Commissioner, Representing Church Commissioners): From total revenue of some £140·7 million in 1985, £93·5 million, or 66·5 per cent., arose from their own assets, the remainder from parish giving and other local sources. From total expenditure of £138 million, £112 million, or 81·2 per cent., was spent on clergy stipends and pensions.

Mr. Chapman: Notwithstanding the welcome increase in recent years in parish contributions towards stipends, does my hon. Friend agree that his answer underlines the simple fact that the improvement of clergy stipends and pensions depends greatly upon the Church's income from its assets? Therefore, it is in the interests of everybody that the Church should be encouraged to invest in land and property, the stock markets, and in all other ways.

Sir William van Straubenzee: That is true. It is immensely important that the investment portfolio should be well managed and that we should have a buoyant agriculture. Like many similar institutions, the Church benefits enormously when inflation is under control.

Mr. Frank Field: Should we not pay attention not so much to the Church Commissioners' portfolio, as to the amount that the laity gives? Is it not a matter of concern that as soon as a clergyman has children the family becomes eligible for family income supplement, and that those children are the largest single group to claim help under the assisted places scheme?

Sir William van Straubenzee: I cannot accept the hon. Gentleman's premise without first inquiring into the matter. However, I agree that there is a continuing duty to increase the laity's giving. That point is given constant attention by the joint committee charged with that task.

Clergy Stipends

23. Mr. Greenway asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, what is the total raised towards clergy stipends in Easter offerings; and if he will make a statement.

Sir William van Straubenzee: The answer is approximately £200,000 a year or, on average, £25 per incumbent.

Mr. Greenway: Is my hon. Friend aware that on Easter Sunday I found in my place, just as I have every year of my life, a short note from the church warden saying that the ancient custom of the church is that Easter offerings shall be given as a personal offering to the incumbent? Is it not clear from what my hon. Friend has already said that that is not happening, and that Easter offerings are taxed? Will he join me in tackling our right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on that point and the Church Commissioners, in order to restore that true and traditional custom to its rightful place in the church?

Sir William van Straubenzee: I cannot answer for the tax side of the question, except to say that I have noticed that successive Chancellors of the Exchequer of all political parties have sought to find a method of identifying the source of income so that it need not be taxed. It was the General Synod's decision that the sums raised should be included in the central augmentation, and that is the authority under which we proceed.

24. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the hon. Member for Wokingham, as representing the Church Commissioners, what was the average stipend for a clergyman on 1 January; how that compares with 1 January 1981 and 1 January 1976; if he will evaluate the benefits in kind, including housing, for each period; and if he will make a statement on the future funding of clergy stipends.

Sir William van Straubenzee: The estimated average stipend of an incumbent on 1 January was £7,197 compared with £5,185 in 1981 and £2,534 in 1976. The equivalent figures for the housing "benefit in kind" are £3,800, £2,800 and £1,700.

In 1985, 82 per cent. of the Church Commissioners' income was applied towards the pay, pensions and housing of the clergy and it is the Church Commissioners' hope to continue that level of support.

Mr. Bruinvels: I welcome the substantial increase in the clergy stipends and I am pleased to note that stipends are ahead of inflation. Will my hon. Friend note the concern felt by parents, who are deterring their sons from going forward to the Advisory Council for the Church's Ministry as potential ordinants because they consider it to be a not necessarily financially worthwhile career? Will he do all in his power to publicise the new stipends and the fact that the housing part of the stipends is so high?

Sir William van Straubenzee: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for paying tribute to what has been done. Compared with 1985, there has been an increase in the stipend of 7·2 per cent., compared with inflation of 4·2 per cent. I am sure that my hon. Friend's question and my answer will help to publicise the issue. I am also sure that my hon. Friend will agree that a man offers himself for service primarily because of his vocation. The financial reward comes a long way behind that.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMISSION

National Audit Office

25. Mr. Dalyell asked the right hon. Member for Taunton, as representing the Public Accounts Commission, what economy, efficiency and effectiveness examinations of the use of resources by the National Audit Office have been carried out to date by its auditor.

Sir Edward du Cann: It is for the newly-appointed auditors of the National Audit Office, who come from the private sector, to decide whether to carry out such examinations. No reports of any such audits have, however, as yet been made to the commission.

Mr. Dalyell: In the light of the right hon. Gentleman's announcement to the Taunton Conservative Association at the weekend, I express appreciation of what the right hon. Gentleman did in his capacity as Chairman of the 1922 Committee in making facilities available for Back Benchers, and of what he did as Chairman of the Treasury Committee in increasing Parliament's effectiveness on policy matters. Has he had an opportunity to consider the case of Jim Smith, which I raised with him? Has he reflected on the use of whistle blowers and deep throats in saving the public purse vast sums of money?

Sir Edward du Cann: I do not know whether I am in order, but I must express my appreciation of the hon. Gentleman's generous comments, and I am grateful to hon. Members for their kindness.

I am aware of the hon. Gentleman's speech in the House on 25 March and have total sympathy with his objectives. I shall draw what he said to the attention of the Comptroller and Auditor General and our colleagues, the members of the Public Accounts Committee. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to correspond with me in any way about the matter, I shall be happy to go further and accept the responsibility of ensuring that the Departments concerned are made aware of his views.

Mr. Jessel: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the National Audit Office used its resources with great efficiency and effectiveness when last November it examined the proposal to set up a joint services defence school of music? Is he further aware that as a result the Public Accounts Committee also did excellent work and produced a report, which led the Government to reconsider whether the Royal Military School of Music, which produces the finest military bands in the world, should remain at Kneller Hall, Twickenham?

Sir Edward du Cann: I am glad to have the opportunity to associate myself with the tribute that my hon. Friend has rightly paid to the admirable work by the Comptroller and Auditor General. In my opinion, for what it is worth, the whole business of efficiency in Government and the sensible spending of money is markedly assisted by the competence of those who work in the National Audit Office under his leadership. If we please my hon. Friend with his passion for music, I am doubly content.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Refreshment Department

26. Mr. Greenway asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will make a statement on the arrangements authorised by the Catering Sub-Committee of the House of Commons (Services) Committee for the supply of goods to the Refreshment Department without charge and in connection with publicity within the House for the suppliers.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): The Catering Sub-Committee has not laid down any general policy on this matter. But I understand that the recent display of English apples in the Members' Cafeteria and Tea Room was specifically approved by the Chairman of the Sub-Committee in response to an initiative by the Apple and Pear Development Council.

Mr. Greenway: Will my right hon. Friend convey the thanks of hon. Members to the Apple and Pear Development Council for the excellent free apples and pears provided a fortnight ago? Will he encourage the council to provide more English apples such as Cox's Orange Pippins and Worcester Pearmains as a means of promoting the vigour and health of Members, of keeping the doctor away and of aiding a most important British industry?

Mr. Biffen: I shall certainly convey those thanks to the admirable Apple and Pear Development Council, and draw my hon. Friend's comments to the attention of the Catering Sub-Committee.

Mr. Tony Banks: Does the Leader of the House not find it unacceptable that in the Restaurants hon. Members can still purchase real turtle soup and frogs' legs? Will he instruct the Catering Sub-Committee to stop purchasing such obscene products?

Mr. Biffen: I would not normally buy those products at that price, but I shall convey those comments to the Chairman of the Catering Sub-Committee.

LORD PRIVY SEAL

Mr. Jim Smith

27. Mr. Dalyell asked the Lord Privy Seal what consideration he has now given to the case of Jim Smith, pursuant to his answer, Official Report, 25 March, column 879.

Mr. Biffen: I confirmed in my letter of 16 April 1986 to the hon. Member that I had asked my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement to write to him about the issues raised on 25 March. He has now done so. The hon. Member has already approached Her Majesty's Treasury about its policy for payment of compensation and has received a reply.

Mr. Dalyell: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that that ridiculous letter arrived half an hour ago? As an independent member of the public, what does the Lord Privy Seal think should be done to protect the interests of whistle blowers and deep throats who have saved the Treasury a great deal of money by their actions?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman will appreciate that Ministers with departmental responsibilities for these matters can more appropriately answer that question. The hon. Gentleman will also appreciate that in the Easter and May Day Adjournment debate I said that I would contact my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence which I have done.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is the Leader of the House aware that it is now 12 months since I raised this matter, and I have repeatedly raised it. Is he aware that in the past 12 months I have driven much information on this matter into the Public Accounts Committee? That Committee may be about to report on those matters. Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that it is the only Committee in the House which is equipped to establish the truth of what happened in the case of the Aish company and Mr. Jim Smith?

Mr. Biffen: Earlier this afternoon I had the advantage of listening to the exchanges between the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) on the work of the Public Accounts Committee in this respect. I shall take account of what the hon. Gentleman has said, and I am sure that hon. Members in all parts of the House will be interested in the findings of the Public Accounts Committee, whatever they are.

Mr. Soames: Does my right hon. Friend agree that if the Government were less secretive the House would be able to do its job a great deal better? What steps will he take to ensure that we can have a freedom of information Act?

Mr. Biffen: I think that that goes much wider than this question. In this respect, I point out to my hon. Friend that earlier in the life of the Government, in all good faith, we mounted a freedom of information Bill which encountered so much ambiguity and anxiety that, in the end, the measure ran into the ground.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Private Notice Questions

28. Mr. Dubs asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will move to refer to the Select Committee on Procedure the present arrangements for private notice questions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: The arrangements for private notice questions are already within the general terms of reference of the Procedure Committee.

Mr. Dubs: Does the Leader of the House agree that the House gives Mr. Speaker far too little guidance as regards which questions should be selected for private notice and which questions should be rejected? It is therefore our fault that Mr. Speaker is often subject to a great deal of controversy when he refuses a private notice question, as in the case of the question concerning Libya on 14 April. Would it not be better if, in the interests of this House and of Mr. Speaker, the Procedure Committee reconsidered the limited guidance we now give and considered whether it could be more extensive and helpful to Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Biffen: No, I do not think that I could agree with that proposition. One of the advantages of the present private notice procedure is, first, that it is private and not subject to contention on the Floor of the House, and, secondly, that Mr. Speaker does have a great deal of discretion.

Mr. Winnick: Will the right hon. Gentleman bear in mind that private notice question applications are an extremely important facility for hon. Members and that they should not in any way be undermined? Will the right hon. Gentleman also bear in mind that if the Government were more forthcoming in making statements on important items of business, there would be less need for us to put in applications for private notice questions?

Mr. Biffen: I agree entirely with the hon. Gentleman about the importance of private notice questions to hon. Members. I do not think that any analysis of the practice over the lifetime of this Government would suggest that we have made fewer statements than our predecessors.

Mr. Ryman: I support the submission of my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick). I am always putting down private notice questions, and they are invariably refused.

Mr. Faulds: Mr. Speaker is a good judge.

Mr. Ryman: Is the Leader of the House aware that I put down a question on the prison officers' dispute——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Please do not say that.

Mr. Ryman: There is a need for the Government to volunteer statements to the House from the Treasury Bench before being pressed to do so by question, private or otherwise.

Mr. Biffen: In respect of private notice questions, I thought it was considered bad form to advertise one's failures. The hon. Gentleman raised the need for more Government statements. I assure him that if that were undertaken, it would not be long before hon. Members, quite properly, would complain that more and more prime time was being taken by Government statements.

Mr. Shore: The Leader of the House may or may not be right in his general expression of satisfaction with the present handling of applications for private notice questions. We also heard what he said about it within the Procedure Committee's terms of reference. Can he tell us when the Procedure Committee last considered this quite important matter?

Mr. Biffen: Not without notice.

Late Night Car Service

29. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Lord Privy Seal how many people are eligible for a free taxi home from the House of Commons after late night sittings; what was

(a) the cost and (b) the numbers involved in each of the past five years; and if he will take steps to extend this facility to right hon. and hon. Members.

Mr. Biffen: Staff of the House and certain other individuals who are on late duty when the House or its Committees continue to sit after 11 pm are eligible to use the late night car service at no cost to themselves. The statistics involving numbers and cost are complex and do not lend themselves to oral answer. I will, however, set out the information in the Official Report. There are no proposals to extend the facility.

Mr. Bruinvels: Does my right hon. Friend share my concern about the difficulty with which the House is now presented? It cost £56·8 million to run the House of Commons in the last financial year. Hon. Members speak late into the night, so staff have to stay here much longer than is necessary and therefore need a lift home. I am not suggesting that any hon. Member ought to have a free lift home, but surely the best solution would be for the House to stop sitting after 10.30 pm. There would then be no requirement for this taxation without representation and free taxis for many while hon. Members are left standing in the taxi queue.

Mr. Biffen: The House is sitting no later today in any significant sense than in, say, 1980-81. If my hon. Friend wants the House to rise that much earlier, he should note that that can happen only if the most frequent participants in our debate show some continence.

Following is the information:

Records of the number of persons using this facility are not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. In 1982-83, however, a special survey was mounted which revealed that 2,956 taxis were used to carry a total of 7,288 passengers.

Cost of late night car service

1985-86	80,780
1984-85	64,016
1983-84	50,564

Mr. Ron Davies On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, arising from Question Time. On Welsh questions we reached No. 11 slightly after 3.10 pm, when questions to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster started. You managed to call all the hon. Members who had tabled questions for the Chancellor, and also several supplementaries. At 3.18 pm we came to questions to the right hon. Member representing the Public Accounts Committee. Again you managed to call those who wished to ask supplementary questions. At 3.20 pm, you managed to call all the hon. Members who had tabled questions to the Leader of the House, as well as several hon. Members to ask supplementary questions..

I understand, Mr. Speaker, that you cannot control the length of supplementary questions, nor the length of replies from the Minister. However, as only nine Members who had tabled questions for the Secretary of State for Wales were answered, would it be possible for you to examine the allocation of time for questions to the Secretary of State for Wales and other Question Times, so that Welsh Members have a fair crack of the whip?

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry that I did not manage to call the hon. Gentleman today. I was hoping to do so. The allocation of time for Questions is not a matter for me, but Welsh questions went on for a further three minutes beyond 3.10 pm, and we made up time subsequently.

Mr. D. E. Thomas Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Should not Welsh Members assist English Members in the disestablishment of the Church of England?

Mr. Speaker: That is not a matter for me.

Binary Nerve Gas Weapons

3.30 pm

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): I beg leave to ask the Secretary of State for Defence, although I see that he is not here—I hope that he is not giving a radio interview in Scotland—a question of which I have given him private notice, namely, whether he will make a statement on the British Government's policy on the talks in NATO on a new generation of binary nerve gas weapons.

The Minister of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. John Stanley): I am sure that, if my right hon. Friend is giving a radio interview, he is not giving it in Scotland but at the Independent European Programme Group.

The Government note with concern the massive chemical warfare capability of the Soviet Union. We consider that the Alliance should continue, as its first priority, to work urgently in the current negotiations in Geneva for a comprehensive and verifiable global ban on all aspects of chemical warfare. A force goal requiring the United States to modernise its chemical weapons stocks with binary munitions is being discussed collectively within NATO in accordance with normal Alliance procedures. We believe that United States moves towards modernising its limited retaliatory capability with binary weapons will underline to the Soviet Union the benefits of reaching early agreement on a total ban. In the event that it is not possible to achieve such a ban, United States chemical weapons modernisation would contribute to upholding NATO's deterrent strategy of flexible response.

Mr. Davies: Is it not the case that a recommendation that binary nerve gas weapons should be part of NATO's armoury has already been accepted by NATO military representatives, including the United Kingdom representative? Is that recommendation soon to be discussed and considered by the civilian permanent representatives and Ministers of Defence, including the British Secretary of State for Defence?

Will the right hon. Gentleman tell the House whether one of the proposals is that the F111 aircraft based at Upper Heyford and Lakenheath should be equipped with chemical bombs—I believe that they are described as binary spray bombs in the trade—or are we to be told that the Government do not know, and apparently do not ask, what bombs can be carried by the F111s? Thirdly, is the Minister aware that if these proposals are accepted they will do considerable political damage to the NATO Alliance, especially at this time? Far from helping at the talks in Geneva, the proposals will jeopardise those talks and lead to a further escalation in the arms race. Will he make it clear that if necessary the British Government will veto these proposals and never allow these hideous new weapons on British soil?

Mr. Stanley: I can confirm to the right hon. Gentleman that the proposal for a force goal for the modernisation of the American chemical weapon capability has been considered by the military representatives. It has not yet been considered by the NATO ambassadors or by NATO Ministers. The right hon. Gentleman asked about basing in the United Kingdom. As I have previously made quite clear to the House, the United States Government have said that they have no plans to deploy binary chemical weapons in any foreign country in peacetime, and that should such deployment be considered in future, they will consult beforehand with the countries concerned.

I do not agree with the right hon. Gentleman's assessment of the implications for arms control. As has been well demonstrated, the intermediate nuclear forces deployment has made the Soviet Union negotiate much more seriously than ever before about INF arms control. I assure the House most fervently that the priority of the Government is to continue to try to achieve a total worldwide ban on chemical weapons. The right hon. Gentleman spoke about escalation. The basic military position must be considered when talking about escalation. For many years, the Soviet Union has taken advantage of no modernisation whatever by the United States since 1969. The Soviet Union has established a massive chemical warfare capability and it is in the interests of everybody in Western Europe and of vital importance against that massive Soviet capability our chemical warfare deterrent is maintained.

Sir Peter Blaker (Blackpool, South): Is my right hon. Friend aware that every hon. Member on this side welcomes his restatement of the NATO objective of securing a comprehensive ban on chemical weapons? We agree with him that the present proposal before NATO is more likely to persuade the Soviet Union to agree to such a ban or to move towards such a ban than the point of view of the Opposition, which seems totally devoid of common sense.

Mr. Stanley: I entirely agree with my right hon. Friend. As he well knows, not having a retaliatory capability and not preserving chemical warfare deterrents confer a major handicap on one's own conventional forces; that process tends severely to reduce the nuclear threshold, which I hope every hon. Member will want to keep as high as possible.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): Will the Minister of State accept that while the Soviet Union has nuclear weapons, many of us accept the need for nuclear weapons to be deployed by NATO forces? However, we find morally repugnant the idea that Britain should give any support to the deployment of nerve gases that are a hundred times more potent than mustard gas. Such weapons are not necessary for NATO and it is a weapons system and a form of warfare that we should utterly condemn and not agree to deploy.

Mr. Stanley: As the right hon. Gentleman is aware, there is no question of deployment in the United Kingdom and our policy remains wholly unchanged. The right hon. Gentleman says that the deployment of such weapons is repugnant. I remind him that throughout the time he was Foreign Secretary the United States had a national chemical weapon capability.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, despite our self-denial of chemical weapons, the Russians have continued to accumulate, to test and to deploy chemical weapons and have 80,000 specially trained troops and 20,000 special reconnaisance and decontamination vehicles? Surely this proves that unilateral disarmament does not work with chemical weapons or other weapons.

Mr. Stanley: I endorse what my hon. Friend has said. The lack of efficacy of one-sided disarmament is graphically illustrated by chemical weapon development and by what he has said about the scale of the Soviet capability. It is estimated that the Soviet stockpile of chemical weapon agents totals 300,000 tonnes. It is a massive stockpile and the Soviet Union has a range of methods of delivering the weapons. I hope that every hon. Member recognises the crucial importance of deterring the Soviet Union from using that capability.

Mr. A. E. P. Duffy (Sheffield, Attercliffe): The Minister has said that a decision has yet to be taken by NATO defence Ministers and by ambassadors. The right hon. Gentleman knows that, if the defence review committee establishes today a new generation of chemical warfare weapons as a force goal, it will become a common Alliance objective, to which Britain will subscribe. Despite him saying that the United States hopes that it does not have to stock chemical weapons outside the United States, what are the storage implications for Britain in certain circumstances?

Mr. Stanley: There are no storage implications, until such time as the United States approaches Britain and requests that chemical weapons be based in this country. The United States has made no such request and it has made it clear that such a request would not be made in peacetime.

Mr. Neil Thorne (Ilford, South): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that it takes about three times as many men to perform a task in nuclear/biological/chemical kit than without it, and that if we have no such protection to afford our troops we shall require at least three times as many men as we already have? As the Soviet bloc already has three times as many men as we have, that would entail us having nine or 10 times the number of service men that we have now.

Mr. Stanley: I confirm what my hon. Friend says, which is that fighting a conventional war with one's own forces in NBC kit while the forces of other countries do not have to wear it would result in a serious degradation of one's conventional operating capability.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): Does the Minister accept that we on the Opposition Benches agree that there should be a comprehensive and verifiable reduction in chemical weapon stocks? Does he agree also that the talks in Geneva are not advancing quickly enough? Does he accept that there is something illogical, contradictory and obscene about the argument that we must increase the number of chemical weapons before we can begin to reduce their number? The Minister says that everyone agrees with that argument, but I think that no one agrees with it.

Mr. Stanley: I see nothing obscene in the proposition that we should give ourselves the basic deterrent capability to ensure that these profoundly evil weapons are not used against our own people, whether civilians or service men, in western Europe.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Is my right hon. Friend aware that every sane person hopes that a complete ban can be achieved, and that anyone who has seen the extra vulnerability of our troops on the sparsely populated northern flank that would stem from the extra protective clothing that they would have to wear to withstand chemical weapons will understand at a stroke how expensive and disastrous a policy of unilateralism would be?

Mr. Stanley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He is entirely right to reflect on what he has seen and on his own experiences on the northern flank. Fighting in aircraft or in armoured vehicles on the ground in NBC kit would severely degrade our operating capability.

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): Why is NATO being asked to endorse these appalling new weapons for United States forces in the USA when it was not asked for its views on the introduction of the SDI or the updating of the American nuclear strategic deterrent?

Mr. Stanley: As the hon. Member knows, there have been detailed discussions with all the NATO countries on the SDI programme. He will be aware that it was one of the requirements for congressional approval, and a reasonable one, that the NATO countries, whose deterrent would be added to by these weapons, endorsed a force goal indicating that they favoured the deployment.

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): Does my right hon. Friend accept that some of us who are the staunchest proponents of our nuclear strategic deterrent are nevertheless gravely concerned about the wisdom of developing and building up a stockpile of ever more hideous and novel means of killing one another? Will he confirm that, whatever decision the United States takes about acquiring and building up such a stockpile on its own territory, the Government will be no party to the acquisition of those stocks in peacetime by other NATO states?

Mr. Stanley: One can speak only for this country, and, as I have made clear, there is no question of the deployment of American binary munitions in the United Kingdom in peacetime. It is of paramount importance that the NATO countries, and in this case the United States, maintain a viable deterrent capability against the formidable chemical weapons stockpile that the Soviet Union has acquired.

Mr. D. E. Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): Is it conceivable that these weapons will be brought to Caerwent to the United States arms dump in a time of emergency? Has the Minister's deterrence argument developed into an argument for continuing modernisation of the deterrent capability? How will a chemical deterrent deter the Soviet Union, and how is that an additional component to the existing nuclear deterrent? Will he explain this development in his deterrence theory?

Mr. Stanley: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will cast his mind back 40 years, and recall that perhaps it was because both sides had a chemical warfare capability that chemical weapons were never used between 1939 and 1945.

Agriculture Council

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John Selwyn Gummer): With permission, I will make a statement about the meeting of the Council of Agriculture Ministers which took place in Luxembourg from 21 to 25 April 1986. I attended this meeting with my right hon. Friend the Minister, who is, unfortunately, ill and not able to be present in the House. After negotiations which lasted throughout the week, the Council reached decisions on farm support prices and related measures for 1986-1987.

The basis of the agreement is a freeze in common support prices, with substantial price reductions for certain Mediterranean products, in particular tomatoes and tobacco. Following recent currency developments, some changes in green rates were indicated. It was, however, important that these were not of such a size that they undermined the policy of price restraint. For this reason, the United Kingdom supported devaluations of the green pound, the green franc and the green punt which will increase support prices in national currencies by 2·75 per cent. in the livestock sector and by 1·35 per cent. in the arable sector.

Turning to specific commodities, the United Kingdom has been particularly concerned about the growing surplus of cereals, and we made it clear at the beginning of the negotiations that we intended to press for effective changes to the existing regime on a fair basis. I am pleased to say that the changes we have agreed in the intervention arrangements and in quality standards, together with the introduction of a 3 per cent. co-responsibility levy, will have the effect of substantially reducing the effective level of support. The co-responsibility levy has been agreed for five years, with provision for a report by the Commission after two years on how the system is operating. As the House knows, we would have preferred a straight cut in the price for cereals. However, the co-responsibility mechanism as agreed is a substantial improvement on the simplification of the Commission's original unsatisfactory proposals.

The levy will apply to cereals sold into intervention and act as a direct price cut, with a real effect on the market. The levy will be collected at the processing stage, but cereals processed on the farm will be excluded. We would expect to pay a proportion of the total levy which is close to our share of Community cereals production. An aid for small cereals producers will be introduced. The detailed arrangements for this remain to be decided.

The Commission's original proposals included an unsatisfactory price structure for barley and a big increase in the average threshold price for maize. We secured changes in the Commission's proposals to remove the barley price distortion and to provide for a lower increase in the average maize threshold price.

The support levels for rapeseed and sunflower seed will also be reduced, if the crops in the Community exceed a prescribed maximum guaranteed quantity.

The reduction in cereal prices will be of particular benefit to pig and poultry producers. The final form of the monetary compensatory amount reductions in this sector have yet to be decided, and the Commission will be submitting proposals on this in the near future. In the meantime, increases in negative MCAs for pigs, eggs and poultry resulting from the recent realignment will be suspended until 1 June 1986.

For milk, I am glad to say that we resisted considerable pressure for a price increase. In addition, the Commission's proposal to change the fat-skim ratio was dropped. This will avoid adding to the costs of those food manufacturers who use skimmed milk.

Despite the very real steps taken by the European Community to reduce the milk surplus, culminating in the introduction of quotas, the Community is still a substantial over-producer of milk. Therefore, the United Kingdom was determined to secure a further reduction and so to cut this surplus. We were, however, insistent that the burden should fall equally on all member states. I am glad to say that, in the face of strong opposition from a number of countries, a further 3 per cent. cut in milk quotas was agreed. This will be effected over the next three years, initially through a Community buyout scheme, but if this voluntary system is not effective in all member states, it will be underpinned by compulsory reductions.

The maximum compensation chargeable to the Community budget for this scheme will be about 18p a litre over seven years. But each member state will be able to set the rate of payment according to its own circumstances. There is also provision for national schemes to continue alongside the Community scheme. We secured a provision which allows larger dairy farmers to sell part of their quotas under this scheme. Additionally, the arrangements to offset under-production of quota in one region against over-production in another will continue for a third year. This has given useful flexibility in the United Kingdom in each of the first two years of quotas.

For beef, we succeeded once again in securing an extension of the beef variable premium scheme unchanged. The maximum rate expressed in sterling will be increased as a result of the green rate devaluation. The Commission's proposals for reforming the regime for beef are to be further studied by the Council, with a view to the decisions being taken by the end of this year.

For sheep, we insisted on the removal of the proposed limit to the number of ewes per farm qualifying for the annual premium. We also secured the removal of the proposal to amalgamate Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic into a single region for the purpose of calculating ewe premium.

Turning to the budgetary costs, the Commission indicated that the package as a whole will produce a total saving over 1986 and 1987 of 777 million ecu, a saving of 118 million ecu greater than would have been achieved under the Commission's original proposal. There remains, however, a serious problem about the substantial additional costs resulting from changes in the relationship between the ecu and the dollar and from the realignment of currencies. In supporting the settlement, we made it clear that its budgetary implications would have to be referred to the ECOFIN Council. They are being considered today by the Council, which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is attending. We shall continue to seek a thorough examination of the scope for savings to minimise any supplemental budget this year.

Overall, this price fixing has produced a highly satisfactory outcome and one that follows closely the approach endorsed by the House, without opposition, on 10 March. The pressure on support prices in the Community has been maintained. In particular, the effective reduction agreed for cereals marks an important step in the battle against surplus production. The outgoers scheme for milk is the next stage in bringing about a better balance between production and consumption.

By devaluing the green pound, we have ensured that our farmers are treated fairly in relation to producers elsewhere in the Community, including particularly France and Ireland. We have removed from the original package those key elements of discrimination to which this House rightly took such exception — the 25 tonne exemption for cereals and the limits on headage payments for beef cattle and sheep. Moreover, this settlement will have a negligible effect on food prices, which are, in any case, continuing to rise less than the rate of inflation. The package therefore represents a further significant step towards improving the common agricultural policy while safeguarding the competitive position of our own farmers. It is therefore good for Britain and good for Europe.

Mr. Brynmor John (Pontypridd): I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his statement, the arrangement of which was conducted with all the consideration that we have come to expect of the Government.

Is the figure which the right hon. Gentleman has cited of 18p a litre over seven years correct? In my copy of the statement the figure is 17p a litre. The right hon. Gentleman will appreciate that other additions to the final draft were not communicated to me.

Will the right hon. Gentleman pass on to the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food our good wishes for his recovery from illness? Clearly, the Minister was suffering from the long Report and Third Reading stages of the Agriculture Bill. I am sorry that he is not in his place.

I welcome the ewe premium, which I thought at first was the first step in the Government's farm woodlands policy because "ewe" was spelt "yew" in my copy. I welcome the retention, however temporarily, of the beef variable premium. It would make no sense in the present climate if the Community scrapped the only policy among all its regimes that is good for farmers and consumers. I welcome also, because the measure was included in our amendment to the legislation on the milk outgoers scheme, the ability to surrender part of the milk quota.

The central judgment on this package depends on what it does to solve the long-term problems of the common agricultural policy. The Minister of State did not merely say that that was the best we could do in all the circumstances; he rhapsodised about it, saying that it was "good for Britain and good for Europe."

Other comments suggested that the package was a major step forward. It seems to be a case of optimism overcoming experience.

To describe the package in that way, the right hon. Gentleman must have some vision. Will it lead to a cut in the production of surplus commodities and, if so, by what percentage? If the right hon. Gentleman merely says that he will cut the rate at which the surpluses increase, I must tell him that that cannot possibly justify his description, because surpluses will continue to increase at a slower rate than previously. If the measures will not lead to a cut in production, does that not mean that, once again, Agriculture Ministers have dodged their responsibilities for a further year and have just looked at the matter on the basis that it will never arise?

What is the budgetary effect of all the measures? I have heard a great deal about the savings which are supposed to be effected. Does the Minister confirm that the effect of the loss in value of the American dollar means that £1 billion will be added to the agricultural budget of the EEC or, is it, as Agra Europ said this morning, £1·5 billion? If that is so, how is it to be paid for? Is it to be paid for by even further cuts in the present miserable regional budget or is it to be paid for by extra income? Will the right hon. Gentleman give an assurance to the House that under no circumstances will the EEC raise the take it has from the VAT in the current year, at present 1·4 per cent.? That is a crucial question. It was raised during the debate on the subject and it is a question which I think that the Minister has to answer.

On the milk outgoers scheme, is the Minister satisfied that the amount under the European scheme, whether 17p or 18p a litre over seven years, is sufficient to attract voluntary yielding of the amount of production? A large number of people believe that it is not. Therefore, resort to compulsion will be necessary. In which case, how is that to be done? I hope that the tenants' share of the milk quota is not to be based upon the formula that was suggested in the new clause to the Agriculture Bill for outgoing tenants.

I put to the Minister the fundamental irrelevance of the co-responsibility levy on cereals. It did not work on milk, so why should we think that it should work on cereals? What will the scheme do? As I understand it, it imposes only a percentage tax which is half as great as that which is necessary to make it self-supporting and after all, that is the basic tenet of a co-responsibility levy.

The Minister has mentioned the effect on consumers of devaluation of the green pound. One thing is clear, although he said that the overall effect is minimal; we will have to wait and see, but, according to the Minister, butter is to go up by 1p to 1½p a pound. How will that affect the hard-pressed dairy industry? We talk about a surplus to requirements of 16 per cent., but, if raising the butter price reduces consumption even further, will he not be compounding the problem of the dairy industry?

I conclude that the Government have been a party to a package which shirks the underlying long-term problems of the farm industry. When will the Council face up to the problems? Does it not mean that agriculture deserves more candour from its Minister, Europewide, than it is getting at present?

Mr. Gummer: If we were to have said in advance of the price fixing that we would have moved so far and made such major changes, many Opposition Members would have denied that possibility. They would have said that we were suggesting a major change which could not have been achieved. Therefore, I think that it is a little churlish of the hon. Gentleman to talk about a situation in which we have ensured that every nation has accepted what could be, if they did not get a voluntary agreement, a compulsory cut in their production of milk.

We have a co-responsibility levy which will have a direct effect on prices, we have stopped the pressures for price rises in milk, we have seen that there have been substantial price cuts in Mediterranean products and we have seen that there has been a 777 million ecu reduction in what would otherwise have been the cost. We have done all those things and we have set this example within a change in the green pound rate which is less than might have taken place and less than many countries pressed for.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman that we will not solve all our problems by what we have done. When one is trying to move from massive surpluses, one can do so only in a way which gives the industry the time to make the necessary changes. There are limits to the weight one can put on farmers in any one year. If one looks at the substantial reduction in the price of cereals this year—cereals which have already been planted and the input costs of which have already been carried—one has to say that there is another side to the argument.

The hon. Gentleman will have to answer the farmers who will ask whether he was suggesting that, despite the increase in import costs and the reduction in the price of cereals, he would have increased the burden on farmers in this country. That is what the hon. Gentleman is saying. I hope that he will say that now in West Derbyshire and Ryedale and make clear exactly what he means. He clearly means the kind of weight reduction which it would have been impossible for farmers to bear in one year.

Of course, the hon. Gentleman is right to push us and see that we go on pressing for this change. However, there is a substantial change which we might not have expected otherwise. It would have been right for him to mention the extension of the BVPS. He made it sound as if that was an easy operation. Every year it causes difficulty because it is a system which we approve of but which other countries do not find acceptable. On this occasion, not only is it unchanged but clearly, its continuation is linked to the emergence of a new beef regime. It will be for us to see that we get a beef regime which suits the Community and Britain especially.

The hon. Gentleman specifically asked about the VAT. There is no question of breaking the VAT ceiling in 1986 and 1987. The Commission recognises that both the 1986 and 1987 budgets must stay within the 1·4 per cent. ceiling. We made that clear and it was clearly written into the minutes.

We believe that there is a difficulty with the milk outgoers scheme. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree that, whatever price it is fixed at, one does not want to be spending more money than one needs to spend to get milk producers out. However, one must have enough, and we think that we have struck the right balance. We will be holding discussions with the National Farmers Union.

Of course the co-responsibility levy is not the way we would like to have done it. The hon. Gentleman is right. We would have preferred to have a direct price reduction. However, we have established a form of co-responsibility which is much fairer between the countries and which has many more of the effects of a direct cut in prices. That must be good.

The hon. Gentleman is right about the amount of the rise in the price of butter. It will be balanced by other reductions. I agree that we would like to have seen a reduction in the price of butter; that was our policy and we failed to achieve it. However, we achieved almost every other item on the milk side. I agree with the hon. Gentleman's comments about the increase in the price of butter. However, I think that it is only fair for him to say that it is just as certain that there will be certain other reductions. That is why the situation generally will be somewhat neutral.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to take into account that we have a heavy day in front of us. I will allow equal time for Back Benchers — that is to say, 20 minutes for questions. I hope that in that time I may be able to call everybody.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): As we were told last year that strict budgetary controls were binding in the Council, can the Minister explain why, in the first year of restraint, he has passed a package which exceeds those controls? Can he also say what steps he is taking to ensure that those who are compensated for moving out of milk production will not begin to produce other commodities which are already in chronic surplus?

Mr. Gummer: On the second point, my hon. Friend knows that there are no rules to stop people from going into other forms of production. We are concerned to get people moving into things which are not in over-production and we are trying to arrange the regime so that we reduce the scope and the advantage of producing in those areas. My hon. Friend is perfectly right. There is no way in which we can stop people moving into another form of over-production.

On the first point, I made it perfectly clear that the budgetary implications of this are being discussed at this moment at ECOFIN. However, the Commission has made it clear that it is intended that the budgets should be kept within the guidelines.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): May I first send good wishes to the Minister, who I realised last week was suffering from ill-health. I wish him well.

We welcome the retention of the variable premium, what has been done with the sheepmeat regime and the devaluation of the green pound. That does not seem to be quiet sufficient. None the less, it is a move in the right direction. We are concerned that there appears to be no real resolve in the Community to reduce the surpluses. That especially applies to cereals. I believe that the Minister's estimate of 770 million ecu is somewhat at variance in that he said that it was a reduction. The estimates, by all accounts, appear on the supplementary budget which looks likely to come before us as a result of the settlement, and it could be an increase of 1·5 billion ecu or possibly 2·5 billion ecu, depending on the estimates. That is a serious problem. Sometimes farmers who most need support are not getting it, whereas the support prices are increasing the surpluses. Can the Minister make that clear?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways. He cannot, on the one hand, object to the fact that the devaluation is not great enough, and, on the other, say that we are not trying to deal with the problems of surplus. He must accept that it was not sensible to have so large a devaluation that it would undermine the price part of the package. That would be unacceptable. The hon. Gentleman must get his act together on this. I realise that it would have been more electorally advantageous among the farming community to have a larger devaluation, but I think that those in the farming community understand that this was the right balance—to take into account the changes in the currencies, and not to undermine the price package. I gave the figures precisely as they are. They are the figures produced by the Commission.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): Although I welcome many parts of the package, particularly my right hon. Friend's success in resisting special pleading by countries such as Ireland for exemptions from quota arrangements, will he try to convince me a little more about the corn surplus? Can he tell me why a co-responsibility levy for cereals might succeed, whereas the co-responsibility levy for milk clearly failed?

Mr. Gummer: It would be wrong to suggest that a co-responsibility levy on its own would have the effect that I hope this package will, but if the co-responsibility levy is taken together with the effects of the changes in intervention and quality, the effect upon the price of cereals is sufficient not only because it hits particularly at the intervention point to lower the general price of cereals, but because it should be the beginning — only the beginning—of a reduction in the attraction of growing cereals. That is the effect of the price process. It is not as much as we should like, nor is it as much as others would press us to achieve.

There is a balance between moving in this direction and laying on the shoulders of farmers who have already put their crops in the ground a burden that they find intolerable. I think that we have got the balance about right, but we must not give up because we must continue to the next stage. This is only the beginning of the stage dealing with the surpluses. My hon. Friend was right to make that point to us.

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): Is the Minister aware that Agra Europ, which, unlike the Minister, is impartial on these matters, described the cereals agreement as a dog's breakfast and a disgrace? Is the right hon. Gentleman now telling the House that the previous opposition of the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to a co-responsibility levy on cereals was not based on principle, as the Minister led the House to believe, but was merely one of detail?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman must not miss out the fact that I said absolutely clearly that we would have much preferred direct price reductions to the co-responsibility levy. Nobody has ever kidded anybody else on that. We have said that, because we were unable to achieve a direct price reduction, we sought to have the system of co-responsibility levy most likely to produce the effects that we wanted. We therefore got rid of the discrimination against the United Kingdom. We therefore saw that we had a much simpler method of having a co-responsibility levy. We therefore saw that it, together with the rest of the package, had a considerable effect on the price of cereals. We therefore produced not a dog's breakfast but the very best compromise that 12 nations can reach, and that was very much better than the hon. Gentleman thought we could do.

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that this settlement will be grievously disappointing to the prophets of doom who forecast that it would be impossible to achieve any agreement whatever, and that he and his right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food deserve the warmest congratulations on getting the best possible settlement in the real world, which will be particularly welcome to Welsh sheep and beef farmers?

Mr. Gummer: I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree that on a day when we got 12 nations to agree on our agriculture policy, it was interesting that the Liberals produced two policies, one on agriculture and the other on the environment. Those policies were contradictory, the environment policy suggesting that we should go back to peasant farming.

Dr. Roger Thomas (Carmarthen): As a direct consequence of what the Minister has announced today, what percentage fall will there be in the milk available for cheese and butter creameries? Can we look forward to further creamery closures and a further loss of jobs among people who are really outgoers but have no outgoers scheme of their own?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman is right. If one reduces the amount of milk that is being produced by the 3 per cent. that we are talking about, that is bound to have a continuing effect of those who manufacture from milk. But the fact remains that those problems cannot be dealt with merely by ignoring the fact that, as a Community, we are producing about 14 per cent. more milk than we need. In those circumstances, it is proper for all of us to take an equal cut in the amount that we are producing.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): My right hon. Friend said that it has been a highly satisfactory outcome — good for Britain and good for the Community. That is what has been said by his predecessors every single year that I have been here, yet the problems of the common agricultural policy get worse. In the immortal words of The Examiner, I wonder whether my right hon. Friend could explain? If he can do that, will he also tell the House, keen as he is to bring surpluses under control, by how much the surpluses will be reduced if we have the same weather patterns over the next 12 months as we had over the past 12 months?

Mr. Gummer: But would not my hon. Friend be more effective in his opposition to the common agricultural policy if he said today, "This is good as far as it goes, but it should have gone a lot further."? He does not do that, because it does not matter how far one goes in dealing with problems of moving from a Community that was set up to deal with shortage to a Community in a world with surpluses. However far we go down that road, my hon. Friend will not give at least a little credit where it is due. We have got 12 nations to move a long way down that road. We have much further to go down it. The package will have an impact on surpluses, but my hon. Friend must accept that surpluses grow at great speed as a result of technological change that no one forsaw 10 years ago. A great deal of change is required. One cannot ask the farming community to carry the whole of that change in too short a time, because that is not the nature of the agricultural system.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): The Minister said that the package is intended not to exceed the budgetary discipline by which the Government have set so much store. When will it be known whether this package breaks that discipline?

Mr. Gummer: The situation is simply this. The Commission has made it clear that this package will not break the budgetary discipline. The discussion that is continuing at the moment in the ECOFIN council is about the exogenous elements, or elements that come from outside the decisions, which are supposed to affect the budget — in other words, things that are seen as extraordinary items. They are being discussed today in the ECOFIN council, and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is known to have a strong adverse view about the acceptance of things that are supposedly extraneous but which are in fact part of the system.

Mr. Albert McQuarrie (Banff and Buchan): I congratulate my right hon. Friend, as well as my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, on maintaining the variable beef premium and on their determined stand against the ewe proposals which, allegedly, were going to be put forward by the Commission. However, the increase in support prices will not compensate for the increased costs as it will probably result in a 10 per cent. increase to Scottish farmers. In addition, the reduction from 27p to 18p per litre of milk will make the scheme less attractive. My right hon. Friend referred to the fact that all member states have some licence. Will the Government take cognisance of the existence of that licence? If milk producers are assisted in one state, will we in this country give similar assistance to our milk producers, especially since the landlord-tenant sharing scheme is affected by the proposals?

Mr. Gummer: I hope that my hon. Friend will agree with me that in his general stance on the common agricultural policy, he is rightly concerned with the extension and increase of surpluses. He must therefore accept that, if we intend to reduce those surpluses, we cannot continue to increase the prices to farmers for producing surpluses. That would be wrong even where inputs increase. I hope that my hon. Friend does not want us to increase the price of milk and yet in some way to reduce the cut in the price for cereals. We cannot do that and carry out what my hon. Friend in other circumstances has been pressing us to do, which is to reform the CAP.

The Government will look carefully at the additionality of the outgoers scheme and will listen to representations from the National Farmers Union, the Scottish Farmers Union and others, to see that we get the balance right. We intend to ensure that outgoers are achieved voluntarily at a price which is not greater than it need be. If we pay more than is necessary, that will increase the cost to the budget. People have not lost that price; rather, they will be offered a lower price for going out. They still have a choice about going out.

If we are to solve the problems of agriculture, those who want to see an immediate and swingeing reduction which would damage our farmers irretrievably, must stay their hand. Similarly, those who want us to keep farmers' incomes up irrespective of the effect on surpluses, must also stay theirs. The right answer is to be found somewhere between those views; that is why I support the package.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): In giving the Government credit where credit is due, I think that the beef and sheep premia arrangements are useful. However, is not the Minister trying to have it both ways by over-selling the benefits of the package to the European taxpayer and under-estimating the lack of help to the beleaguered farm industry in Britain as a consequence of the decline of incomes — according to the Minister's table 26 in the annual review — since the Government took office? Is it not even more serious that the Government have reversed their position over the cereal co-responsibility levy and are pursuing a chimerical policy which failed for milk and will fail to curb surpluses for cereals? When will the Minister discuss what is to replace the co-responsibility levy for cereals?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman, I think, does himself a disservice in not considering the facts and again asking for the two impossibles. On the one hand he asks for more money for farmers for the very products which are in surplus, and on the other he attacks the Government for trying to do something about that. I have been frank with the hon. Gentleman and told him that I would much prefer to have had a reduction in price. However, we were unable to achieve that. We have achieved a package which is much closer to what we wanted than any hon. Member thought possible before we entered into the negotiations. The hon. Gentleman would do himself more credit if he were to recognise that.

The Government will take the hon. Gentleman's contributions on agriculture seriously when he recognises that his alliance partners should stop suggesting to farmers that they should return to being peasants, working with old-fashioned, out-of-date tools in old-fashioned and out-of-date ways.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): In an earlier reply, my right hon. Friend seemed to be saying that the price fixing, with its attendant supplementary budget, was in line with the Fontainebleau commitment to financial discipline. Does my right hon. Friend really think that? He can reach that conclusion only by treating the depreciation of the dollar as an exceptional item. But he is a member of a Government who believe in freely moving exchange rates. Does he really think that the depreciation of the dollar and the consequential increase in agricultural expenditure is a truly exceptional item which permits us to break through the 1·4 per cent. VAT ceiling and the large supplementary budget?

Mr. Gummer: My right hon. Friend will accept that being a member of the Government has advantages and disadvantages. One of the advantages is that one can say quite clearly which are the things for which one is responsible and which are those for which others are responsible. I am responsible for ensuring that, when we come to a package of this sort, the package we deal with must be within the budget and that the Commission makes absolute assurances about VAT and its ceilings. We must then consider what we do about the suggestions that some extraneous items are not, after all, written into the Luxembourg agreement. We believe that it is our job to see how much of that can be covered by savings. We will continue to do that, and I stated that clearly in my statement.

In the ECOFIN meeting today and tomorrow, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will look very carefully at proposals and suggestions that there are some extraneous items. I have listed what those items claim to be and I have cast considerable doubt upon some of the suggestions that have been put forward. I am also conscious of the fact that it is easier to talk about the disadvantages to the budget when the dollar moves one way, than to talk about the advantages to the budget when it moves in another way. Therefore, I hope that my right hon. Friend will accept that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be raising the points which my right hon. Friend has just raised with fellow members of the Council.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall do my best to call those hon. Members who have been rising regularly. I ask for brief questions, as that will lead to shorter answers.

Mr. Paul Marland (Gloucestershire, West): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Minister and my right hon. Friend the Minister of State on their tenacity in these negotiations and on the fact that they have arrived at some kind of agreement before the harvest, but I should like to return, without apology, to the co-responsibility levy on cereals. The co-responsibility levy on dairy products did not work. Does not my right hon. Friend think that he is merely tinkering with the situation to introduce one now? Can he assure me that, during the next five years that the levy is to exist, he will look at other ways of curtailing production?

Mr. Gummer: I repeat to my hon. Friend that I see the levy as part of the package and not on its own. We have specifically pressed for and received agreement—there will have to be a report on the workings of the co-responsibility levy within two years—that the levy is not fixed permanently but is for a five-year period. We will, of course, continue to press the Community in the direction which both he and I want, to reduce the prices of surplus products and change the system of intervention to achieve the result we all want, which is to bring production and demand into kilter.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): Will my hon. Friend confirm that this year's settlement will be fair to farmers without being a heavy drain on consumers and that it will have a negligible effect of food prices, yet, because of the devaluation of the green pound, farmers will get a reasonable increase in receipts? Does he also agree therefore that the package strikes a good balance between the interests of the farmers on the one hand and the consumer on the other?

Mr. Gummer: I am sure that this is the best balance that can be achieved in circumstances in which we are trying to reduce production. Those cannot be favourable circumstances for farmers. The improvements in farm incomes, which come from the realignments of the green pound, will be offset by considerable reductions which arise from the measures that we have taken. That is a fact of life which arises when we produce too much of certain products. However, I believe that this is a step which the farmer can bear and is a step in the important direction of bringing supply and demand into line.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): How will the small dairy farmer in the county of Cumbria, on the margin of profitability, be affected by the deal, specifically in connection with milk quotas?

Mr. Gummer: The effect on the small dairy farmer, as on other dairy farmers, is that there will be no increase in the price of milk. However, the small dairy farmer will have the opportunity of taking the outgoers scheme if that is what he wants.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: In other words, he will have to go on the dole.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman is again very keen to press the disadvantages of the policy which he must want.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The NFU asked me to ask the Minister that question.

Mr. Gummer: If the hon. Gentleman only knows what question to ask because he has been lobbied, then it would be better for me to answer the lobbyist directly.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): Will my right hon. Friend appreciate that many Conservative Members and specifically my farming colleagues, will not like the contributory levy although we appreciate my right hon. Friend's position on that. However, we appreciate that my right hon. Friend came out with the best deal at the end of the day.

Did the Commission and the Ministers consider the problem of the present surpluses? Does he understand that there are great difficulties in export markets for United Kingdom traders against our European counterparts? Was there any discussion of what we will do with the massive surpluses which exist now and of whether he can assist, in export terms, in getting rid of them?

Mr. Gummer: There will be a number of opportunities in the immediate aftermath of the general decisions—in the detailed ones—to consider what my hon. Friend has said. I know that he has some suggestions which I hope that we shall be able to take up with the Commission.

Mr. John: The right hon. Gentleman will appreciate that I am not unused to advocacy, but which of the three defences on surplus production is he running? Is he running the defence that, as a result of all the measures taken together, production of the regimes producing a surplus will fall, or that they will not fall themselves but that surpluses will rise more slowly, or simply that he does not know whether they will fall?

Mr. Gummer: My answer is simple. Our job is to reduce surpluses. That falls into two parts. One is that surpluses are rising all the time and so first we must stop them rising. Secondly, we must bring the total into line with what is needed, partly by increasing consumption and partly by reducing surpluses. All that I have claimed for this package is that it goes further towards the reduction of surpluses than any package which he or anybody else envisaged before we went into the negotiations.

Libya

4.30 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I beg to ask leave to move succinctly the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"to consider the contrast between the Prime Minister's explanation for permission to use the F111s from British bases and the explanation that is being given by the Pentagon and the contrast on the use of nuclear weapons."

I have to persuade you, Mr. Speaker, that the matter is definite. It may be unfortunate from the point of view of Parliament that an in-depth interview, such as none of us can give the Prime Minister, was administered by Mr. Gordon Clough yesterday on "The World this Weekend." In answer to Mr. Clough, the Prime Minister reiterated what indeed she had said in column 726 of Hansard of 15 April—that permission was given for the use of F111s because they were more accurate on particular targets, with the implication that they would save innocent lives.

I think that you will agree, Mr. Speaker, that Aviation Week and Space Technology, the most serious American journal, is very close to the Pentagon. In a major article on 21 April it said:

"'The Navy's carrier aircraft could have hit all the Libyan targets at the same time, but they would have been tight on assets. There were a lot of good reasons to include the Air Force F-111s,' a senior military official said. 'In most of the contingency planning for large air strikes by the Sixth Fleet, the F-111s from Britain are factored into the operation.'"

The senior Pentagon official went on:

"'The Libyan attack provided a good proving ground for the F-111s to be flown in the Mediterranean . . . The ability to fly over France would have helped the mission considerably.

'Understandably, after the All-Navy action in Libya last month the Air Force wanted a piece of the action.' The official added 'The fact that the Defense Dept. budget is under consideration—and here was an opportunity to show how well the money is being spent on aircraft and weapons—was not overlooked by both services as a side benefit to the mission. Another reason to include the F-111s in the operation was that it showed the support of Great Britain for our antiterrorist activities.'"

Nowhere in that explanation is the point made by the Prime Minister. From the Americans we have contingency planning, proving grounds, the Defence Department's budget and Britain's support.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. Gentleman bring his remarks to a close? He has had three minutes.

Mr. Dalyell: That is the definite aspect.

The urgent aspect is that there could be a repeat.

The important aspect is that nothing is more important than the truthfulness of the British Head of Government. Frankly, I think that the House of Commons has been given cock and bull tales and that yarns have been spun for us.

The matter also includes the nuclear——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has had more than his time.

The hon. Gentleman asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the discrepancies in the Prime Minister's explanation on the F111s and the American version."

I have listened carefully to what the hon. Gentleman has said, but I regret that I do not consider the matter that he raises is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10 and, therefore, I cannot submit his application to the House.

Further application under Standing Order No. 10.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is a further application under Standing Order No. 10 and then I shall take points of order.

Mr. Heffer: It arises directly——

Mr. Speaker: That may be, but I have called the hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins).

Agricultural Price Settlement

4.35 pm

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely, about which we have just had a statement.

"the 1986 common agricultural policy price settlement,"

The matter is specific because we have just had the statement, and it is important for six reasons. First, the settlement has been described by an impartial news organ, Agra Europ, as a "price debacle". Secondly, the settlement will do little to stem the rising tide of CAP expenditure, especially on cereals. Thirdly, total spending will exceed the budget guidelines. The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has admitted that. That is serious because the Government's agreement to increase the VAT limit last year was based on the quid pro quo of financial guidelines being strictly enforced. The Government's faith is now shown to be completely unjustified.

Fourthly, CAP spending is completely out of control. The settlement will breach the barriers of the financial guidelines, which are now shown, in the Minister's words, to be worthless, because he has said that they cannot take account of extraneous factors such as currency movements, and there are currency movements every month. Fifthly, the settlement will require another supplementary budget on top of an existing supplementary budget, despite assurances given to the House by Ministers. That budget will increase the United Kingdom's financial contributions to the EEC and ensure that the VAT ceiling will be raised to 1·6 per cent. at the earliest opportunity.

Finally, the settlement will undermine the important constitutional case currently before the European Court in Strasbourg, whereby the Council is disputing the Assembly's right to increase budget spending, because the Assembly's case was shown to have been proven by the fact that the Council's budget last year did not take agricultural spending fully into account.

The matter is urgent, first, because the statement has not given the House a full chance to express its total opposition to and concern about the implications of the package before decisions are implemented. We heard from the Minister that a meeting is going on today. Secondly, it is not a fit subject for an Adjournment debate. Finally, perhaps to anticipate something that you may have said on previous occasions, Mr. Speaker, in applications under Standing Order No. 10, the precedents in 1983, 1984 and 1985 are that after the announcement of the agricultural price settlement there was no subsequent debate on CAP pricing.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Deakins) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the 1986 CAP price settlement."

I have listened carefully to the exchanges in the House and I fully appreciate the concern which the hon. Gentleman has expressed and the importance of the subject. Nevertheless, he knows that I have to take into account the business before the House and whether this should have precedence over that. I regret that I do not consider that the matter that he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10. Therefore, I cannot submit his application to the House.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): In view of the time and the fact that many hon. Members wish to debate the British Shipbuilders (Borrowing Powers) Bill, I shall write to you, Mr. Speaker, on the subject. It is a matter of importance, but I do not wish to delay the debate.

Mr. Speaker: I am obliged to the hon. Gentleman.

Orders of the Day

British Shipbuilders (Borrowing Powers) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

4.40 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Peter Morrison): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

If I make a rather shorter speech than usual, it is to give right hon. and hon. Members in all parts of the House, particularly the Opposition, the opportunity to make their speeches, as the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) pointed out. Furthermore, as I have already explained to the Opposition Front Bench spokesmen, I have a back problem, which means that standing for any length of time is somewhat complicated.

I apologise on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for his absence. He would very much have liked to be here. However, as the Opposition know, he arranged a considerable time ago to be in the United States this week to talk about trade relations. My right hon. Friend will be following closely the Hansard report of the debate, as he considers shipbuilding to be one of his prime areas of responsibility.

The Bill is technical, but in no sense do I believe it to be unimportant. Our shipbuilding industry has a very long history. Thanks to Mr. Graham Day and his successor, Mr. Hares, who takes over later in the week, there have been enormous strides towards efficiency. The work force of British Shipbuilders has played an important part in that process and it believes that those strides towards efficiency are necessary.

The corporation's current borrowing powers are up to a maximum of £1,200 million. The House will recall that that limit was set in the British Shipbuilders (Borrowing Powers) Act 1983. It is likely that that limit will be reached at some stage during the summer, although I cannot say precisely when. That is the reason for the Bill. Its purpose is to increase to £1,300 million, and, at a later stage, to £1,400 million, subject to the affirmative resolution procedure, the amount that British Shipbuilders may receive by way of Government support. It is not related to public dividend capital, which is dealt with through the normal Estimates procedures; nor does the borrowing limit apply to grants paid under the intervention fund. Therefore, it is both a technical and an important Bill. Its introduction demonstrates the Government's continued commitment to British Shipbuilders.

Since 1979, £1,449 million has been paid by direct aid to British Shipbuilders. That is made up of just over £1 billion by way of equity and loan, £235 million by way of intervention fund and £177 million by way of the redundancy payments scheme. By any stretch of the imagination, there is nothing mean about that. Indeed, some of my right hon. and hon. Friends may consider that it is over-generous. However, I believe that the Government have struck precisely the right balance.

As the House appreciates, support alone cannot guarantee a future for the shipbuilding industry. I suspect that there is no right hon. or hon. Member who does not realise that shipbuilding is a highly competitive, worldwide market and that at the best of times it is a market in which it is difficult to compete. I think that all right hon. and hon. Members will agree that today conditions are even worse than one dared to think that they would be as little as a year or so ago.

Why is this a complicated and difficult market in which to compete? It goes back to the first oil crisis of 1973. Since then capacity has far outstripped demand and restructuring has taken place. In western Europe there has been a reduction in capacity of about 50 per cent. In Japan, capacity has been reduced by 35 per cent. However, while that restructuring was taking place, China and Korea entered the market. Despite that, the market had ticked over until recently. In part that was due to what I describe as both visible and invisible subsidies, as a result of which there was a modicum of new orders. Recently, however, a dramatic change has taken place in the shipyards both of the far east and of Europe.

In Japan, for example, when Sanko — which has been, not perhaps completely single-handedly but to a major extent, responsible for orders for the Japanese shipbuilding industry — went out of business, Japanese yards had to lay off 10,000 workers, and there are calls for a further 20,000 job losses. In Korea there were no new orders in August and September of last year. Domestic orders have picked up in Korea since then, but it has shelved its plans for further expansion. There have been a few orders in Europe, but, even so, it seems that Sweden is reconciled to the closure of its nationalised industry, and Holland is cutting back on subsidies.

Despite the current depressed state of the market, the Government believe that British Shipbuilders must continue to concentrate on certain areas: cost effectiveness, competitiveness and having the right support at the right time. As all right hon. and hon. Members who take a close interest in this matter will appreciate, that is the main thrust of its corporate plan for 1985. After what I would describe as the successful completion of the sale of the warship yards, all these activities are concentrated in the merchant shipbuilding sector

To maximise cost effectiveness, British Shipbuilders is doing certain things. It is concentrating on certain products, such as ferries, offshore supply vessels and diving supply vessels. Judging by its present work load, it is fair to say that that policy has been successful. It is securing better components at better prices. Thanks to its phase 5 pay and productivity agreement, it is adopting new building methods. That is a step in the right direction. It is also making appropriate capital investment. Since 1979, capital investment in the shipyards has been just under £330 million. It is investing in capital projects relating to CAD-CAM installations and, at a completely different end of the scale, upon the most up-to-date welding gear.

The corporation's order book is as follows. I am happy to say that there are ships to be finished in all of its yards. Govan has an order for a P and O ferry, which will take some time still to finish. Smith's Dock has three of the four Cuban ships still under construction, and Austin and Pickersgill has two advanced bulk carriers still under construction. Last Friday saw the naming by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister of the Stena Seawell at Sunderland. Sunderland has a second diving support vessel on the stocks, as well as a very large crane barge for ITM. Ferguson-Ailsa has a number of small ships under construction, and Appledore has two dredgers on order. However, when this work runs out, British Shipbuilders will face a major problem.

Against a target in 1985-86 of 200,000 gross tonnes of new orders, British Shipbuilders secured only 23,000 tonnes. I do not believe that that was because of lack of support. It was simply because there were remarkably few orders to be won, especially towards the end of last year. The latest figures I have for the world market last year show an order book at the end of 1985 of just over 25 million gross tonnes. That is the lowest level for three years. More significantly, it is very nearly the lowest level since 1979.

To put the decline of the industry into context, it is worth while to remember that the peak order book in recent times, that of March 1974, stood at no fewer than 133 million gross tonnes. That is more than five times the level of orders that we now have.

Building ships more efficiently is the key to delivering them on time and to the owners' satisfaction. I have already referred to the fact that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister named the Stena Seawell last Friday. The delivery of that highly complex vessel on time and in perfect condition speaks volumes for the dedication and effectiveness of the Sunderland management and work force. It is the best kind of advertisement that the industry could have, and it is worth more than any amount of Government support. I am sure that all right hon. and hon. Members will join in applauding that success.

Against this background of the corporation's own drive towards cost effectiveness lies the support that we are continuing to provide. In this financial year we have made provision for an external financing limit of £73 million for British Shipbuilders, covering payment of public dividend capital to meet the needs of the corporation and intervention support for individual orders.

But as important as the value of support is the effectiveness of the manner in which it is provided. Not included in the British Shipbuilders' figures is the home credit scheme, which matches the financial terms that the United Kingdom owner ordering merchant ships could obtain if he was going overseas. But, as the House will appreciate, the key production aid is intervention fund support to bridge the price gap between United Kingdom costs and foreign prices. The present rate is 20·5 per cent. of contract price, although the Commission, which approves aid regimes within the present fifth directive on shipbuilding, will allow some flexibility on a case-by-case basis.

We are also ready to consider other means of support case-by-case, as the need arises, although always within the international rules which have to be observed as a framework if any sense of order in this market is to be preserved. I have already mentioned the present Community regime. As the House knows, we are now embroiled in the discussions in Brussels over the content of the Community regime to follow the fifth directive; the new measure which will govern the provision of aid to shipbuilding in the Community from the beginning of 1987.

We have already had a valuable session of the Council of Industry Ministers, which was attended by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State. He made clear both our belief that aid for the industry will remain essential for some time to come, and that we are determined that such regulations as are introduced should cover all aids, however given. As I have explained to the House, the United Kingdom aid regime is straightforward and transparent. It has to be said that those of some of our partners are much less so. In consequence, we have asked the Commission to ensure that it gets all shipbuilding aids in the Community on to the table and to make its recommendations for the next regime in the light of what is revealed by these inquiries. I am happy to report that the Commission is hard at work along those lines.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): The Minister mentioned putting everything on the table, so is it possible to put on the table too the £37 million subsidy given to Harland and Wolff? Is the hon. Gentleman aware that when Northern Ireland's accounts were approved in the House, the Minister responsible gave us an assurance that none of that money would be used to win orders that could go to English or Scottish yards? When we ask questions, it is said that we cannot be told where that money goes because of commercial confidentiality. Is that not a topic that could well be considered by the National Audit Office?

Mr. Morrison: I know that the hon. Gentleman follows such matters closely and carefully, but I assure him that the Government looked carefully to ensure that the tenders from Harland and Wolff and from Swan Hunter were on a like-by-like basis. It would have been quite wrong and politically careless not to do that. But the hon. Gentleman will appreciate that the process took some time. There was the possibility of earlier decisions, but further checks were taken into account. I understand the disappointment felt about Swan Hunter, but no doubt the hon. Gentleman heard the statement last Thursday by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence. Those matters were taken carefully and closely into account.

Mr. Frank Field: I was not specifically thinking of the order that was announced last week. No hon. Member can discover where that £37 million goes. As it is spent but we cannot find out on which orders it is spent, is that not a topic for the National Audit Office?

Mr. Morrison: I should be happy to look further at that point if the hon. Gentleman so wishes. However, I would not like to give any undertaking from the Dispatch Box. The hon. Gentleman will appreciate that Harland and Wolff does not fall within my ministerial responsibilities, but I am happy to look into the important point that he has raised.

As I said at the beginning of my speech, the Bill is very important. All those Opposition Members present and, indeed, those of my right hon. and hon. Friends who are present, have close connections with the shipbuilding industry. Their constituencies may be involved with that industry to the exclusion of all others, and I appreciate that this topic is important to them. I shall listen carefully to what they all have to say and will, with the leave of the House, reply to the debate.

I commend the Bill to the House. It represents a further strong indication of the support that the Government have already given British Shipbuilders over the years. That support has been very significant.

4.54 pm

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): As usual, the Opposition will not oppose a Bill that gives British Shipbuilders extra borrowing powers. But this is the occasion for a very timely debate on the shipbuilding industry. It is clear to all who know about the industry that the merchant shipping side is approaching as serious a crisis as it has ever faced.

During the past few years the industry has shrunk, particularly in terms of manpower. Since 1979, we have lost 48,000 jobs in shipbuilding and ship repair. But even more important, a crisis is now imminent. The Minister read out the orders that are now with British merchant shipyards. But he failed to add that all of them are near completion. He did not mention any prospective orders. As far as I know, it is highly speculative whether any orders are in prospect. We face the awful truth that, as the year progresses, the time approaches when some of those yards will have no orders. If orders are not obtained very quickly, there will be a difficult gap to bridge if orders are subsequently obtained. I am sure that the Minister realises that a lot of preparatory work needs to be done before a ship is properly under construction.

Some commentators, including, I believe, the retiring chairman of British Shipbuilders, have said that the years between 1986 and 1990 would be the crisis years for shipbuilding. It is believed that it is possible to contemplate some rise in orders after then, because of the shipping industry's need for replacement orders. Whether or not that is true, the crunch has already arrived for British merchant shipbuilding. Capacity simply cannot be reduced further. If it is, it will fall below the minimum size necessary to retain a proper shipbuilding industry. There must be a minimum size to justify the design capability, the research and development effort and the substantial work force and management who are committed to the industry. If the industry contracts further, we shall cease to have an industry.

In 1986, shipbuilding in this country faces survival or extinction. Of course, the consequences of extinction are dramatic not just for the industry but for those areas of the country that are deeply dependent on it for their prosperity and employment. I need mention only Tyneside, Teesside, Wearside and Clyde, although there are more shipbuilding areas than that. However, those regions are particularly dependent on the industry, and it is unthinkable that ships should not be made on those principal rivers.

Other trades are dependent on the shipbuilding industry, ranging from those involved in the steel industry to those that produce fairly minor pieces of equipment. It has been calculated that there are at least three jobs outwith the shipbuilding and ship repair industries for every one job within them. Therefore, the consequences go much wider than just the shipbuilding areas, and affect many other parts of our manufacturing industry.

The tragedy for the industry is that a Conservative Government are in power at this time of crisis. It is now clear that the decision to privatise the naval shipyards was one of the most stupid decisions in the history of Government relationships with British shipbuilding. Just when the industry is at its most vulnerable, its most profitable part has been handed over to the private sector, leaving British Shipbuilders exposed.

The former chairman of British Shipbuilders, Sir Robert Atkinson, told us when privatisation was being considered that, if it took place, we would cease to have an integrated industry, and the Government would be taking away the very capability which had helped it to survive and which would enable it to survive again through the difficult years ahead.

The industry would have had sufficient problems without privatisation, but with privatisation and its stunning financial effect on British shipbuilders the industry has been forced into an unnecessary crisis. A handicap has been imposed upon it just when there is a world slump in orders and a catastrophic decline in the United Kingdom merchant fleet. The problem for us is not a fall in orders but a relative fall in the British share of the market. Only about 2 per cent. of the world's shipbuilding orders come to Britain. Taking all that into account, the privatisation of the naval shipyards must rank as one of the most stupid acts of Government for many years.

We say that the industry must survive. The Government's clear responsibility is to ensure that it does. The crisis is one of depth as well as of timing. Speed is necessary if there is to be a chance of survival. It is clear from recent days and months that the Government do not understand that the timing of orders is of tremendous importance to both naval and merchant shipbuilding. If the timing is wrong, unnecessary damage will be caused.

I shall suggest a number of measures which, in addition to those which are under way, the Government should undertake to help the industry survive the crisis. First, there must be a proper Government procurement policy. Orders are available from the public sector. They should be organised and brought forward so that they are in time for the British shipbuilding industry. I hope that never again will orders go abroad such as that from Pacific Nuclear Carriers for an important nuclear carrier ship. For a British public sector organisation to give an order to another country is intolerable. The Government should have stopped that. I hope that if that occurs again it will be stopped.

The Minister should co-ordinate and bring forward as many public sector orders as can be found. I hope that he will not say that it cannot be done, because it was done under a Labour Government. Indeed, my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) was responsible on a number of occasions for intervening positively — for example, on British National Oil Corporation orders. The Government should make an internal effort to co-ordinate and organise orders as soon as possible. That would provide an important breathing space for our merchant yards.

One initiative should be pursued vigorously by the Department of Trade and Industry. It affects in particular the Sunderland and Govan yards. I refer to the proposal by British Shipbuilders for the fleet support king 20/20 vessel. That has been developed extensively within British Shipbuilders and involves a new type of fleet auxiliary vessel. It has possibilities for foreign navies, but it is crucial that orders come from the Royal Navy to give it credibility on the foreign market. I do not suggest that it is a substitute for the auxiliary oiler replenishment vessels, but it is complementary to them. It represents a new opportunity for the British merchant yards by supplying naval orders, particularly abroad.

Mr. Bob Clay (Sunderland, North): And it is cheaper.

Mr. Smith: I have corresponded with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who has passed the buck to the Ministry of Defence. Certainly my right hon. Friend the Member for Govan and my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay) will be pursuing this matter with the Ministry of Defence and the Department of Trade and Industry. I hope that the Department of Trade and Industry will not shuffle off responsibility, but will fight for this important new initiative for British Shipbuilders.

Mr. Clay: My hon. Friend was kind enough to show me a letter from the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry about the FSK. Does he share my view that it appears that the Secretary of State does not even know the Ministry of Defence's position? He just says that it is a good project and that he hopes that the MOD will order it. He does not seem to be aware that several weeks ago his colleague in the Ministry of Defence said that the MOD did not intend to order it.

Mr. Smith: It is clear that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is not aware of the Ministry of Defence argument that the ship would have to be armed. The Department of Trade and Industry and the Ministry of Defence should sort the matter out, and decide what is required and what would be suitable for British Shipbuilders to build. I hope that they will bear in mind the enormous importance of putting in an order in view of the enormous export potential involved.

The Government must increase their support in various ways. I think in particular of the shipbuilding intervention fund. The Minister of State said that the Government are pursuing the matter within the EEC, but previously targets have been set but not achieved. I hope that that will not happen again.

When we enter negotiations to safeguard our national interest we are not helped by free market speeches inside and outside the four walls of the Community. If the Government continually argue a free market policy they have little credibility when they come to argue in favour of an interventionist policy in terms of our national interest within the EEC. It would be helpful if the Government abandoned their free market postures because it is crucial that we gain as much advantage as possible from the shipbuilding intervention fund.

In addition, I hope that the Government will examine the possibility of further United Kingdom support packages for the industry. Other Governments provide such packages and this Government should. I draw attention to one example. The report on European maritime transport policy published recently by the other place recommends that the British Government should re-examine the limit on loans. Currently an eight-year limit on loans applies to shipowners who buy vessels from British shipyards. That conforms with OECD guideline. It is well known and documented that other Community Governments give additional support. The report argues that there should be a 12-year loan capability. The Government cannot say that it is impossible to allow such a loan capability because other Governments with the same obligations allow it. That possibility must be examined urgently.

I hope that the Government will further examine the extension of credit packages. My hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, North will, no doubt, tell us about his interview with the Prime Minister a few days ago in his constituency. If the Prime Minister is claiming that credit packages in Britain are as good as in other parts of the world, or that they can be made available, we want clarification as soon as possible. The Government should be putting their whole effort into finding ways of keeping the industry in existence.

There can be few occasions when the future of an entire industry becomes at stake over a short period. From time to time particular parts of a certain industry get into difficulty. They can be helped when they need to be helped, but I cannot think of a recent example of the whole of an industry facing a crisis of existence in a period of only a few months. The months of crisis are here now and the future of the industry will be decided in the next few months. That is why it is crucial that urgent action be taken by a Government determined on one policy objective—the survival of the industry. Without that the industry will face extinction with consequences which are too frightening to contemplate for the country's manufacturing potential, for certain areas and for a series of ancillary trades.

I am sorry to say that the Government's approach reveals that they do not understand the task or the seriousness of their responsibility. The Opposition have that awareness and we shall campaign with ceaseless vigour to ensure that the British shipbuilding industry survives for the future.

5.9 pm

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): We know that the purpose of the Bill is to increase from £1,200 million to £1,300 million the corporation's borrowing limit. We know that because my hon. Friend the Minister has told us so. I suppose that we could also discover the purpose by reading the Bill, but clause 1(1) runs to about 14 lines and contains a plethora of brackets. It is a feat to read that clause to oneself—out loud or in silence—and so ensure that the inflections, the brackets and finite verbs fall in the right place; but finally the subsection yields up its secrets. I think, in the end, I would have been able to find the answer without my hon. Friend telling me. I suspect that a bracket is missing from that subsection, but for the life of me I could not suggest where it should go. This is a drafting point—and perhaps as a lawyer it appeals to me—but that subsection is in a league of its own.

It has already been said—and it will no doubt be repeated—that this is a long-standing problem. In fairness, the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) did not suggest that it was anything but a long-standing problem. Some of the correspondence which I have received concerning the fate of the British merchant fleet suggests that it is an immediate problem. Correspondents argue that, because it is so immediate, it is the responsibility of the Government. From the right hon. and learned Gentleman's speech I detected a recognition of the fact that the problem goes back a great deal further and that it cannot be attributed to the Government. I certainly would not argue that, because it is not the responsibility of this Government, it is necessarily the responsibility of the previous Labour Government.

The lack of orders represents the problem of present overcapacity. Two years ago, the worldwide excess in shipping capacity reached 120 million DWT which represented an excess capacity of 30 per cent. in oil tankers, 22 per cent. in combined vessels, 20 per cent. in liners and 7 per cent. in container ships. That represented—no pun intended—the high-water mark. That situation has been partly ameliorated by the scrapping of capacity, but there is still an overcapacity of between 40 and 50 per cent. I agree with the right hon. and learned Gentleman that the solution to overcapacity will not emerge until the 1990s.

The problem facing the shipbuilding industry was recognised as long ago as 1975 by Mr. Eric Varley, the then Secretary of State for Industry, when he said:

"The prospects for shipyards throughout the world are bleaker than perhaps at any time during the past 20 years. The demand for new merchant ships, especially oil tankers, has slumped to almost nothing. Existing orders are currently being cancelled." —[Official Report, 2 December 1975; Vol. 901, c. 1460.]

In 1978, the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), in his capacity as Minister of State, Department of Industry, when introducing the shipbuilding redundancy payments scheme, said:

"shipbuilding industries all over the world are facing the inevitability of contraction and this country cannot isolate itself from that trend."—[Official Report, 16 January 1978; Vol. 942, c. 175.]

The Government and the previous Labour Government faced the consequences of a contraction of world trade. What can be done about that? My hon. Friend the Minister said what the Government will do to meet that threat. There must be two broad approaches in Government policy. One must try to stem the losses and the other maximise the potential. The Government committed themselves to returning to the private sector the warship building yards in an attempt to stem some of the losses. Since 1979 the Government have invested £1,449 million. One may argue whether that is too much or too little.

Some of the correspondence I have received has stressed that this country is worse off than other countries. Some argue that, therefore, the contraction in the merchant shipping industry is faced only by this country. If our performance was substantially worse than that of our competitors, it would be an accusation with which the Government would have to cope. However, when one studies the comparative state of affairs in the competitors' yards, it places our own position in perspective.

In 1984-85, British Shipbuilders won 1·7 per cent. of new orders compared with 1·8 per cent. in 1980-81. Japan's performance is often used to criticise ours, but its share of the world market fell from 54 per cent. in 1983-84 to 38 per cent. in 1984-85. Exports from Japanese shipyards have slumped to their lowest level since 1978, and there is no improvement in sight. The shipbuilding division of the large Hitachi Zozen combine was reported to be working at barely 60 per cent. of capacity at its six yards in March 1984. This month, the major Japanese shipbuilders reached an agreement to cut capacity by 20 per cent. during the next two years.

In 1975, Swedish yards employed 28,000 people, but by 1983 the figure was less than 8,000. The Kockums yard underwent severe restructuring, and in 1982 it turned consistent loss-making into a small profit.

Norway has only two ships of any real size on its order books and its yards gained little significant work during the year.

In West Germany, the new orders received in 1983 dropped from 4·4 per cent. to 2·4 per cent. In March 1984, the Financial Times reported that HDW had been forced to close its merchant shipbuilding yard in Hamburg and A G Weser, part of the Krupp group, had closed its large yard in Bremen, with the loss of 2,000 jobs.

France, however, after years of declining orders, has achieved success, but only with a massive injection of state aid. I am not trying to be contentious, but I think that most people would agree that the famous Polish shipping contract of the 1970s was not especially helpful. It was an example of getting business, provided that one was prepared to pay for it. France might have begun to go down a path which we have already been down.

The Government, through subsidies, have ploughed almost £1·5 billion into the shipbuilding industry. One may argue whether that is the right figure. I do not believe that the Minister would claim to be able to justify that figure to the nearest pound, but it is clear that an industry is not benefited simply by pouring money into it in the face of logic, the facts and world trends. It is no use pouring in money in an undisciplined way simply because one wants to protect the industry. If such a method saved industry, any Government would use it, but it does not. The Government are in the unenviable position of having to use a Solomon's touch. They must pluck out of thin air a sum which recognises what ought to be done and where the British industry stands in the world pattern.

Every week, I have to talk to my constituents about so-called cuts and the money that the Government have ploughed into a range of public services and undertakings —there is a substantial port in my area—but I have to tell them that there is a limit to how much can be ploughed in. Bearing in mind the world pattern and how we are faring, the money that the Government have put in is about right, although even my hon. Friend would not justify it to the last pound.

The Government's policy and financial input can be commended. The Bill is consistent with those elements. I understand that there will probably not be a Division. If we were pressed to a Division, I should have no trouble in supporting the Bill.

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): I was not sure what the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) was arguing except, perhaps, for the closure of the British merchant shipbuilding industry. As for Government expenditure and subsidy, I did not hear any of the hon. Gentleman's colleagues recommending earlier the closure of agriculture, which legitimately receives large sums of public money.

I am glad that we have the opportunity to discuss merchant shipbuilding, as much public attention has legitimately been given to the problems of naval shipyards and the auxiliary oiler replenishment vessel recently. As my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) said, the present crisis in British merchant shipbuilding could be terminal. We now have a rump of what the industry used to be. British Shipbuilders employs only about 10,000 people in merchant shipbuilding and, unless firm orders are obtained soon, about 4,000 of them will be made redundant by the end of the year and the rest will go during 1987. That is the extent of the crisis.

The Minister mentioned the 23,000 tonnes of orders that have been obtained in the past financial year. That should be compared to the 200,000 tonnes target. It is insignificant in terms of keeping the industry going. The lack of orders at my Govan yard is critical. Of course there is a world problem. Nobody is disputing that or suggesting that we can isolate ourselves, but some hon. Members tend to speak as though no orders are being placed. That is not so—13 million tonnes of shipping was ordered in 1985, of which we got 20,000 tonnes.

In 1984, rather more than 15 million tonnes was ordered and in 1983 19 million tonnes was ordered. The reduction is significant, but a substantial tonnage was available in 1985. Not all of it was available for tender by British Shipbuilders, however, for a variety of reasons, including the fact that many countries protect their industries. That makes competitive bidding by British Shipbuilders or other Western companies impossible.

The rundown of the Japanese and South Korean industries has been mentioned, but Japan still has an order book of 9·7 million tonnes as compared with Britain's 350,000, all of which is under construction and will run out in the next year or 18 months. South Korea has 4·7 million tonnes of orders. European industries might be more analogous to ours, but West Germany, Finland, Denmark, Italy and France all have fuller order books than us.

Describing the problem does not solve it, but it shows that we should not give up and believe that our industry must go into liquidation. There are orders about, but we have not got anything like enough of them. If the industry is to survive, we must exert more pressure than have any previous Government to ensure that such public sector ordering as there is is placed with British yards.

It is scandalous that any public sector organisation should place an order abroad. There was a danger a few years ago of a Central Electricity Generating Board order for three colliers going abroad. Only political pressure brought it back to the United Kingdom. It was placed with Govan Shipbuilders, which delivered all on time. Indeed, at least one collier was delivered ahead of the delivery date.

I noted what the Minister said about the intervention fund. It always seems absurd to go through the rigmarole of setting a limit to the fund and then not using the money because no orders come along. It would be much cheaper to provide some intervention fund assistance to obtain an order than to pay for a yard's rundown or for redundancy payments because orders are not obtained, to say nothing of the human, industrial and economic considerations.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Perhaps I can help the right hon. Gentleman. I said earlier that there is some flexibility in the intervention fund. British Shipbuilders has not approached us about flexibility for an order, but we are prepared to examine each case as it comes.

Mr. Millan: That is extremely helpful. Perhaps the Minister can also be helpful concerning credit terms. Like my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East, I noted what the Prime Minister said at a meeting in Newcastle last Friday.

I would like the Minister to say that the Government will guarantee that no orders will be lost by British Shipbuilders simply because of inadequate credit terms, and that if they can compete with international competitors in terms of price — with intervention fund assistance where necessary — delivery dates and technical specifications, they will not lose orders because of inadequate credit terms. If such a statement could be made, it would be very helpful in the context of this debate and in the context of the Govan yard, which is interested in the attempts that British Shipbuilders is making to obtain container ship orders from China and to obtain further ferry orders to add to the one that it is completing now.

I am not privy to those negotiations, nor am I presuming to say that the Government are or are not being helpful. I am making no criticism of or, for that matter, conferring praise on the Government. I should like the Minister to say that he recognises the importance of the orders, not only for the Govan yard but for merchant shipbuilding as a whole. He should give an assurance that British shipyards will not lose out on these and other orders because of a lack of adequate credit terms.

I mention the FSK 20/20 fleet support ship against the background of Govan shipyard. Its last order is the P and O ferry, which is due for launch in the autumn and for delivery in March 1987. After that, there in nothing on the order book. It is a tribute not only to the management but to the men at the yard that they have pledged themselves to meet the delivery dates although they are working themselves out of a job. I am sure that those pledges will be fulfilled. We desperately need another order, and although the FSK would not come within a time scale that would solve the immediate problem, it would be a considerable help to Govan shipbuilders and others.

Partly for reasons of time, and partly because of the merits of the matter, I do not wish to discuss the decision made last week between Harland and Wolff and Swan Hunter. Nor do I wish to suggest that the FSK is a straight substitute for the AOR as a fleet support vessel. It is not. One order has been given for the AOR, and the second will go to Swan Hunter if proper terms can be negotiated. I am looking beyond that. It is not clear to me, nor has it been made clear in the defence White Paper or in anything that the Secretary of State for Defence has said, why subsequent orders for fleet support vessels should have the many weapons and other defence equipment that are included in the AOR. I do not understand the defence justification, apart from anything else, for the Ministry's line. The figure quoted in newspapers for the AOR is £130 million. The FSK, which would do the job more than adequately without the weapons system involved, is being quoted by British Shipbuilders at £65 million to £75 million, which is almost half the price of the AOR.

I do not wish to compete, certainly not with my hon. Friends who are interested in the AOR, but there is a case for the FSK and I object to the fact that that case is not being properly considered by the Ministry of Defence. I hope that the Department of Trade and Industry will ensure that the case is properly considered by the Ministry of Defence. Unless it is, the chances of obtaining orders from foreign navies will be considerably reduced. This is an opportunity for the Government directly to underwrite the British merchant shipbuilding industry. I hope that they will take that opportunity and press the Ministry of Defence, as some Labour Members have already done, to consider positively the FSK 20/20. If they cannot give an undertaking to order the ship within the next year or two, will they at least express a genuine interest in it and ensure that it is considered as an alternative for the replacement of the Royal Naval Auxiliary fleet, which is aging and must be replaced in any case?

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): The right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) spoke with considerable experience and a strong constituency interest which is respected by hon. Members on both sides of the House. He has spoken previously about the need for support for the shipbuilding industry as part of a wider industrial strategy that he propounds, and he has always spoken with moderation and persuasion. At least some of his remarks will be taken on board by my hon. Friends at the Department of Trade and Industry. I could not agree with every aspect, but on finance, on which I hope to say a word in a moment, I share many of his sentiments.

Whether we represent shipbuilding constituencies or not, we all have a national interest in the survival and prosperity of this most important industry. During the past decade or more, there has been a welcome bipartisan approach towards investment in the shipbuilding industry, reflected largely by the significant investment of public dividend capital and in debt finance by successive Governments in what is now called British Shipbuilders and in the many companies that comprised that nationalised concern.

About £1 billion of public dividend capital has been invested by the Government, forming part of the £1·5 billion of total capital support, yet sadly this was during a period when British Shipbuilders lost an accumulated sum of about £650 million. It appears that the provision of capital, whether to write off losses or through "soft" state funding by put ·· lividend capital, has not been sufficient to halt the decline of this great industry or to fit it to take advantage of future opportunities. I wish to suggest modestly one or two ways in which we should help the industry to alleviate some of its problems.

Despite the despondent tone of much of the debate so far, there is reason to believe, nationally and internationally, that the shipbuilding industry can perhaps look forward to rather better times. None of us has an interest in trying to talk down the prospects of the industry or talk down the prospects for the market, unless there are demonstrable and immediately viable means of dissuading people. There are better prospects for world shipbuilding —first, because of the fall in the price of oil, which will be a circular trend. Although it may not maintain its low price, it will probably trade at lower real prices than it has historically.

This will have two major advantages. First, it should increase the traffic of oil internationally, and oil comprises a significant part of maritime trade; secondly, oil as a constituent cost of transport will be significantly reduced. When we recall that a major reason for the decline in shipping internationally and, therefore, to a large extent, in shipbuilding, was the rapid and large increase in the price of oil, it is not unreasonable to expect that a converse movement might engender some revival.

Secondly, there are better prospects because the fall in interest costs nationally and internationally should create not only a more viable world economy in which transport, including ships, may be ordered, but greater economic activity in those countries and lower costs of financing which will make new orders more viable. I believe—although it is more speculation than prophesy—that the price of commodities internationally, which is exceedingly low, will increase. I do not know whether it will move up rapidly, but the demand for international commodities of all sorts — minerals and foodstuffs — will rise. These form a significant part of the cargo markets and might be expected to bring about a revival in "world scale" charter rates and, after a revival in the charter of older shipping, a revival in demand for new cargo and general vessels.

As many hon. Members have said, there has been a fall in Europe in capacity for shipbuilding and there has also been a fall in Japan and elsewhere. This fall in capacity, combined with the much more streamlined and technologically efficient shipyards that are currently competing against each other, will provide a firmer basis on which to attract new orders. When one looks at some of the major customers for ships and sees the extent to which new build forms a large proportion of their fleets, one can say with a little confidence that there are better prospects for the future.

One of the largest shipping companies in the world is the Worldwide Shipping Company which is registered in Hong Kong. The majority of its shipping fleet is less than five years old. The fleet owned by that company is bigger than the whole of the British merchant shipping fleet. If one takes that into account and assesses the extent to which such companies will look to international shipbuilders to replace their fleets, it is clear that there will be a demand for new build. Our aim must be to go out with renewed vigour and perhaps more imagination, with Government and industry working hand in hand more closely than hitherto to try to get a share of that cake.

With great modesty, I should like to suggest five ways in which we might move forward. I hope they will commend themselves to my hon. Friend and to hon. Members. The first and I am sure the single most important factor that will assist the revival, continuity and survival of the industry is ship finance. That is the key. Whatever we may say about labour practices, quality, dates of delivery, heritage and so on—important as they all are—when one comes down to it, it is the cost and the extent to which purchasers, including Governments, are accountable to others for the purchases they make that are important. Customers should be able to undertake purchases at the lowest competitive levels of finance.

The lower interest rates currently prevailing provide a welcome opportunity. On previous occasions I have argued for them to be lowered even more and for the Government, as far as they can, to influence the rates in this direction. That is the single most important factor that will create a more competitive opportunity for British Shipbuilders. We should look more pragmatically and imaginatively at the way in which British Shipbuilders tenders for orders. It should consider the extent to which it is allowed, within the rules of the game, to front-end load the interest costs within the price of a ship as opposed to the extent to which it costs the ship quite separately from the interest. In Britain, tendering is done honourably and correctly, but some other countries are far more inclined to offer an exceedingly low rate of interest, whereas the real interest cost is to a large extent absorbed within the capital price that is tendered for the ship.

The home purchase scheme and preferential interest rates through ship mortgage finance have been helpful, as has the aid and trade provision, in providing low-cost ship finance. Although it is on the fringes of this matter, we should look imaginatively at barter deals. Such deals, especially given the movement of oil in recent years, provide a tripartite opportunity—as do all barter deals between countries—to British Shipbuilders to get orders at viable prices, but the liability against a fall in the value of the commodities bartered is shared by others.

It is essential that we have competitive and more stable rates of exchange that will enable us to tender internationally. As a small part of such a policy we should be members of the European monetary system. We should be able to tender in foreign currencies with a guarantee by the Britsh Government that any variation from the exchange rate basis on which a tender is made will be met by Government. I should like my hon. Friend to explore ways in which this can be done within GATT and other rules.

Public sector orders, about which something has been said, should be far more related in future than they have been in the past to the export potential of the ships. The warship sector is a prime example. Under successive Governments, the types of ship ordered by the Royal Navy have not been suitable for export markets. In the merchant sector, the success some years ago of the SD14 as an off-the-shelf ship is an example of the way in which we should be buying ships in the public sector that have export potential.

Although my hon. Friend said that British Shipbuilders is specialising much more than it has done in the past, there are dangers in specialising in the offshore oil industry; those dangers arise because of the reasons I enunciated earlier. Although British Shipbuilders should concentrate in a specialised sector of the market, in future it should also emphasise its capability in other technological sectors not involving energy or offshore exploration.

The marketing policy of British Shipbuilders should be much more imaginative than it has been in the past. I should like to quote one example, and here I declare an interest. One of the companies that I advise is seeking to assist a middle eastern country in the development of its fisheries industry. To that end I contacted Ferguson-Ailsa to obtain information about its capability in that field. The company sent a brochure about the ships it builds. I had no further communication from the company about the inquiry, but I have been bombarded for months by Nordic interests which have this very day sent a delegation to the countries concerned to explore the opportunities. The Nordic export project fund is state and industry-financed in Scandinavia and is out to get business not only for its shipbuilding industry but for its engineering and manufacturing industries. It acts as a vanguard for many export companies.

The Department of Trade and Industry and British Shipbuilders should renew their efforts to follow up inquiries for projects abroad and inquiries about ways in which they can work with others in turnkey projects to assist in the provision of vessels. In these and in other ways, but most of all in the provision of preferential finance, much can be done to ensure that British Shipbuilders takes better advantage of any future upturn than it has done in the past. To the extent that the Bill provides it with the wherewithal, I welcome this primary legislation and the terms in which my hon. Friend moved the Second Reading.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): Like the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson), I do not represent a shipbuilding constituency but I share his belief that the progress and development of shipbuilding is important to the whole of Britain. I listened with interest to his rather optimistic views about the potential for shipbuilding, but in his speech I failed to detect a sense of the urgency of the matter. Unless there is some sign that his optimism is to be quickly justified, there will not be the capacity to pick up the orders when they are available.

Like other hon. Members, I have no wish to oppose the increased capital finance that the Bill will make available. I should like to encourage a greater ability to invest in other spheres of service and industry where it is within the Government's power to do so. It seems a shame that we look at minor details and minor areas rather than at the whole area of Government spending. Set against the background of decisions in shipbuilding, which at best puzzle and at worst embitter those involved, it is important to appreciate the problems of people who are struggling to survive in the industry.

The borrowing powers for British Shipbuilders need to be increased in the context of fair treatment rather than in the context of backing up the myth that there is free and open competition in the industry. If warship operations are rather more profitable than merchant shipbuilding, it is important to realise that it is essentially orders from Governments that provide that extra profit, and there is no point in trying to represent that as fair and free private competition. It would have been far more acceptable to me and my hon. Friends if at the same time as introducing the Bill to increase the borrowing powers of British Shipbuilders the Minister had been able to announce an earlier start date for the next AOR vessel and a definite offer to Swan Hunter. Even more acceptable would have been an announcement that an order for a type 23 frigate was to be placed with Swan Hunter.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): The hon. Gentleman has referred to the AOR vessel, which, strictly speaking, goes outside the bounds of the Bill. However, will he explain what Liberal party policy is on the issue?

Mr. Meadowcroft: It was made clear last week by the Liberal spokesman that the order for the next AOR vessel should be placed on Tyneside, and that the order should be accelerated.

I do not know whether this is associated with lack of capital, but it appears that British Shipbuilders has got rid of its computing capacity by passing it over to Hoskins, which has declared redundancies. Some of those who have been made redundant will not have the rights that would have accrued to them if they had stayed with British Shipbuilders. This might be a small matter, but it is important to those who are involved. The capacity to maintain cash flow should be examined.

I hope that the Minister will dispel the fear that increased capital capacity is being made available so that certain sections of the shipbuilding industry can be fattened up for privatisation. Against the backround of fairly general acceptance of what the Bill seeks to do, I hope that the Minister will give the House an assurance that investment is not taking place with a view to selling off sectors of the industry in future.

5.53 pm

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): The presence in the Chamber of five Members from the north-east bears witness to the importance of shipbuilding for Tyneside, Teesside and Wearside. There is no better illustration of the Government's industrial policy than the Bill. It is modest in size but it will be huge in cost. The Bill is a good example of the Government's pragmatism and of the dogmatic empiricism which seems to envelop the Department of Trade and Industry these days.

Ministerial support is to be extended again and Exchequer subsidy is to be increased. When the Bill is fully implemented, the borrowing limit of British Shipbuilders will have been raised five times in four years during this Parliament. The 1979 and 1981 measures raised the borrowing limit five times in the four years between 1979 and 1983. The Government started with a borrowing limit of about £200 million and we are now approaching a borrowing limit of £1,400 million. As my hon. Friend the Minister has said, progress has been made. British Shipbuilders has been streamlined and its management continues to be improved to stem the huge financial losses that BS suffered in the late 1970s and early 1980s and belatedly to improve productivity and working practices, which require improvement throughout the industry.

Since the last major debate on a Bill of this sort, which took place in November 1984, and in which I was fortunate enough to participate, streamlining has taken place. Warship and other yards have gone, including Brooke Marine, Yarrow, Vosper Thornycroft, Hall Russell, Vickers and Swan Hunter. I believe that British Shipbuilders is in better shape now than it was. Parts of it have been released to the private sector and the losses involved in running the corporation have been reduced. It is to the credit of the Government that that has been achieved against a grim and deteriorating international background. It is to the credit also of the retiring chairman of British Shipbuilders, Graham Day. We should put on record the debt that the industry and the Government owe to Graham Day for the work that he has done.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will agree that we are a long way from the heady days of 1979 when his predecessor's predecessor was quoted as saying:

"We are prepared to put public funds, for a two-year period, behind the industry's own efforts to achieve viability." — [Official Report, 23 July 1979; Vol. 971, c. 43.]

We are even a long way from July 1983, when my hon. Friend's predecessor told the House:

"We cannot afford to go on subsidising shipbuilding with these losses."—[Official Report, 28 July; Vol. 46, c. 1356.]

When my hon. Friend replies, I hope that the will give us a clearer glimpse of the medium and longer-term prospects than he was able to do in his necessarily short speech on moving the Second Reading. The taxpayer at least would like to know whether the end of these losses is in sight.

It would be wrong not to say something about last week's announcement about the AOR order, which is relevant to the Bill. My hon. Friend the Minister will know that the Government's decision, sensible as it appeared in London, was disappointing to those on Tyneside. However, there are lessons that Tyneside can learn from the decision. It must recognise that it must be preferable when it comes to price and design. If the tender from Harland and Wolff was as competitive as it was made out to be, a couple of questions at least deserve to be answered. Is warship procurement based on the old principle of Buggins' turn? Will the various Departments that are involved in procurement policy genuinely evaluate on a competitive basis the bids that they receive?

Secondly, what is the implication for a yard such as Harland and Wolff and the other yards that are covered by the Bill that still receive public funds? I asked last week whether, if the bid was as competitive as it was made out to be, my hon. Friend the Minister had any plans to privatise Harland and Wolff. I did not get an answer to that question, nor did I receive an answer to a question which I put before Easter, in which I observed that the subsidy for industry and employment in Northern Ireland is about 404 per cent. higher per head than that for England. I think that we deserve answers to these questions.

The Government can be accused of many things, and my hon. Friend the Minister may or may not have been right in his forecasts and his description of the state of the industry. He may well be open to criticism from Opposition Members about the pace and evenness of the privatisation programme. In this debate, however, he cannot be accused of a failure to support British Shipbuilders. A total of £1·5 billion has been committed since 1979. That is a massive investment by the long-suffering taxpayer. It is no fault of the Government that it is not yet clear exactly how much of a return we are likely to see on it.

Mr. Ted Garrett (Wallsend): It is my misfortune in life always to speak in debates on the problems of industry. I look forward to the day when I can speak about industrial and commercial problems with a success story behind us. During the years that I have represented my constituency I have had to talk about decline in the coal, machine tool, steel, fishing and civil engineering industries.

I am by nature an optimist but I am only now starting to recover from the bitter disappointment of Swan Hunter not obtaining the AOR contract, which was awarded to Harland and Wolff. Despite all the words that have been uttered and all the words that have been put into print, the people of Tyneside still feel a sense of bitter resentment. They are still unconvinced that the decision was not political because they have not had any figures to convince them otherwise that the order was gained by Harland and Wolff on a purely commercial basis. I should like the Minister for Trade to give us the figures to show the true realisation of the price difference. I doubt whether the independent accountants had the time to go into the subsidy question or to produce the accurate figures that are alleged to have been the decisive factor.

My memory of shipbuilding goes back many years. Even when I was a young man in the union, I was dealing with shipbuilding matters. In the Aircraft and Shipbuilding Industries Act 1977, some of us from the trade union side rather naively thought that we were doing Harland and Wolff a favour by wanting to incorporate it under the British shipbuilding flag. We were politely told by the then Government that Harland and Wolff would be better left out of the Act because it would receive higher grants and allowances. Later on, in some quiet manner, Harland and Wolff came under the Act, and so could receive subsidies.

Harland and Wolff has two forms of subsidy. I deny any bias when I say that the managing director of Harland and Wolff, whom I consider to be an astute man, a good shipbuilder and a man respected in British Shipbuilders, has put a deal together in which he has blended both the subsidies to get the correct figure. He will deny this, but underneath it all there remains the argument, given to me by senior management and independent people not employed in the shipbuilding industry, that it was physically impossible for the alleged £5 million difference to be on a strict commercial basis.

I congratulate my hon. Friends and Conservative Members on the way in which they have fought for Swan Hunter. It was a long and bitter campaign. Oddly enough, I also wish to congratulate the Department of Trade and Industry. It was a slow starter in seeing the nature of the problem, but when it had grasped it, it fought for its corner, although it could not win. The odds were against it in Cabinet, in Cabinet Committees and in ministerial committees. It was against the Minister of Defence, the Secretary of State for Scotland and, some would say, the Prime Minister. I have my doubts about that. I think that on this occasion she was in a minority. That is purely my instinct. I am not privy to her inner thoughts, and I doubt whether I ever shall be. However, to be fair, she listened carefully and intently to my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) and me. I am fully convinced that she did not understand the full nature of the problem until that meeting, but she carried out some rethinking of policy after it.

We cannot carry on being bitter and negative about what has happened. As has already been said, we must do something even at this black moment for British Shipbuilders. I do not believe that the industry will disappear. I do not think that that is the Government's will. However, I wish that some more initiative and imagination were shown. I am not blaming only the Government—past Governments have been responsible for the lack of the imagination that this country, as a maritime nation, should be adopting. We let passenger liner business go out at the time when the signs were that passenger liner business was increasing. It is now a booming business, but we are out of the industry. We should have a more strategic plan for our defence programme. It cannot go on in stops and starts and booms and slumps. If we have a truly national defence programme, orders should balance out better.

I still believe in the British shipbuilding industry and I believe that we can remain a maritime nation, but the imagination must come from a variety of sources. It must come from confidence in the industry and in the shipowners, and, above all, from the confidence of this place. It is here in the House of Commons that such confidence should start, and it must start now.

Mr. Bob Clay (Sunderland, North): One of the extraordinary things about this debate is that a similar debate may not be held next year, as many hon. Members have already said. We are facing the possibility of the end of merchant shipbuilding in this country by the end of this year or early next year. The Minister was remarkably complacent about that. I bitterly resent one or two, but not all, of the Conservative speeches about the Government pouring money into British shipbuilding. Let me put the record straight, using the same calculations as those used by the Minister about aggregating public money upwards since 1979. He talked about £1,449 million going to British shipbuilding. However, Ministry of Agriculture subsidies for the farming industry are at £5,538 million. Until the Government take account of that, we should not hear anything about over-generosity towards shipbuilding. The Government have to decide whether they want a British shipbuilding industry.

The Government have orders within their gift. It was amazing to hear the Prime Minister explain to me and to trade union colleagues on Friday morning that the irradiated fuel vessel order had gone to Japan because much of the trade that will be carried by the vessel is Japanese—in my view, that is Japan dumping its waste on this country, but nevertheless orders are orders. It seems extraordinary that the Japanese Government can not only oblige its shipowners to buy Japanese but can oblige British shipowners to buy Japanese if they want to trade with Japan. If the Government took a lesson out of the Japanese book, we should not be discussing these problems tonight.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) has already spoken about the FSK20/20. There was a surprising lack of understanding, which is now on the record, between the Department of Trade and Industry and the Ministry of Defence. It is clear that British Shipbuilders and the Admiralty had some misunderstanding about the vessel. It is incredible that British Shipbuilders was allowed to spend £250,000 on research and development and that people from the Admiralty went in and out talking about fine detail, only for the Government to say that they did not want the ship.

It is extraordinary how the Department of Trade and Industry does not seem to have impressed on the Ministry of Defence the significant effect on export orders and other factors that the development of this ship could have. The new corporate plan for British Shipbuilders saw the FSK as something central, and it will now have to be rewritten. It is tragic that the Department of Trade and Industry did not explain long ago to the Ministry of Defence the significance of the ship.

The Government should now do something about soft credit. Neither I nor my colleagues who were with me on Friday morning have any doubt that the Prime Minister said that the Government had looked at this and would take a different attitude. I have no doubt that she said specifically that, with the exception of Japan, from now on, orders would not be lost to this country because of inadequate credit arrangements. The words "soft loans" and other such terms were used.

It is no good the Government saying that that is not a change of policy. One can point to specific orders from Ethiopia, Yugoslavia and other countries which have been lost by British Shipbuilders during the past couple of years simply because of the credit package. The intervention fund is important, but we know that even if the total base price is lower, if another country offers better credit facilities, such as a moratorium on payments, lower interest rates, or longer repayment periods, Third world countries in particular will place their orders with it. We have lost orders because of that.

If the Government would do what the Prime Minister clearly undertook to do on Friday morning, with the exception of Japan, which is to be prepared to offer credit packages to undercut all competition, it would be possible to place orders in British yards. It should also be possible to force British shipowners to place orders with British yards. We hear a great deal of talk about the world recession, but if all the orders placed by British shipowners last year had been placed in British shipyards, they would have more than filled the capacity of British yards, despite the world recession.

I should like the Minister when he replies to answer my question about intervention fund money. In an intervention in the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan), he said that so far British Shipbuilders has not asked for any special arrangements. I have heard that before, and if it is the case, what is he doing about it? It seems incredible that we have been losing orders because of finance, yet he says that British Shipbuilders has never asked the Government to apply special arrangements. We should not have been praising Graham Day tonight, but damning the man for the butcher that he was. If he or his successor are so incompetent that they have never knocked on the door of special arrangements at the Department of Trade and Industry, it is they who should have been sacked long ago, instead of the thousands in the industry who have been dismissed. Why have they not considered the special arrangements that the Government offer?

I know that people are worried about many areas, but I make no apology for spelling out to the Government the wider context. British Shipbuilders provides 3,100 jobs in my constituency in Sunderland. No one disputes that every job in the industry supports three outside it. Twelve thousand jobs in the area are already at stake. Male unemployment is already running at 45 per cent., 50 per cent. and 55 per cent. in large areas around the river. The loss of those jobs, even on the Government's calculations, which are a fiddle, would cost the Government £72 million a year. That is the cost to the Government in Sunderland alone by the closure of Sunderland Shipbuilders and Austin and Pickersgill. That does not include the human cost of misery and despair, and the decay of the town.

Little time remains, and orders must be placed in both yards within the next few weeks. When the Prime Minister named the Stena Seawell on Friday, she praised the management and the work force. She said that the whole of Britain could be proud of the achievement in Sunderland, and what a marvellous yard it was. In the past she said the same about the Austin and Pickersgill yard. We shall remember those words, and expect that if she takes time to come to the north-east and praise the yards, her next step will be to find orders for them so that they will not close by the end of this year.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): I remind my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay) that the Prime Minister has on a number of occasions praised the National Health Service, yet we all know what she has done to it. The explanatory and financial memorandum states:

"The Bill will have no effect on public service manpower."

That is because there is little public sector manpower left in the shipbuilding industry. When the shipbuilding industry was nationalised in 1977, there were almost 83,000 employees, but this year there are fewer than 10,000. Therefore, I understand why that was stated.

The Minister said that British Shipbuilders had received £235 million in intervention funding and £177 million for redundancies. I assume that most of the other money that it has received has been invested in the warship building yards, which have been sold to the private sector.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) has left the Chamber. In a previous debate he referred to Redheads shipyard, which is in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark). He stated:

"Redheads in particular is more than simply a commercial success. I hope that all hon. Members would wish it to be a commercial success in a hostile ship repair environment. It is also a shining example to the rest of the industry, not simply the repair industry, of the much more flexible approach that is required in working practices, entrepreneurship and by going out across the continent of Europe to market one's product." — [Official Report, 27 November 1984; Vol. 68, c. 862.]

Redheads ship repairers, in which many workers invested their redundancy pay, is now bankrupt. Those workers have lost both their redundancy pay and their jobs. That shows the effect of privatisation.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): The House will recollect that on many occasions I was attacked across the Chamber for advising those workers not to put their hard-earned money into that foolhardy venture. My hon. Friend will recollect that those men were encouraged actively to do that by the Conservative party, the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon), and, indeed, the then Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry the hon. Member for Kingston-upon-Thames (Mr. Lamont), who opened the yard. Does my hon. Friend agree that, as the matter is still sub judice, there should be a committee of inquiry into the events surrounding the establishment and collapse of that company?

Mr. Dixon: I certainly agree with my hon. Friend. Many of those men are particularly worried by the lack of information they received about the company going bankrupt.

We shall not oppose the Bill. It has often been said that nobody wants to shoot a one-legged Father Christmas. At least this debate gives us an opportunity to discuss the many major problems facing the British shipbuilding industry today, and the men who have invested their lives in it. The Government should present a more positive approach in these days of crisis for the industry.

The relationship between British shipowners and the industry is vital in terms of the need for home orders. British shipyards have been largely dependent on home owners in the post-war period. Unfortunately, the number of orders placed by British owners in British yards has declined considerably since the early 1960s. Between 1962 and 1966 an average of 67 per cent. of tonnage was home produced. Between 1967 and 1971 that figure collapsed to 32 per cent., and between 1972 and 1976 a mere 28 per cent. of British tonnage was built in British yards. Indeed, the Booz-Allen report, which was published in 1973, found few established links between British owners and British builders. That is in stark contrast to Japan where there is a close link between owners, builders, banks and the Government. Not one domestic order has been placed outside Japan since 1947. Everyone knows that Korea builds cheaper ships than Japan, yet Japanese shipowners always build their ships in domestic yards. It is a pity that British shipowners do not follow the same policy.

The General Council of British Shipping has made some proposals to the Secretary of State regarding the Budget debate. One suggestion is that there should be roll-over relief for balancing charges. That would enable funds from the disposal of a ship to be set off against the cost of a replacement vessel which would encourage shipowners to build more ships, hopefully, in British yards. When the Minister meets his European colleagues, I hope that he will discuss the scrap and build scheme. European community countries have debated that since 1977, but nothing has happened. To create orders to keep a viable shipbuilding industry in Britain, it is imperative to have a scrap and build scheme, even if it is conducted unilaterally.

The state of the industry report, which was published in February this year by British Shipbuilders, was a doom and gloom report. It pointed out that the target for 1985-86 was 203,000 compensated gross tonnage, but, by the end of January British Shipbuilders had secured only 18,000 CGT, which was less than 9 per cent. of the target, and expected to achieve 70,000 CGT. However, as the Minister has pointed out, it did not achieve that tonnage.

My right hon. and hon. Friends have referred to other parts of the British shipbuilding industry. That makes dismal reading, but I do not want to go into it because of the time constraints. Last delivery dates are as follows: Austin and Pickersgill, November 1986; Govan, March 1987; Smith's Dock, December 1986; Sunderland Shipbuilders, February 1987; Appledore, March 1987; Ferguson-Ailsa in Port Glasgow, May 1986; Ferguson-Ailsa in Troon, September 1986; and Clark Kincaid, October 1987. The comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, North are true. Unless the Government take immediate steps to help the industry, there will be no shipbuilding debate this time next year, because there will be no shipbuilding industry.

The trade unions have made enormous sacrificies in tackling the shipbuilding industry's problems. Thousands of jobs have been axed and the remaining workers have faced periods of great insecurity. Bitterness and disillusionment shroud the industry. Most of the yards to which we are referring and which are shedding labour are in areas of high unemployment.

I should like to refer to Swan Hunter, although I appreciate that the Bill has nothing to do with naval works. My hon. Friend the Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett) has mentioned that yard, and I have no doubt that my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) will do the same, if he catches your eye, Mr. Speaker. Therefore, I do not want to dwell too long on it. The argument on placing the AOR orders—the Harland and Wolff design has been accepted — shows how resources can be wasted if the shipbuilding industry is split up. Swan Hunter's design team of 420 which is designing the AORs and Harland and Wolff's design team which is working for the Ministry of Defence are working against each other. That is what happens when the industry is split up. Swan Hunter has a first-class team, but unfortunately, because of the wastage of resources, it will have to go.

I have a letter from the Ministry of Defence referring to orders for the third, fourth and fifth of the type 23. An article this morning in the Financial Times refers to a cut in the defence budget of £3 billion over the next three years. The article states:

"However, a prime target for cuts will be the Navy's shipbuilding programme, which seems certain to fall short of the Government's stated target of three new warship orders a year. This will mean delays to the new Type 23 frigate, as well as, possibly, to the building of conventionally powered submarines."

Swan Hunter has not only lost the order for the AORs but stands little chance of getting the order for the type 23 frigate if the Government carry out their cuts in the defence programme.

The men at Swan Hunter were led up the garden path. Every worker received a copy of the document issued by the management when it was considering a buy-out. It states:

"This morning a meeting took place at which the team negotiating for the purchase of the company met trade union representatives from all groups of employees, including fulltime officials, for the purpose of announcing their intentions for the company.

To set aside your concerns and worries about future prospects and job security, we can confirm the following statement was made:—

All existing employees will be kept on."

No sooner had the management buy-out taken place than it was talking about a crisis and possibly closing if the orders were not received. People in the shipbuilding industry have faced that problem for a considerable time. Since 1979 when the Conservative party was elected to government, there has been insecurity, redundancies and closure of yards. Unless the Government do something about that, Britain will be the only maritime nation that does not have a shipbuilding or ship repairing capability to service our fleets. I hope that the Minister, when he stops talking to the Government Whip, will take some notice of the shipbuilding industry and the suggestions of my right hon. and hon. Friends. Much more could be said about the industry, but I shall conclude to allow my hon. Friends time to speak.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind hon. Members that the first of the Front-Bench speakers will seek to rise at 6.40 pm. I hope that the Minister and the spokesman for the Opposition will have time to speak in that time.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I shall take your words on board, Mr. Speaker.

It is always of considerable regret when British maritime interests place orders for vessels in south-east Asia. I recall the Scottish shipping line, the Benn Line, placing an order with Daewoo of South Korea for a bulk carrier and a semi-submersible rig. About 18 months ago, Trinity House ordered a lighthouse from south-east Asia. Such orders reflect what the annual report of Lloyd's Register of Shipping called the "unassailable" position occupied by south-east Asian shipbuilding nations.

I support the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) on the intervention fund. The fund must be used flexibly and imaginatively. I was pleased to hear the Minister's intervention. We need a domestic scrap-and-build programme. I have argued in the House and elsewhere that if we want a motto it should be, "Build British and sail British."

Because we now have a single company, North-Eastern Shipbuilders, in north-east England, I wonder whether the board of British Shipbuilders has similar plans for its yards, and Clark Kincaid on Clydeside.

The debate takes place against the depressing backcloth of decline in the European shipbuilding industry. This dreich state is seen at its depressing worst on Clydeside. My constituency has been badly damaged by scandalously high unemployment, with 26 per cent. male unemployment and more than 1,000 people out of work. The Government must act to halt the continuing decline in shipbuilding and in marine engineering.

I shall refer to constituency interests. I urge the House to ignore the remarks of the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson) about Ferguson-Ailsa, a yard in my constituency. That yard has a first-class approach to marketing its skills and services. I resent ill-founded criticism of that yard, which is struggling mightily. Clark Kincaid, which is in my constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett), is the last marine engine builder of any size on the Clyde and the Tyne. Not long ago the company was praised by Cunard for the quality and delivery date of the engine built for the Atlantic Conveyor, which was to replace the vessel of that name sunk in the Falklands war. Clark Kincaid is building two small medium-speed land engines for the Cayman Islands and two marine engines—a Sulzer and a BW engine. It is crucial to maintain that marine engineering capacity.

The Minister mentioned Ferguson-Ailsa of Port Glasgow and Troon. He said that the yards were building several small vessels. I shall be slightly more accurate than that. At Port Glasgow the yard is completing the second of two anchor-handling vessels for the Canadian Arctic oil industry. The yard at Troon is shortly to finish the second of two offshore supply vessels for Seaforth Maritime. In addition, a research vessel for the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is being constructed. Those two yards —Port Glasgow and Troon—are under the Ferguson-Ailsa title. They have some 700 employees. They are first-class specialist yards which are desperately short of orders. Clark Kincaid is a first-class outfit. It has excellent industrial relations and a high quality of work. I confidently expect Ferguson-Ailsa to win the order for a new fisheries protection vessel, which is to be placed soon by the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland. That is in line with what was said by my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan). It is essential that the state, public utilities and public corporations place their orders with our yards. Once the fisheries protection vessel is launched, it will patrol the Scottish fishing grounds on behalf of the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland.

In its recent report on fisheries protection the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs urged the Scottish Office to place the order with a Scottish yard. That yard should and must be Ferguson-Ailsa. It has designed the vessel, it built the previous vessel for the fisheries protection service and should build this one.

I shall make my final quick points as I am conscious that my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) wishes to speak.

This is an important issue in Scotland at the moment. Within the next 12 weeks Caledonian-MacBrayne will announce the placing of an order for a 1,000-passenger car ferry. It is to be used for the Hebridean islands service. I would like to say to Mr. Colin Patterson, the chief executive, and the board members of the Scottish Transport Group that that order must be placed with a Scottish yard. Again I say, declaring a constituency interest, that that yard should be Ferguson-Ailsa. It has built vessels before for Caledonian-MacBrayne and it should be given this order.

It is essential, of course, that Ferguson-Ailsa submits a sensible and competitive tender and I have no doubt that it will do so. However, Mr. Patterson and his colleagues must remember that they are employed to provide a service for their Scottish customers — the people who travel among the islands and between the mainland and the islands. Those passengers and the overwhelming majority of Scots want the vessel to be built in a Scottish yard.

My final comment concerns Scott Lithgow, formerly owned by British Shipbuilders and now owned by Trafalgar House. It, too, is a yard which is grievously short of work. It now has a first-class industrial relations record with an excellent quality of work.

I am given to understand that the shipping company, ACL, plans, in the near future, to extend five of its vessels. Naturally, I sincerely hope that that work is carried out in the United Kingdom. I do not want to see the work go to West Germany where the QE2 is heading for its refit and re-engining. If the work for ACL is to be done in the United Kingdom, why not at Scott Lithgow? Trafalgar House has a major stake in ACL—25 per cent. of the equity I believe. On the basis of demanding work for British and Scottish yards, I urge Sir Nigel Broackes and his colleagues to recommend to ACL that the work be undertaken by Scott Lithgow. It is essential that British maritime interests place their orders with British yards. They are two sides of the same coin.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) for curtailing his speech so that I can make a short contribution.

I endorse the remarks made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith). He said that the privatisation of the warship building yards was lunacy, because the profits from that could have made a contribution to the very matters we are discussing today. However, the Government would not get very fat on the £5 million that they apparently got for Swan Hunter when it was privatised. If the terms and conditions and full extent of the deal were so fair to the managers and owners of Swan Hunter, I ask the Minister whether his Department would be prepared to buy it back if the owners wished to sell it to them. Will he address that point in his reply?

The moneys referred to in the Bill cover the question of redundancy payments. The yards which have been privatised out of British Shipbuilders are no longer covered by the redundancy payments scheme. It was felt, of course, that they would not need redundancy payments because there was work for them to get. That is not turning out to be the case for Swan Hunter. The workers face the possibility of being made redundant on terms substantially less favourable than for those who accepted voluntary redundancy a year and two years ago. The responsibility is the Government's, not that of the private owners of the yard. Is the Minister willing to make any sort of financial contribution towards the relief of that set of circumstances that the Government have done so much to bring about?

Both Cammell Laird and Swan Hunter are mixed yards. They have been forced to become warship yards and have been promised work as well. Swan Hunter, at least, still has an eye towards trying to obtain some merchant orders. In his introduction the Minister referred to intervention funding and to looking at individual work on a case-by-case basis. If Swan Hunter is to survive at all, I understand that there is an outside possibility of it still obtaining merchant work. Can we come to see the Minister and have its case discussed on a case-by-case basis? It is not taking work from any other shipyard; it is tendering for it because of its specialist nature. Is the Minister's door open to Swan Hunter, or will merchant orders be subsidised on a case-by-case basis for those yards that the Minister has designated as merchant yards and yards, such as Swan Hunter, which used to do merchant work, will be out of it altogether?

My hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) referred to the special subsidy arrangements at Harland and Wolff, as did the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon). They made the point that there are substantially more yards than work. Is it true that the subsidy arrangements mean that Harland and Wolff will always have a competitive edge and that it will always be there when mainland British merchant yards are struggling without the same financial support? How will the Minister allay that fear? How will he demonstrate to those who represent not only warship yards, such as those I represent, but those who represent merchant yards that somehow Harland and Wolff will not always have a competitive edge because it always has more subsidy than is provided for mainland Britain? That is certainly a real fear on Tyneside, and the Minister should allay it not just by assurances but by being able to demonstrate that there is no such subsidy.

Tyneside is not trying to take work from other communities. We just want to be treated fairly. We do not want the work that our community should have taken and put elsewhere. We feel that the AOR was taken for political reasons and placed in Belfast. The type 22 frigate went to Cammell Laird; it should have come to us. There was a £9 million cost for the British taxpayer. There was a promise of the type 23 frigate to make up for that, and that is now two years overdue.

If the Government are serious about seeing Swan Hunter and shipbuilding survive on the Tyne, the Minister, who has direct responsibility because he sold the yard into the private sector, should discuss with his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence when those promised orders will be committed and how the assurances that the Government have given to the people of Tyneside will be upheld. The suspicion on Tyneside is that those promises will not be upheld.

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): While, technically, the debate has been about the extension of British Shipbuilders' borrowing powers, it has also been, rightly and properly, about the contraction of the industry, the risk to jobs, the threat to established skills, and the fears and needs of the shipbuilding communities up and down the country. It has been about the problems of Sunderland, which were mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay). It has one of the highest unemployment rates in the country. The industry faces closure if no new orders are found before the end of the year. The skills of the workers were praised by the Prime Minister on Friday but now they face the prospect of closure and of a rundown of the industry if the Government do nothing. The debate has also been about the problems of Govan and Greenock, where no new orders are yet available and where, additionally, jobs will be lost, and unemployment in an area of high unemployment will rise.

The debate has also been about the problems of the north-east. I congratulate my hon. Friends the Members for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown), for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) and for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett) on the campaign that they have mounted for orders for Swan Hunter. It seems remarkable that, when a yard is denationalised, orders and jobs dematerialise almost overnight. The Minister should tell us what his Department will do to persuade the Ministry of Defence to speed up the promised orders for type 23 and the second AOR so that jobs can be saved and retained at Swan Hunter in the north-east.

When we have already suffered a halving of the capacity of the shipbuilding industry over the past seven years, when, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) said, 48,000 jobs have been lost throughout the shipbuilding and ship repairing industry, when we have only 2 per cent. of world orders for merchant shipbuilding at the moment, and when the retiring chairman of British Shipbuilders, who was praised by Conservative Members, has said clearly that the industry is facing a bare-knuckle fight for survival, and fears that the merchant shipbuilding industry could go exactly the same way as the motor cycle industry, the question is not the generalities raised by Conservative Members in their lengthy speeches, but what the Government are doing. The question is what they will do through their public purchasing powers, activities to secure proper intervention fund support, and the development of packages that can beat the rest of the world by ensuring the maintenance and continuation of our merchant fleet. What will the Government do to prevent a catastrophic rundown in the merchant shipping industry over the next year, and to prevent a decline that could lead to the disappearance of the industry as a whole?

Both sides of the House share a concern about the decline of the merchant shipping industry. It was 1,200 strong in 1979 and is only 600 strong today. The General Council of British Shipping fears that the figure could fall to 400 and then to 200 by 1995. When last week the Committee in another place called for urgent measures from the Government to secure orders for British yards and to ensure that the British merchant fleet could maintain and expand its capacity to deal not only with industrial but with defence needs, the question that the Minister must answer during the debate is: why has he not done more? What more will he do to persuade British shipowners to buy British, to repair British and, indeed, to sail British, in the interests of the industry?

There are three things that the Minister can do. The first is to use the Government's public purchasing powers to the benefit of shipbuilding communities. Surely it is in the Department's interest and, indeed, in other Department's interests, when faced with the prospect of ever-rising unemployment at great cost to the Government, to speed up the orders that have been mentioned by Opposition Members. Those orders are desperately needed by the various Departments, but, because of cash shortages, particularly in the Ministry of Defence, they are not being placed.

[Mr. Gordon Brown]

My right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) and my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, North mentioned the FSK 20/20. The Minister should clarify the position. The Ministry of Defence encouraged British Shipbuilders to design that; British Shipbuilders could build and export it. It is not a substitute but it is a complement to the AOR. The Minister should tell us what pressure he will bring to bear on the Ministry of Defence to ensure that those orders, which could help Sunderland and Govan retain jobs, are placed as soon as possible.

Secondly — the Minister raised this point — there should be effective pressure to secure proper support from the intervention fund. When the Under-Secretary spoke in a debate last year, he said that he was fighting for Britain in Europe. Over the next few months his proposal for 35 per cent. subvention became only just over 20 per cent. subvention under the intervention fund. This year's negotiations have started with the Commissioner for competition, who says that he wants an effective and significant reduction in the overall level of aid. The Under-Secretary, who appears to be leading the negotiations on behalf of the Government, is quoted as saying that he wants an "end to the nonsense of worldwide subsidies."

While not offering Britain as a sacrificial lamb, he has also said that Europe could take the lead in the process of ending the "buying" business for orders.

We should like the Minister to give us an assurance that he and his colleagues will fight for decent intervention fund support, that he will not be swept aside by the Commissioner for competition, that he will not yield to other countries that want a cut in intervention fund support, and that he agrees with us that we cannot afford the luxury of misplaced ideologies about free market forces—other countries are doing their best to protect their industries, while we seem to be mouthing monetarist orthodoxies in Europe.

Thirdly, the Government can take to heart what the Prime Minister seemed to be saying on Friday, which Downing street seemed to withdraw — that we need better packages to enable us to persuade people to buy British and build in British yards. The Prime Minister appeared to say that at the moment we could offer packages that were better than in any other country except Japan. That is contradicted by the evidence that the Department of Trade and Industry gave to the Committee in another place, when the officials appeared to be saying that other countries were able to beat us hands down, especially France and Germany, which could offer better and longer repayment periods and better credit packages for building ships.

The Under-Secretary appeared to say that other countries in Europe were offering hidden subsidies while our subsidies were all transparent and above board. If a study has not been done and if proposals have not been brought forward to improve the credit and loan packages on offer, the Minister could help by giving us an assurance that he will examine the packages and ways in which to improve them, take up the point that was made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Govan and guarantee to us that no order will be lost because the credit terms that are on offer in this country are detrimental compared with those offered by other countries.

We are talking about the survival or extinction of the merchant shipbuilding industry. We are talking not about an industry that is old-fashioned, but about an industry that has moved into high technology. This afternoon the Minister acknowledged the widespread gains in productivity that have been achieved — what he called the enormous strides forward. He also acknowledged the improvement in industrial relations. However, the Government need to match the commitment that has been made by the work forces throughout the country. What we need from the Government is a commitment to use their public purchasing powers to secure orders, to fight in Europe for an expansion of intervention fund support, to develop the packages that can be offered to secure the orders that Britain needs, and to ensure that British shipowners will buy British, sail British and repair British for the future of the industry.

What we need are not the complacent words that the Minister appeared to use at the beginning of the debate, but an assurance that dynamic initiatives will be taken to secure the future of the yards, to secure orders, to save the jobs and to safeguard the future of an industry that is vital not only for our industrial and trading needs but for the defence of this country.

Mr. Peter Morrison: In the short time that is available, I shall attempt to respond to what has been a very serious debate and pick up as many of the points as I possibly can.

If at the beginning of the debate I gave the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) the impression that I was complacent, I assure him that that was not so. His right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) described the severity of the position, and I agree that it is very serious. I would not go so far as to use the words of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East and say that it was a case of survival or extinction, but I am more than aware of the serious problems faced by the merchant shipbuilding industry in Britain.

I do not wish to detain the House with the debate about privatisation and whether that was a good or bad decision. The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East would expect me to defend the decision to privatise, and I do that with conviction. I believe that the employees in the Vickers consortium, 80 per cent. of whom took up the shares, would agree that privatisation was the most sensible way forward.

I should like to reiterate what I said at the beginning of the debate about the Government's commitment to the industry. If we had not been committed to the industry, we would not — at a time of scarce resources — have invested £1,440 million in the industry since we came to power in 1979. The Government have made a major commitment in that sense.

One of the main themes running through the debate, which was raised by the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East and by the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East, has been public sector purchasing policy. I agree that any responsible Government should have regard to that. I am sure, however, that the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East would accept that significant orders have been placed with the shipbuilding industry by the Ministry of Defence.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman also raised the point about the British Nuclear Fuels Ltd. ship. He will be aware that the first four ships ordered by that consortium came from this country. The right hon. and learned Gentleman's point referred to the fifth ship, and the tender from the Japanese was substantially below the tender from British Shipbuilders. It is also fair to say, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman realises, that the company is not British dominated. It is Japanese-French as well as British.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman also raised a specific point about the FSK 20/20, as did many of his hon. Friends. I believe that is a good ship, and of course it is important for the future. It has export potential. I understand all those points. However, the Opposition will appreciate that the Secretary of State for Defence must look carefully at his precise needs. He cannot, off the top of his head, create orders in a way that the Opposition would like.

The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East raised the matter of the increase in intervention fund support. As I said when I intervened in the speech of the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan), we can consider support through the intervention fund on a case by case basis and there can be some flexibility.

The hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay) made the point with some vigour that it was surprising that British Shipbuilders had not come to the Government for support. That may be surprising, but so far as I know that has not happened because there has been no increase in the use of flexibility relating to the intervention fund. That is not a reason for no orders coming forward. I understand the passion with which the hon. Member for Sunderland, North puts his case, but, in all honesty, the position is not quite as he would like it to be.

Another of the themes running through the debate, which was raised by the right hon. Member for Govan among others, was the provision of credit. I appreciate that the competition in connection with the allocation of credit can become unfair or even more fair, and we must consider that position. There is the possibility of softer credit in certain circumstances using the aid and trade provision. I confirm that we are ready to consider the use of that provision in appropriate cases, and I can specifically confirm that, in the case referred to by the right hon. Member for Govan and his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East, we are ready to use it. We must judge each case on its merits.

I believe that a misunderstanding arose from the interpretation of the meeting between the hon. Member for Sunderland, North and shop stewards and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. I was not present at that meeting, but I have heard reports that it was very constructive on both sides. I am sure that the shop stewards appreciate that the Government and the Prime Minister are doing everything within their power to help British Shipbuilders and will therefore help with the jobs that are available.

Mr. Clay: In fairness to the shop stewards and to myself, the Minister should not mislead the House by implying that we thought that the Prime Minister was doing everything in her power. As the Minister has allowed me to intervene, may I say that my recollection of the meeting and that of the shop stewards is clear. The Prime Minister was not simply talking about one situation. She said that from now on no country, other than Japan, can undercut this country on credit in connection with orders.

Mr. Morrison: As I have said, I was not at the meeting but I did receive reports. I have related to the hon. Gentleman the present position for credits under the aid and trade provisions.

My hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) referred to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) and to a former Secretary of State, Mr. Eric Varley, and what they said about the industry in the 1970s. They had to deal at that stage, as did the then Government, with a very difficult situation. As the hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett) said, the problems with the industry should be dealt with on a broad rather than a party political front. I believe that that has been the tone of the debate so far, and I agree that that is the approach that we should take.

Mr. Gordon Brown: Before the Minister leaves the point about credit packages, whatever the Prime Minister said, will he give us an undertaking that no other country will be able to undercut us on credit terms and that he will ensure that British Shipbuilders can offer the best credit terms?

Mr. Morrison: The hon. Gentleman is asking the impossible.

Mr. Gordon Brown: No, I am not.

Mr. Morrison: With due respect, the hon. Gentleman is asking the impossible. How am I to know precisely what other countries may be offering by way of credit? The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East, who has been a senior Secretary of State, knows perfectly well that it is not always possible to know about credit terms as negotiations are commercially confidential. It would be impossible for me to give such an undertaking to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East or to the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East without misleading them and the House.

My hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge referred to the previous Labour Administration who said how difficult it was for people to manage the shipbuilding industry in western Europe and throughout the world because of the contraction of the industry. Of course, shipbuilding is extremely important to certain parts of the country, to the north-east and parts of Scotland in particular. I therefore understand why the Opposition make the point with conviction that the Government should force British shipowners to buy British ships. I cannot acquiesce to that request. It is fair to say that in recent years two thirds of British ships bought by British shipowners have come from British shipyards. Obviously, we shall do what we can to sell to Britain's shipowners the ideas of British Shipbuilders.

I commend the Bill to the House. I am sure that it is a further step in helping British Shipbuilders in the direction that it should be going.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

Bill committed to a Committee of the whole House.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

Committee tomorrow.

BRITISH SHIPBUILDERS (BORROWING POWERS) BILL [MONEY]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—

Resolved,

[Mr. Morrison]

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the British Shipbuilders (Borrowing Powers) Bill ('the Act'), it is expedient to authorise—

(a) any increase in the sums payable out of the National Loans Fund, the Consolidated Fund or money provided by Parliament under the Aircraft and Shipbuilding Industries Act 1977 which is attributable to provisions of the Act raising to £1,300 million the limit imposed by section 11(7) of the said Act of 1977 and authorising the Secretary of State to provide by order for that limit to be increased or further increased up to a maximum of £1,400 million; and

(b) the payment of any sums into the National Loans Fund or the Consolidated Fund.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

Harwich Parkeston Quay Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

7 pm

Sir Julian Ridsdale (Harwich): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

Before I deal with the principle of the Bill, may I remind the House of the distinction between the Second Reading of a public Bill and a private Bill. "Erskine May" says:

"a public Bill being founded on reasons of state policy, the House, in agreeing to its second reading, accepts and affirms those reasons; but the expediency of a private Bill, being mainly founded on allegations of fact, which have not yet been proved, the House, in agreeing to its second reading, affirms the principle of the Bill conditionally, and subject to the proof of such allegations before the committee. Where, irrespective of such facts, the principle is objectionable, the House will not consent to the second reading; but otherwise, the expediency of the measure is usually left for the consideration of the committee."

In general, the principle of the Bill is to create new quays, vital for our growing trade, with no damage to the environment, and to reclaim land which will become valuable industrial land with admirable port facilities in an area which has a high level of unemployment. I hope that no hon. Member will wish to vote against that principle. Of course, there are matters in dispute, but, as "Erskine May" advises,

"the expediency of the measure is usually left for the consideration of the committee."

I trust that the House will follow that advice.

The principal object of the Bill is to authorise the development of Bath Side bay, Harwich, which lies between the existing harbour facilities at Parkeston quay to the west and Harwich to the east. The development will consist of the phased construction of a quay wall fronting the river Stour across Bath Side bay. In addition, approximately 330 acreas of tidal mud flats will be reclaimed. Once constructed the quay wall will provide four deep-sea container berths and facilities for handling approximately 100,000 containers per annum.

It is expected that the first container berth could be in operation within 18 months of the work beginning and the construction of the remaining three container berths will take place when required to meet commercial shipping demands.

It is exciting that the Bill, which creates quays as they become necessary, offers the first real prospect for the development of Bath Side bay, a project first proposed in the 1850s and a development by a company that has the resources to finance such a project.

The anticipated cost of the construction of the sea wall and the reclamation is £33 million at present-day prices. The overall cost of the development is expected to be in the region of £100 million at present day prices.

To the south of the port area will be a substantial area of land suitable for industrial and commercial use. Implementation, in association with the construction of stage two of the Dovercourt bypass, will ensure adequate road access.

Naturally, with the high rates of unemployment that there are in north-east Essex, I welcome the development. Many of my constituents are watching expectantly for the employment prospects that are likely to arise from the Bill, not only in the port itself but in the industrial and commercial area directly to the south of it.

Therefore, the House would bear a grave responsibility if, for some unfortunate reason, this evening it denies a Second Reading to the Bill, especially now that there is the capital and momentum to move forward from the considerable progress that has already been made since the new management took over responsibility for the port of Parkeston quay, Harwich.

Last year, thanks to quick decisions being made by the new management and help from the Essex county council, a substantial part of the land behind the proposed first berth and around the shore line of Bath Side bay has already been reclaimed with the necessary consents but without statutory powers, as the opportunity arose to acquire a large quantity of good quality material recovered from the dredging of the main channel of Harwich harbour. That reclamation was carried out by the Harwich harbour board with the present company's consent. It amounts to approximately 25 per cent. of the total area of the bay previously covered by water at high tide.

As the Second Reading of the Bill has already been blocked, and although this would be better taken in Committee, I should explain that there was a previous Act called the Bath Side Bay Development Act 1972 in which the Earlpar Development Company Ltd. obtained powers for the reclamation and development of port facilities in Bath Side bay. The works to be authorised by this Bill are on what is virtually the same site as those authorised by the 1972 Act. It is for that reason that the Bill proposes the repeal of that Act, which has never been implemented. Indeed, there is no way in which the 1972 Act could be implemented without the agreement and participation of Sealink Holdings Ltd. as it is the owner of a major part of the land lying above low water mark within the area designated for development in the Act. There are no provisions in the Act whereby Earlpar can acquire Sealink Holdings Ltd's interests other than by agreement.

Harwich Terminal Holdings, the holding company of Earlpar, makes much of the point that the 1972 Act authorised reclamation by sealing off the bay from the main river channel, in the first instance by the formation of a bund across the bay. It says that that was required by the Essex river authority, but investigation of the relevant papers shows that that is not so, rather that the river authority was concerned that if Earlpar were to proceed with reclamation in that way it should show that it had adequate funds to complete the job, so that the sealing off operation would not be left incomplete and without the subsequent back up of landward reclamation.

There is no specific provision in the 1972 Act to require reclamation in that way, but the works then authorised specified bunds stretching across the bay and would not be apt for the method of reclamation now proposed — reclaiming the bay progressively from the eastern end, keeping the reclamation of the landward area in step with any extension of the quay face.

The scheme of development authorised by the 1972 Act is, in the view of Sealink Holdings Ltd., impracticable as it involves the cost of comprehensive reclamation of Bath Side bay in the first instance before any deep water port facilities can be provided.

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): What section of the 1972 Act says, first, as my hon. Friend has just told us, that the method proposed is not provided for, and, secondly, that the method that he has just described is provided for?

Sir Julian Ridsdale: I shall give my hon. Friend a reference if I have the leave of the House to reply to the debate.

Harwich Terminal Holdings also complained of discourtesy, in that the Bill has been promoted without notice to it. There is a long history of negotiations, culminating in the proposal made on behalf of Harwich Terminal Holdings that it should sell the 1972 Act for £7·24 million. After considering this proposal, put to it by merchant bankers on behalf of Harwich Terminal Holdings and Earlpar, a letter was written by Sea Containers on 20 March 1985 informing them that the company had decided that it could proceed without the assistance of Harwich Terminal Holdings or its associates. There were further discussions, but these were inconclusive. I am satisfied in connection with the deposit of the Bill that due notice was served on Earlpar in respect of the intended repeal of its 1972 Act.

Felixstowe Dock and Railway Company is promoting its own Bill to authorise extension of its container port. I was glad to speak in support of its Bill last year. I hope that it will agree in principle to this Bill and that any worries that it may have about the phased development of Parkeston quay will be ironed out in Committee. This also applies to the concerns of some of my constituents about the right to use Gas House creek and the adjoining Gas House quay. I am glad that negotiations are in progress with Trinity House, with a view to solving points of difference amicably.

Finally, may I remind the House again that the principle of this Bill is to create new quays, with no damage to the environment, and to reclaim land, some of which will become valuable industrial land with admirable port facilities in an area that has very high unemployment. I sincerely trust that no hon. Member will wish to vote against that principle and will be willing to let matters of dispute be for consideration of the Committee, as "Erskine May" advises. I, too, underline the need for urgency in coming to a decision.

Mr. Albert McQuarrie (Banff and Buchan): I do not want to delay my hon. Friend's initial speech. I hope sincerely that later he will have the permission of the House to answer the debate, but I should not like him to sit down now without saying what, if any, consideration has been given by the present owners of Sealink to providing compensation for Earlpar. My hon. Friend referred to the sum of £7·24 million, but I am sure he will agree that that figure is now dead and gone and that since then there have been no further negotiations.

Sir Julian Ridsdale: I am glad that my hon. Friend has raised that extremely important point. Sealink and Harwich Terminal Holdings are conducting negotiations upon that matter. I have been informed today that Harwich Terminal Holdings said that it did not wish to have a meeting with Sealink Holdings because it would not be a meeting between the heads of the companies at which an agreement could be reached. I am glad to be able to tell my hon. Friend that Sealink Holdings said in reply that it is perfectly willing to have a meeting to conduct negotiations on this matter with the heads of the companies concerned. I think that that covers my hon. Friend's point. The promoters of the Bill are naturally anxious to reach agreement with Harwich Terminal Holdings upon this question.

Mr. Fairbairn: If I may pursue that point with my hon. Friend, assuming that the House gives a Second Reading to the Bill tonight, does he take the view that Sealink's bargaining position will be strengthened and that that of Harwich Terminal Holdings will be weakened, or does he take the view that it will be left as it is? If he takes the view that it will be left as it is, what is the haste for a Second Reading of the Bill before the settlement?

Sir Julian Ridsdale: The haste is because of the momentum that has been created in Harwich. I pointed out in my speech that there is a very high rate of unemployment in Harwich and that there is an urgent desire to reclaim the land in order to create industrial land in Harwich that a company, with reasonable assets, will wish to take up.

Mr. Fairbairn: What about the bargaining?

Sir Julian Ridsdale: I shall deal with that point. First, however, may I underline the urgency of this matter. Those of my hon. Friends who are faced with a rate of unemployment that is similar to that in Harwich will agree with me that I ought to do my best to urge them to give a Second Reading in principle to the Bill. "Erskine May" advises that this is a matter of expediency.

As for the negotiations, I think that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn) will agree that the first price asked for the Bill was extremely high. I do not wish to put myself in the middle of the negotiations, but I know the proprietors. Having listened to the debate and having looked at the facts, as I have done, I am sure that they will want a reasonable agreement to be reached with Harwich Terminal Holdings. It is impossible for me, as a middleman, to say more than that, as I have no responsibility for the matter. All I ask my hon. Friends to do is to concentrate upon the principle of the Bill. If they object to it, they will wish to vote against its Second Reading or to talk the Bill out.

I wish to underline the need for urgency in reaching a decision. The fall in the price of oil should create a great demand for British manufactured goods throughout the Community and worldwide. The creation of these port facilities would result in Harwich being able to take shipping from any part of the world. A container port would be created on our east coast which would result in great advantages not only for my constituents but for Essex and the country generally.

For these reasons, I hope that the House will give a Second Reading to the Bill and that on the question of expediency it will follow the advice of "Erskine May" and deal with those matters in Committee.

7.18 pm

Mr. Willie Hamilton (Fife, Central): I beg to move,

That the Bill be read a Second time upon this day six months.

Hon. Members may wonder why a Scottish Member should move a motion. They might be even more cur. s——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but the motion that he sought to move has not been selected, and, indeed, is not normally selected.

Mr. Hamilton: I beg your pardon, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was about to explain why the motion standing in my name is supported by five hon. Members of Scottish origin—even if they are not all Scottish Members. One of them represented a Scottish constituency, but now represents Southend, East. I do not know their motives in supporting the motion. Indeed, I am rather embarrassed to find myself in such undesirable company. I hasten to add that I have had no consultations whatever on the matter. However, I have had some private conversations with the hon. Member for Harwich (Sir J. Ridsdale), and I think that he understands my position fairly well. I have no objection to any hon. Member who seeks to further his constituency's interests, especially if there is any prospect of creating jobs in an area—like many others—that has high unemployment.

I should make my position clear. My active interest in private Bill procedure was excited by the strange and unsavoury story of the Felixstowe Bill and by the experiences of my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) when she served on the Committee dealing with that Bill. On 12 February, we had a lively debate following a motion from the Chairman of Ways and Means to reduce the quorum in order to expedite the Bill's passage. During that debate, I and other Opposition Members revealed that the Bill's promoters were major financial contributors to the Tory party. We also sought to show how antiquated and unsatisfactory private Bill practice is. The procedure was, and is, open to abuse of one sort or another.

On that occasion, history was made when the Chairman of Ways and Means, as you will recall, Mr. Deputy Speaker, moved that motion and implied that an inquiry into that procedure would be initiated. Those debates were obviously read in Harwich, because a lady wrote me a long letter, saying that the Bill

"illustrates the deficiencies of Private Bill procedures to an even greater degree than the Felixstowe Bill."

In an informed way, she then eloquently explained why the Bill should be rejected. I need not go into the details of that letter now, but she said that the Bill was promoted by Sealink Harbours Ltd., which is a United Kingdom company with a Bermudan holding company headed by Mr. James Sherwood, of Channel tunnel fame. The implication is clear.

That lady suggested that some inquiries might be made about Mr. Sherwood and his activities vis-a-vis the Conservative party, following the relationship that we established between the company promoting the Felixstowe Bill and the Conservative party. She made several points, and said that the plan would threaten the outstanding conservation area of old Harwich and Gas House creek, which abuts the conservation area.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): As always, I have listened with respect to the hon. Gentleman. He has referred to the private Bill procedure. Surely he is aware that his informant's objections could be properly dealt with in Committee. Does not the hon. Gentleman adhere to that view? If not, why not?

Mr. Hamilton: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman was present when we debated the Felixstowe Bill, but we then pointed out the wholly antiquated and unsatisfactory nature of that procedure. Four hon. Members were appointed to the Committee and were compelled to attend, on penalty of being fined. My hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley happened to be serving on the Committee debating the Gas Bill as well. She made the very relevant point that her constituents were much more concerned that she should attend the Committee debating the Gas Bill and the privatisation of the gas industry than that she should attend a Committee debating the Felixstowe Bill. She asked me what she should do, and I told her not to attend the sittings of the Committee on the Felixstowe Bill. She did not attend the latter, and she then received stern letters from the authorities saying that she must attend. I told her not to and she decided not to attend.

At that point, my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) also refused to attend, and the Chairman of Ways and Means, whose duty it is to see that private Bills get through, moved a motion reducing the quorum to, I believe, three. That meant that there were two Conservative Members and possibly one Labour Member if he or she could be found. Those three hon. Members were to determine a matter of crucial national interest. Opposition Members all said that the procedure was absurd.

It is ridiculous that a matter of national policy should be determined by three or four Back Benchers who have been compelled to attend and to hear hour after hour of droning from highly paid counsel and QCs. The only people to laugh at our private Bill procedure are parliamentary agents and counsel. They are making money out of it. It is time that that came to an end.

I am under no illusions about what is happening. I support the hon. Member for Harwich in his attempt to create jobs. I would support any hon. Member who tried to do that. The Bill raises several points that could be raised in Committee, but then that procedure is unsatisfactory.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): I introduced the Felixstowe Bill and followed its Committee stage with interest. The hon. Gentleman is a very good constitutionalist and Member of Parliament. But if he believes that private Bill procedures are out of date and anachronistic, would it not be better to go through the proper procedures for changing them than to recommend to his hon. Friends that they should, in effect, go on strike?

Mr. Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman is also a skilled parliamentarian and must understand that there are limits to what a Back Bencher can do. An investigation into the private Bill procedure is in hand, but meanwhile we must take what steps we can to prevent or inhibit that procedure's smooth operation, and to influence that Committee's proceedings. The private Bill procedure must be radically changed, because it is at present absurd.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): The hon. Gentleman will be aware, being a Scottish Member, that it is not unusual to be on more than one Committee at a time. That means that the Committee which the hon. Member does not attend does not do its work properly or effectively. An examination of procedure is long overdue.

Mr. Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman supports my view. The more hon. Members who take that view, the more pressure can be put on the Chairman of Ways and Means to make a radical change and to end the nonsense. I am not worried about forcing a vote today, so long as the protest about the absurdity of our procedures is put on the record.

The Bill proposes to repeal the Bathside Bay Development Act 1972 which operates until 1992 and was obtained through the private Bill procedure. The Bill repeats the substance of that Act's provisions. The Bill is proposed by Sealink Harbours Ltd. The powers of the 1972 Act are vested in the Earlpar Development Company Ltd., which has now petitioned. The chairman of that company happens to be the Earl of Lauderdale—Patrick Maitland, as I knew him many years ago in the House. I am in strange company.

The Earl of Lauderdale has written to me and seen me. He has a financial interest, which he has frankly declared. He has given me information which is not readily available. This is a complex matter which underlines the undesirability of dealing with such matters in a private Bill Committee, which we now have to tolerate.

Mr. Fairbairn: As someone with vast experience of the procedure, who has been both perspicacious in observing it and critical of it, can the hon. Gentleman tell me whether he knows of a precedent for the proposal that one private Bill should be brought before Parliament by one interested party in order to extinguish the inalienable rights granted by Parliament to another party?

Mr. Hamilton: I do not think that there is such a precedent. A private Bill was passed by the House in 1972 and this, another private Bill, seeks to repeal that measure. That is reprehensible and undesirable and the House has the power to stop it.

The 1972 Act and the Bill relate to the reclamation for harbour development of more than 250 acres of tidal mudflats west of Harwich, fronting the Stour-Orwell estuary. The engineering feasibility of the reclamation project was first established by the Earlpar company, which negotiated over the years with British Rail, the freeholders, to undertake the work on a development agreement, then a lease of the reclaimed land. The development was obstructed by the requirements of section 9 of the Harbours Act 1964. That required Government consent for any harbour works involving capital investment above a certain amount. Consent was dependent on a recommendation by the National Ports Council. This, in turn, required the company to demonstrate that it had a contractual user commitment in bankable terms to ensure that the capital could be both serviced and redeemed. The prospective user had to be willing to undertake to make "X" use of the harbour, at "Y" dues, over "Z" period—all this for a harbour not yet built, on land not yet reclaimed.

The section 9 requirement was not repealed until the Ports (Finance) Act 1985. However, the freehold of that site today, having been passed by British Rail to Sealink, had through privatisation passed by July 1984 to Mr. John Sherwood's American Sea Containers Ltd. The sale was carried out under the Transport Act 1981, which requires any purchaser of Sealink's harbour interests to take over related liabilities as well as assets. The liabilities included an enjoyment of 15 years of technical studies determining the feasibility of a reclamation project and geophysical conditions for harbour development. They had been made freely available by the Earlpar company to the freeholder, British Rail, in the light of successive letters of intent.

Sea Containers Ltd. has so far ignored Earlpar's offer to sell the company's assets and the benefit of the studies as well as introduce a user, both to make a firm commitment and to help fund the development. Instead, Sea Containers has chosen to seek to obtain these benefits for nothing by a private Bill—[Interruption.] I see that the hon. Member for Harwich (Sir J. Ridsdale) disagrees with me. I hope that he will make these matters clear later because they are sore points to petitioners against the Bill.

The Bill ignores the environmental protests of those in Harwich who are worried about protecting and using Gashouse creek at the east end of Bath Side Bay. I understand that the petitioners, on their behalf, have been refused a hearing before the Committee on Opposed Bills to be set up should the Bill obtain a Second Reading. Environmental rights will thus be eliminated without being heard. The creek was specifically protected under the 1972 Act.

The hon. Member for Harwich mentioned Trinity House interests. I am not sure whether those interests are protected, but, according to my information, they are likely to be ignored by the Bill. Trinity House has petitioned, and I understand that negotiations with the promoters are proceeding. I understand that the port of Felixstowe has also petitioned on the ground of anxiety about the effect which piecemeal harbour development will have on the estuarial regime. I do not know whether that is so. It needs explanation, and I hope that the hon. Member for Harwich will explain.

That interest was protected by the 1972 Act which this Bill proposes to repeal. The regime is also threatened by increasingly high tides while the volume of sea-going freight handled on the estuary has risen by about 50 per cent. in the past five years.

"spent or of no practical utility".

The hon. Member for Harwich said that. At the time that Sealink was being privatised, the Harwich harbour authority undertook dredging operations in the estuary and, at the instance of the Earlpar company, was persuaded by British Rail to deposit the spoils on Bath Side bay to start off the reclamation. Nearly one third of Bath Side has been filled in as a result. The parliamentary powers which protected this operation from interference by others—for example, the dumping of harmful refuse —existed in the 1972 Act. Therefore, that Act has already proved its relevance and value.

When I got the letter from the lady in Harwich and also the representations of the Earl of Lauderdale, I received, as a consequence, a letter from the parliamentary agents, Sherwood and Company, of Queen Anne's Chambers, Westminster, which asked me to give my reasons for objecting to the Bill. I simply replied by enclosing a copy of the long letter which I had received from the lady in Harwich. I deleted her name and address because I did not have her permission to use it. I also explained my views, in principle, on the private Bill procedure.

The lady subsequently apologised to the hon. Member for Harwich because she had made some incorrect allegations in her letter which she later withdrew. I had stirred up a hornet's nest which I regret. I do not regret my part in these proceedings. My hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) had put down a blocking motion on the Bill, to which I added my name. I consulted my hon. Friend about the terms of the letter and my hon. Friend asked me to put my name to the blocking motion because there was something irregular about it. That is confirmed to some extent by the letter from the lady in Harwich. I shall end with a fairly lengthy quotation, but I believe it is important to get it on the record.

Mr. Fairbairn: Let's have it all.

Mr. Hamilton: In due course I may allow the hon. and learned Gentleman to see the letter.

The letter states:

"Why are Parliament and the people of Harwich subjected to the introduction of this Bill? There is no doubt in my mind, and that of others, that this is only their first foray into the conservation area. At present, you may know, the seamen here are on strike due to redundancies and the loss of Sealink's freight contract to Felixstowe. If you consult the Unions here, you will find that they have further fears, particularly regarding intrusion of foreign crews and workers, and yet this town would become 'Sealinkville', wholly dependent on Sealink if this Bill were enacted. Questions were asked in Committee on the Felixstowe Bill concerning the Promoters' donations to Tory Party funds —Mr. Sherwood has friends in high places—it might be interesting to put the same questions to him."

If this Bill goes to Committee, I hope the same questions will be put to Mr. Sherwood as were put to the relevant people who promoted the Felixstowe Bill.

The letter continues to consider the role of the Crown Estate Commissioners which was not mentioned by the hon. Member for Harwich:

"Yet another aspect is the Crown Estate Commissioners. I have been attempting to investigate the ownership of land delineated in the Book of Reference to the Bill, as the Promoters can list any land as theirs or reputed to be theirs with no proof of ownership, the system relying entirely on someone petitioning to say it is not; such research is also lengthy, which the procedural timetable does not allow for. The Crown Estate Commissioners state that they are already negotiating with Sealink about making their land in Bath Side Bay available to Sealink. This seems incredible with an Act over the area still in operation and a Bill just introduced; I trust that they will not be permitted to transfer it to Sealink whilst the Bill is before the House. My other information from them"—— that is, the Crown Estates Commissioners—

"concerned the bed of the Creek which Sealink purport to own. They say this was transferred to the United Land Company in 1871. They agree with my contention that the bed of a tidal river so far as the tide ebbs and flows is vested in the Crown and that when it is granted or acquired with this grant or acquisition passes intrinsically the public right of navigation and fishing right and rights ancillary thereto over the locus of the grant or acquisition."

Mr. Fairbairn rose——

Mr. Hamilton: I shall just finish the paragraph:

"They state that the custodian of such rights on behalf of the public is the Attorney General. I trust that the Attorney General will enforce these rights in the case of this Bill."

Mr. Fairbairn: This may seem a strange question for one Scottish Member to ask another about the law of England but, given that the lady is right about these matters, do the regalia majora and regalia minora apply to the shores of England as they do to the shores of Scotland and are the shores the rights of the Crown and not the rights of the proprietor?

Mr. Hamilton: I do not know. I think the hon. and learned Gentleman should apply for membership of the Committee. I will recommend him for that because clearly he has many pertinent questions to put to the promoters of the Bill.

I shall finish the quote:

"I think, as you do, that the fight for reform in Private Bill procedures is a fight for some democratic representation for common people in these matters. Justice is not being done and the interests of a multinational company are being given not only precedence but almost sole hearing. Private Bill procedures in Bills such as the Harwich Parkeston Quay Bill are no longer democratic in any acceptable sense."

I entirely agree with that proposition; and that is why I am making this speech. I want it to be put on record

—I hope other hon. Members will put it on record in the course of the Bill—that, unless we get this procedure reformed and modernised, we ought not to allow private Bills to go through the House under this procedure.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I also want the procedure reformed. Does the hon. Gentleman think that it is right that he should tell the House that the letter he is reading is from Mrs. Cullen, who was originally a petitioner against the Bill? Her petition was struck out by the Court of Referees. Her locus was disallowed by the procedures of this House because she does not claim any other right but as a member of the public. Since the Court of Referees has taken that view, does the hon. Gentleman think it is proper to seek to import her objections when the proper procedures have said that they are not revelant?

Mr. Hamilton: I do not know, but she has made some valid arguments in the letter, which ought to be recorded. I have not asked her permission to quote the letter and I have deliberately sought not to identify her, but the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) has, and he may be right. The principles on which she is acting are sound. She believes that there are rights of individual citizens which are being treated in a slipshod manner and that citizens are unable to put their arguments to a Committee of the House. Such people's interests are not being protected as they should be.

These are matters of fundamental national interest and they should not be dealt with in this feudalistic way, which gives only the lawyers acting on behalf of the promoters or the petitioners a fair deal. If I put that on record and repeat it every time that a private Bill is considered in the House, the message might eventually lead to radical change in the procedure.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): The hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) has been a Member of the House for a long time and has a great knowledge of procedure. Anything that he says on that subject must be listened to with respect. I had a little sympathy with him at one stage, but he did not answer my question. I am not concerned who the lady is. As the hon. Gentleman did not have her permission to reveal her name, he properly did not do so, but he did not deny the allegation of my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) that her case was not thought to be justified and that her petition was rejected by the Court of Referees.

I did not want to go into that, for the reason that my question was not whether the private Bill procedure is as well framed and conducted as it should be, but whether, bearing in mind the objections that the hon. Gentleman voiced on behalf of the lady concerned, he nevertheless thought that these matters could properly be considered in Committee under the existing private Bill procedure.

I have always understood that to be the case. I should have thought that the Earl of Lauderdale could make such objections as he has in Committee, irrespective of whether or not he has an interest in the matter. Surely we are interested in arriving at objective truth, discovering where justice lies and what is the right thing to do, and that can be done in Committee.

Mr. Bill Walker: My right hon. Friend has also been a Member of the House for a long time and is experienced in procedural matters. Does he have any experience of a private Bill being introduced to remove a private Act?

Sir Bernard Braine: No, I do not recall any such precedent. Perhaps that ought to be considered, but I do not believe that it should delay the Bill's passage. The point could be considered in detail in Committee.

I am speaking as a senior Member for the county of Essex because I support what my colleague of many years' standing, my hon. Friend the Member for Harwich (Sir J. Ridsdale), is doing. He has been a doughty campaigner for the north-eastern part of our county, and he is as anxious as others in that area that nothing should stand in the way of a scheme which will bring undoubted benefits to our county as a whole.

Essex is expanding. Our population will grow well beyond the year 2000 and the development of the M25 and the M11 means that we shall experience considerable growth in business and industry. My hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) nods agreement, for he knows that this development will enable goods to reach the continent more speedily through the east coast ports. The Bill would facilitate much more than port expansion next door to the existing container handling complex at Parkeston—or to improve employment opportunities in my hon. Friend's constituency.

The good effects will be felt throughout our county. That is why the Essex county council strongly favours a swift decision. Indeed, it is quite remarkable that the first container berth is expected to be ready within 18 months of the start of the work and that three more are likely to follow. The project is linked to the provision of substantial additional land for industrial and commercial development and the construction of the second phase of the Dovercourt bypass. Some work has already been undertaken, and we are now raring to go.

In short, the project is likely to lead to a substantial increase in container traffic, which will stimulate business in an area far beyond Harwich, extending to south-east Essex, mid-Essex and the former metropolitan Essex, which is now in Greater London. That development is needed now.

I do not propose to go into my hon. Friend's moderately argued case in detail. Perhaps there are objections which ought to be heard in accordance with our established private Bill traditions and procedures, but the right place for that is in Committee. I did not agree with all of the conclusions reached by the hon. Member for Fife, Central, but he adduced some arguments that we should note. However, that has no bearing on the desirability of the Bill's swift passage or on the urgency of the work to be done. I hope, therefore, that the House will support the Bill.

I should like to thank my hon. Friend the Member for Harwich, on behalf of my part of Essex, for his skill and efficacy in bringing this matter before us.

7.59 pm

Mr. Albert McQuarrie (Banff and Buchan): I sympathise with the points made so eloquently by my hon. Friend the Member for Harwich (Sir J. Ridsdale) about employment in his constituency. During the past few months, I have had considerable experience in piloting private Bills through the House, fortunately successfully.

[Mr. Albert McQuarrie]

I also subscribe to the views expressed by the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton). Something must be done about private Bills, which are in many cases ridiculous. It is an abuse of the House for them to be brought here instead of being dealt with through normal legislation, which is possible in local government.

Having taken much interest in this issue and read the Bill thoroughly, I shall devote my remarks to what I consider to be the unfair treatment which Earlpar Development Company has received from the new owner of Sealink and what has taken place since the Bath Side Bay Development Act 1972 was passed. I shall endeavour to respect the statement by my hon. Friend the Member for Harwich that discussions are taking place between Sealink and Harwich Terminal Holdings, whose wholly owned subsidiary is the Earlpar Development Company.

Clause 23 and the second schedule to the Bill would repeal the Bath Side Bay Development Act, granted by Parliament under the private Bill procedure in 1972 and extended by the Secretary of State for Transport to run until 1992—a further six years. The Act was granted to Harwich Terminal Holdings, but the wholly owned subsidiary of that company was the Earlpar Development Company, which was incorporated in 1970.

Harwich Terminal Holdings is a petitioner against the Bill. It owns Earlpar Development Company, along with a development account asset worth about £700,000 at historical cost. That represents cash outgoings and obligations in respect of expenses incurred in preparing and advancing the reclamation and development scheme with which the Bill and the existing Act have been concerned for nearly 15 years.

The original Act and the Bill deal with the powers, as the hon. Member for Fife, Central pointed out.

Mr. Fairbairn: Will my hon. Friend advise me whether there are any proposals in the Bill to compensate the original company for the work it has done in the meantime when the new company takes over its permanent powers?

Mr.McQuarrie: I hope that my hon. and learned Friend will bear with me, because I intend to take that issue fully into account.

The original Act and the Bill deal with the powers to reclaim about 250 acres of tidal mud flats called Bath Side bay, fronting the Stour-Orwell estuary opposite Felixstowe, between Harwich on the east and Parkeston quay on the west. The freehold of Parkeston quay and Bath Side bay was passed by British Rail to Sealink, which on privatisation was bought by the Bermuda-registered American company, Sea Containers, on 27 July 1984. Sealink is a promoter of the Bill to establish its powers to carry out the reclamation and the harbour development while extinguishing those powers established by the 1972 Act, which was granted to the Earlpar Development Company.

When buying Sealink, Mr. James Sherwood, the president of Sea Containers, could not obtain more than the Transport Act 1981 authorised British Rail to dispose of. Nor could he escape whatever liabilities were included in the package. This is a very important factor. Parliament authorised British Rail to sell its Sealink Harbours undertakings, of that part of Sealink which applied to Parkeston quay. Among those assets was the freehold of Bath Side bay's mud flats. That asset embraced its inherent potential for reclamation and development. Purchase of that development potential could mean nothing without a clear and sure liability for all the related engineering studies and the other works that had advanced the physical feasibility of the reclamation scheme during a period of 12 years.

"including all property rights and liabilities"

Reclamation and development of the Bath Side bay had been dreamt about and rejected as, at worst, impractical, and, at best, uneconomic, for many years. But about 1968, Robert Earley and Partners—now Earley Campling Lee and Partners — later in association with the Earlpar Development Company, commissioned studies which in 1969 were explained to British Rail. Thus was first established the feasibility of the scheme. That and a series of soil surveys, hydrological studies and other investigations were commissioned by the Earlpar Development Company, it having the copyright, which was made freely available to British Rail on the clear understanding—repeatedly confirmed — that the Earlpar Development Company would carry out the scheme.

As regards British Rail, and later Sealink, it lay with the freeholder to grant a development agreement so that Earlpar Development Company could have access to the tidal mud flats in the first place. That development agreement was to be followed by a lease of the land once it had been reclaimed.

British Rail was throughout sympathetic, even enthusiastic, but anxieties about competition and a greed for extracting the maximum reliability inhibited progress. The consultant's—Earlpar Development Company—first approach was on 22 October 1969, and it was rewarded with a sympathetic reply from British Rail early in 1970, setting the tone of the relationship which would exist for the next 14 years.

The letter from British Rail read:

"I assure you that if any useful developments could be introduced into the Bath Side area at Harwich, the Board would be only too pleased to assist by making land available. Our past considerations of this matter have always led us to believe that the cost of reclamation would be prohibitive, but since your company appear to be sure that more modern methods of reclamation will make this a feasible proposition, you may rest assured that the Board do not wish to place any obstacle in your way."

A series of letters and meetings followed, during which, in April 1971, British Rail confirmed its intent to the point that Earlpar enjoyed its support for the Bath Side Bay Development Bill, which was enacted in August 1972. One and a half years later, in February 1974, draft heads of intention were agreed in a 10,000-word document of 34 pages. The worst sticking points were British Rail's protectionist requirement against Earlpar's port servicing trade with Benelux or any port in France as far west as Boulogne. But, despite that, three letters from the British Rail chairman, Mr. Richard Marsh—who is now in the Upper House — confirmed British Rail's readiness to proceed.

Progress was impeded by the Harbours Act 1964, because no port development above a certain capital cost could proceed without section 9 consent, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Fife, Central. The Government would grant this only after consulting the National Ports Council. That body needed a bankable, contractual user commitment to prove that the user was ready to guarantee the use of X facilities over Y number of years at Z cost. This had to be in terms sufficient to service and later to redeem the capital invested. Such a commitment was required for a harbour that was unbuilt on land that was then unreclaimed. That inhibiting requirement remained in force until it was repealed by the Ports (Finance) Act 1985 — about the time that Sea Containers approached Sealink.

As far back as 1972, Earlpar's first application for a section 9 consent was refused, but the company was invited to return with a further application. That was submitted in April 1974 but rejected eight months later. The grounds for rejection were political: that such a private enterprise project could not be allowed to pre-empt the then Government's policy of nationalising the ports.

By the autumn of 1977 the company was back in negotiation. British Rail gave a letter of support for a third application for section 9 consent, but the application failed because British Rail's terms for a trading clause to protect its narrow shipping interests, Benelux to Boulogne, were found to conflict with article 85 of the treaty of Rome.

British Rail proposed funding the development itself, employing Earlpar as its agent, with its Act. British Rail finally withdrew from this plan because of the trading climate, but gave yet another letter of intent dated June 1980 to enable Earlpar to try once more for section 9 consent and to help it in raising the finance. Four months later the then Secretary of State for the Environment extended the powers of the 1972 Act until 9 August 1992.

In July 1981 the company was at last given a section 9 consent for reclamation alone. The company also received British Rail's proposals to extend its letter of intent to take account of the new situation. Unfortunately, progress was inhibited by the prospect of Sealink being privatised under the Transport Act 1981. As long as privatisation was pending, no finance could be firmed up.

The purchase of Sealink by Sea Containers on 29 July 1984 was quickly followed by Mr. James Sherwood's public announcement that he meant to reclaim Bath Side bay and to develop that whole frontage as a major new port complex in competition with Felixstowe across the water. Mr. Sherwood's company took over at a favourable time because, thanks to Earlpar's warning, initiative and plans, the British Railways Board, the Harwich harbour authority and the Essex county council all saw the danger of a missed opportunity.

The harbour authority had been planning to dump at sea all the rich sandy spoil dredged up in deepening its estuary channel. The authority agreed to put the spoil ashore at Bath Side and thus get the reclamation started. The dredging was carried out by Harwich Harbour Conservancy Board, and deposition of the spoil on Bath Side was funded by Essex county council, as it was then, to prepare for the Dovercourt bypass road. It was done with the consent of Sealink which, to be fair, was the freeholder, but it was also done with the authorisation of the Secretary of State for Transport. That authorisation was given on 29 November 1984, and he cited section 34 of the Coast Protection Act 1949.

The company had a large number of contacts with the authorities and they certainly require to be spoken about, because it has to be proved that Earlpar has been unfairly dealt with by this new company, Sea Containers.

Mr. Fairbairn: My hon. Friend spoke about section 34 of the Coast Protection Act 1949 and said that it was used by the Secretary of State to obtain the necessary powers or to frustrate the company. Does my hon. Friend think that was a proper thing to do, or does he think that it demonstrates the fallacy and falsehood of the Bill?

Mr. McQuarrie: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for his comments. He is quite right. The action by the Secretary of State demonstrates the fallacy and the shortfall in the Bill.

The chronological summary of Earlpar's progress commences in October 1969 and continues until the summer of 1974 when negotiations with the British Railways Board and its property division resulted in British Rail making a clear statement of its wish to proceed.

In 1972, the first rejection of the application for section 9 consent under the Harbours Act 1964 took place. In April 1972 the company was granted planning consent, and in 1973 draft heads of intention were proposed by British Rail. In 1974 the second rejection on political grounds of a section 9 application occurred. In February 1975, this phase of talks with British Rail was concluded. From February 1975 until the end of 1977 efforts focused on securing a contractual user commitment to satisfy the essential requirement for National Ports Council support for another section 9 application. In 1978 and 1981, further conversations took place with British Rail to try to arrange an agreement.

Mr. Fairbairn: My hon. Friend is rushing through these matters. These important negotiations were an attempt to create employment by redeeming this land and making port facilities. The negotiations were important. They are not matters that we can pass over just by saying that they took place in those years. Why was there no acceptance of a matter about which we are being asked to pass a Bill to make possible immediately?

Mr. McQuarrie: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for drawing attention to that. I have no wish to delay the House, but equally I have no wish that the House should not hear what should be said about this Bill. If my hon. and learned Friend feels that I am rushing through it —as he knows, it is my wont to speak fast rather than slowly—I shall endeavour to speak a little more slowly for his benefit. I agree that these are important matters. Important discussions took place. They cannot be taken lightly, and I do not want to give the impression that they were rushed. A lot of detail was covered in the discussions and I shall come to that during my speech.

In 1978 yet another section 9 application was made. It was frustrated when it was discovered that restrictive clauses in the proposed Bath Side bay agreement protecting Sealink traffic from Benelux to Boulogne would conflict with article 85 of the treaty of Rome.

In 1979, British Rail proposed that it would make a direct investment in the project. That was a clear indication of British Rail's confidence that Earlpar was on the right track with the project. Unfortunately, negotiations proved abortive during 1980 because of the heavy front-end loading of the scheme and the forecast of delayed returns. British Rail issued a further letter of intent in 1980 and it was later given an extension verbally. In August 1980, the Bath Side bay Development Act was extended to 1992. In July 1981, section 9 consent was granted for reclamation only. At that stage efforts were focused on raising funds, but these were inhibited by the privatisation programme included in the Transport Act 1981.

In March 1984, there was news of the Harwich Harbour Conservancy Board's plan to dump at sea spoil obtained from estuarial dredging. From April to July of 1984 there were intensive negotiations with Sealink, the Harwich Harbour Conservancy Board and Essex county council to ensure that the spoil was used for partial reclamation. Authorisation to dump the spoil on Bath Side bay was given by the Department of Transport in November 1984. On 27 July 1984, Sealink sold to Sea Containers Ltd. At that stage, further conversations with Harwich Terminal Holdings Ltd. were brought to a halt. In November 1984 dredging started and spoil was deposited according to the plans of Harwich International Terminals. In March 1985 a conversation with Sea Containers was closed by Sea Containers.

Sir Julian Ridsdale: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the reasons for the breaking off of the negotiations was the absurd price of £7·24 million asked by Harwich Terminal Holdings for the work that it had done beforehand?

Mr. McQuarrie: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for drawing that to my attention. It is an important matter.

Mr. Bill Walker: My hon. Friend has considerable experience of the construction industry and he knows what happens when work is partially completed. He will be aware of the importance of technical information. Is it his experience that one starts negotiations from a bargaining position and that no one expects the first bargaining position to be accepted?

Mr. McQuarrie: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention.

I reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Harwich by saying that the original offer, on the advice of Hambros bank, was to ask for compensation of £7·24 million. Sea Containers did not even entertain discussions with Earlpar, the development company, because the conversations which commenced in March 1985 were closed by Sea Containers without any offer of compensation.

In July 1985, contact was resumed and there was a meeting with Mr. James Sherwood at which HIT was invited to make new proposals. In November 1985 proposals were put forward by HIT, but Mr. Sherwood did not respond. It is unfair to suggest that HIT asked for £7·24 million — a request which was thrown out by Sea Containers and Mr. James Sherwood—without making any alternative proposal. Had there been some form of negotiation on meaningful terms of a financial return to HIT for nearly 15 years of work, we would not be discussing these important issues tonight.

Sea Containers found everything necessary for partial reclamation to begin when it took over, and at no expense to itself. It also found a library of technical feasibility studies which over the years Earlpar had made freely available to British Railways Board's engineers as well as to the Harwich harbour authority and the Anglian water authority. In the light of no fewer than five demonstrations by the British Railways Board of its manifest intention that the Earlpar project should go ahead, eventually Earlpar placed no embargo on material, nor thought of stressing its own copyright.

I turn to the company's contact with Sea Containers. Following the takeover of Sealink, Earlpar made contact with Sea Containers to discuss collaboration on the outright sale of its company and its Act; the rights to the studies conducted over a period of nearly 15 years; and the score or so of consents that Earlpar had obtained. It was advised by its merchant banker, as my hon. Friend the Member for Harwich has said, to propose a figure of £7·24 million as compensation for nearly 15 years of work. That was rejected by Sea Containers in the spring of 1985, and the matter has gone no further.

Sir Julian Ridsdale: I think my hon. Friend is wrong in saying that the matter has gone no further. I said when I addressed the House that at this stage negotiations have been offered at top level between the two companies. The offer was made that the negotiations should take place tomorrow. Does my hon. Friend agree that the issue should be taken up in Committee and that it should not be used as a reason for opposing Second Reading?

Mr. McQuarrie: I am sure that my hon. Friend does not want to mislead the House. Perhaps he is not in possession of the information with which I have been supplied. I do not suggest that he is wrong or that I am wrong. The information that has been conveyed to me, no later than this afternoon—indeed, earlier this evening—is to the effect that negotiations are not in hand, not even with the junior members of Sea Containers. If my hon. Friend can give the House positive information on who is conducting the negotiations and which member of HIT or Earlpar is involved in them, it will be for the benefit of the House to hear it.

Sir Julian Ridsdale: I have in my hand a letter dated 28 April 1986 from Sherwoods. The final sentence reads:

"Should your clients wish to pursue this, it is suggested that they make an approach to Mr. Sherwood or Mr. Bray direct."

Mr. McQuarrie: I shall address myself to that alleged letter in due course. I can tell the House that as far as I am concerned there is no such letter in existence. That is the position of Earlpar.

Mr. Fairbairn: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. If, during the course of Second Reading of a private Bill, a company had offered a financial inducement to those who are resisting it to resist, is that not improper?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): This matter can legitimately be debated on Second Reading, but it is not a matter for the Chair.

Mr. McQuarrie: I hope that I have not got my hon. and learned Friend wrong. I hope that he is not suggesting that any negotiation between the parties, even at this late stage, is irregular. My hon. Friend the Member for Harwich has said that he is in possession of a letter, but I can tell him that Lord Lauderdale, to whom the hon. Member for Fife, Central referred, has told me that no such letter exists as far as his organisation is concerned. I must take the word of the noble Lord who has had so much to do with the Bill.

Sir Julian Ridsdale: That shows how much better this could have been dealt with, if my hon. Friend had allowed it, in Committee rather than on Second Reading. I am pleased to say that I have this letter, dated 28 April, which is in reply to a letter of 28 April from Dyson Bell and Co, acting for Lord Lauderdale.

Mr. McQuarrie: I hope that there will be a little time for my hon. Friend to respond to some of the points that have been raised, so that he can tell the House what the letter says about financial compensation to Earlpar. Some of us feel that an injustice has been done to a company that has spent nearly 15 years developing something and then, because some big brother has taken over the place, has been thrown out without any question of compensation. That simply is not on, and I regret to say to my hon. Friend the Member for Harwich that that is the pertinent point that I am trying to illustrate.

Mr. Fairbairn: This has now been going on for a long time. Can my hon. Friend speculate on how it has come to pass that a letter, offering to negotiate, came from the other side on 28 April which, if I am not mistaken, is tonight?

Mr. McQuarrie: I am grateful for that point. The letter is in response to a request for negotiations made several weeks ago. As soon as the names went down on the blocking motion, Sea Containers finally saw fit to make a sign to Lord Lauderdale and his colleagues that it wished to have talks. It did not get beyond that. I know that my colleagues and other hon. Members are anxious to speak, but the case must be proven, and Mr. Sherwood has an obligation to Earlpar that he has not so far honoured.

Mr. Sherwood and his assistant, Mr. David Bray, met Earlpar's directors in July 1985 for a further discussion. Mr. Sherwood spoke of the possibility of a new private Bill, and he was warned that it was certain to run into difficulties, if only because of its conflict with the present Act. He finished by inviting Earlpar to make a new proposal, which it did. In November, Mr. Bray repeated the invitation to the chairman of Earlpar's holding company, Mr. Anthony Reardon-Smith, to write in with his suggestions for discussions with Sealink that week.

In the meantime, Earlpar has received approaches from a British shipping company of worldwide standing, eager to develop a container facility at the port, eager to do business through Earlpar, and able to play a significant part in funding. What is more, it is eager to give employment in an area which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Harwich has said, has high unemployment.

Sealink's plan, as explained to Earlpar at the meeting in July and as is implicit in the Bill, is to develop the harbour works piecemeal, working eastwards from Parkeston quay as user commitments become available. As Sealink has lately been losing user commitments to Felixstowe, the introduction of a substantial potential user should have been of interest, as well as being a sign of Earlpar's continued readiness to co-operate on reasonable terms.

Earlpar sent proposals on 28 November 1985 to Mr. Bray, from whom it received no acknowledgement, let alone a reply. In recent weeks, since a petition against the Bill was deposited, Sealink has said that the proposals have been answered by telephone—not by a letter, in a good business way — rejecting Earlpar's proposals. Earlpar has said that it can only say that that is the case. It had no communication from Mr. Bray until a message was passed through Sealink's parliamentary agents a week ago, after a proposal put forward in November 1985.

Let me now summarise my conclusions. It was Earlpar that convinced British Rail and then Sealink of the feasibility of the scheme. Earlpar has provided, and owns, the critical engineering studies enabling the project to go forward. The company's powers have another six years to run. Thanks to Earlpar's initiatives, one third of the bay has been reclaimed at no cost to Sealink. In turn, that may have modified the capital cost of the reclamation and development project by up to 30 per cent.

The historic obstacle to Earlpar's scheme — the requirement for section 9 consent, based on a bankable contractual user commitment for a harbour, as yet unbuilt, on land, as yet unclaimed—no longer obtains, because Earlpar has done a first-class job. Earlpar has a sound and potential user, eager to do business on starting the port development and supplied with ample resources.

No doubt the promoters have ample resources of their own, but the very range of their interests could be an argument against coherent supervision. Their attitude to the matter is likely to be distracted by association with a mixed bag of divergent interests. Apart from five other Sealink harbours — Stranraer, Heysham, Holyhead, Newhaven and Folkestone—and some 12 ferry routes, they include entry to the leisure markets with the Venice-Simplon Orient Express, ownership of several former British Rail hotels, as well as one in Venice, a project for a Peking-Hong Kong version of the Orient Express, not to say tourist steamers on Lake Windermere, the "Gourmet's Discriminating Guide to London" and the Illustrated London News.

This resort to the private Bill procedure to secure repeal of an Act enjoying another six years to run should not be permitted as long as the company that has spent nearly 15 years developing the project has not been compensated. My hon. Friend the Member for Harwich must give us a firm guarantee that positive steps will be taken. I do not consider that the Committee is the place for that undertaking to be given. It must be given on the Floor of the House. If he does not have the information, I ask him to endeavour to get it from wherever it is available. Unless he can give us that information, the Bill should be rejected out of hand.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Michael Spicer): At this point I shall briefly tell the House the Government's view on the Bill. It is the traditional view for all Bills of this type.

The Government have considered the contents of the Bill and have no objection to the powers sought by Sealink Harbours Ltd. A few minor drafting points have been raised in correspondence with the promoters, but I have no reason to believe that they will not be cleared up satisfactorily.

The debate has already shown that the issue is not without controversy. The speech of the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) and the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. McQuarrie) have certainly left that in no doubt. As has been pointed out, there are four petitioners outstanding against the Bill. The Government's position, which is traditional, is that they will have the opportunity to present their objections to the Private Bill Committee. The Committee will undertake the function given to it by Parliament to examine in detail the issues involved, with the advantage of being able to hear expert evidence.

[Mr. Michael Spicer]

Therefore, as is traditional for the Government in the circumstances, I recommend to the House that the Bill be given a Second Reading, and——

Mr. McQuarrie: I am surprised to hear my hon. Friend say that the Government are supporting a private Bill. Surely the Government are supposed to stand apart from private legislation.

Mr. Spicer: Perhaps I did not stress it sufficiently clearly, or perhaps my hon. Friend did not hear me say, that the Government, as is traditional with private Bills, believe that the matter should go to the Private Bill Committee which, as my hon. Friend knows, has substantial powers to amend the Bill. The Government take the view—to that extent they are neutral—that that is the best forum for private Bills to be discussed in detail.

Mr. Bill Walker: Have my hon. Friend the Minister and the Department of Transport had an opportunity to consider in depth the implication for private legislation if subsequent legislation to repeal Acts which give companies powers is introduced? If so, what is the Department's view?

Mr. Spicer: The Department is not responsible for the business of the House. As my hon. Friend knows, the matter is under consideration. I am advised that the Committee could consider that point. It has the powers to do so. I have listened with great interest to the debate about whether this is the best procedure, but it is right for the Department to have a view on the matter.

Mr. Fairbairn: Surely even the Department of Transport must occasionally speak to the Department of Trade and Industry. Is it not horrified if General Motors, as an American company, is not to be allowed to interfere with our beloved British Land Rover, and that an American company is to be allowed to interfere with a company created in 1972? It is not that we are handing something away. We are revoking an Act of Parliament which gives to a British company something that an American company wants an Act of Parliament to revoke.

Mr. Spicer: My hon. and learned Friend makes an interesting point which he will undoubtedly make to the Committee. Parliament has laid down that the matter should go to a Private Bill Committee, and that is the only point that I seek to make. Because of that view which is traditionally taken by the Government, the Government believe that the Bill should be given a Second Reading.

Mr. Roger Stott (Wigan): I, too, wish to make a short intervention in the family argument on the Conservative Benches. It is clear who has drawn the short straw.

It has been interesting to listen to the proceedings thus far, especially the intervention of the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn) in his gesture of contrived anger about what is going on between an American company and a British company. I participated in the proceedings on the Bill which became the Transport Act 1981. My hon. Friends and I told the then Minister that something like this might happen. I did not see then the massed ranks of the Conservative party opposing the privatisation of Sealink, the Sealink Harbours and British Rail interests in the matter. I shall come to that in a moment. This evening I do not intend to arbitrate in the row between Earlpar and Sealink—two well-heeled, rich companies which have their advocates in the Tory party.

It is right to say that the private Bill procedure needs to be examined. My hon. Friend the Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) outlined many points with which most hon. Members agree. It is anachronistic that we should proceed in this way during the second half of the 20th century. Parliament needs to examine its procedures more closely in future.

The question about section 9 of the Harbours Act 1964 was raised by the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. McQuarrie), who duly read his brief word for word, and my hon. Friend the Member for Fife, Central. That particular section was removed by statutory instrument in an hour and a half's debate in the House some time ago. I spoke against its removal because it was one piece of legislation which would prevent piecemeal port development from taking place.

We in the Labour party are worried that we have no ports policy of any description. I make that point every time I stand at the Dispatch Box. The removal of section 9 makes possible piecemeal ports development all over the place without regard to the United Kingdom's total tonnage capacity, to the damage that it may do to other existing ports or to the proper considerations of a marine and port policy. My arguments on that are firmly on the record, so I need not repeat them now.

As I understand it, the arguments are not the same as they were when we were opposing the development of Felixstowe, which we did for many reasons. First, Felixstowe was being built on a site of outstanding natural beauty. I do not think that that is so in this case. Secondly, the site of Felixstowe was an area of special scientific interest. My hon. Friends deployed those two arguments against the extension of Felixstowe.

The third argument, which I used, was about overcapacity in the ports industry. There is too much capacity, and any further piecemeal development, no matter where it occurs, is bound to have a knock-on effect with other United Kingdom ports. That is why we need a proper ports policy which will take into account the capacity of containerisation, and can designate where ports are and are not developed. If we keep developing the east coast, it will mean west coast closures and Channel port problems. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) says that that is not so, but he knows as well as I do of the difficulties that may occur at Ipswich because of the development at Felixstowe. I do not wish to provoke him to his feet because I do not wish to say much more. Nevertheless, it is worth bearing in mind that we do not have a proper ports policy, and we do not seem to know where we are going.

Mr. Sherwood who owns Sea Containers and Sealink is a promoter of the Channel tunnel — strange bedfellows. His scheme did not find favour, but one did — the rail-only Channel Tunnel Group scheme. The freight shipped through the Channel tunnel on railway lines will affect the amount of freight likely to pass through British ports. We should carefully consider whether to give permission to further harbour developments while we bear in mind that the Channel tunnel will be built.

I do not object to the Bill being given a Second Reading. Hon. Members will have their day in Committee when all the points of the hon. Member for Harwich (Sir J. Ridsdale) will be discussed. It is sad that we do not have a clear policy on our direction in the ports industry.

Mr. Fairbairn: What is the Labour party's policy? What is its policy for Perth harbour?

Mr. Stott: It is clear that the hon. and learned Gentleman does not read Labour party publications or documents on transport policy. He has not read the latest publication in which we explain a series of options. We are developing a strategy for the ports industry. The hon. and learned Gentleman appears to be concerned, but I do not know where he was late on that night when we discussed the statutory instrument that removed section 9 of the Harbours Act 1964. If he felt as I do, he should have supported my hon. Friends and me in arguing for its retention.

If section 9 had been retained it would not have been possible to undertake these developments without requiring the Secretary of State to give his approval. Presumably, the Secretary of State would give his approval only if he thought that the development of a particular harbour was in the national interest, not in the interest merely of the promoter calling for the development of that harbour. Harbour development should be conducted not on a piecemeal basis but on a national basis first. On the east coast, the two big fat cats of Harwich and Felixstowe are fighting it out in the interests of no one but themselves.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): Until the interventions of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State and the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott), the debate had been a contest between Essex and Scotland. I am a Suffolk Member with a riparian interest, as my hon. Friend the Member for Harwich (Sir J. Ridsdale) knows, because Felixstowe and Ipswich are Suffolk ports and share the same haven with Harwich. I have taken a close interest in the matter and at the weekend read with interest the promoter's arguments and some of the arguments of the petitioners. We have been treated to some views that do not appear in any petition against the Bill but reflect the concerns of those at Earlpar who previously were involved in the engineering works in the Bathgate area.

I support the Bill and urge the House to give it a Second Reading. I stand firmly with my hon. Friend the Member for Harwich, who put the matter, as is his custom, succinctly and well. I support the Bill for local reasons. Harwich, with its unemployment level, needs investment and will benefit from the jobs created by the measure. It is no small matter that the legislation proposes total investment of about £100 million, of which about £33 million will be on construction. That is bound to result in hundreds of jobs, which must be something of which the House will approve. That is more important than the debate about who gets what with respect to Earlpar and the promoters.

Mr. Fairbairn: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I shall give way, but I want to make a relatively serious and short speech. I do not want to become too involved in legalistics with my hon. and learned Friend.

Mr. Fairbairn: I shall not be legalistic. My hon. Friend claims that expenditure of £100 million is proposed in the legislation. I took the trouble to read the Bill and it makes no such proposal. Where does my hon. Friend suggest that that proposal is made?

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I did not say that and, if my hon. and learned Friend had been listening, he would not have imagined it. I said that the project involved expenditure of about £100 million. I am in favour of that.

I am in favour of the Bill for local reasons. I say, as one who was a transport Minister for a number of years, that, if British Rail had continued to be the manager of the port of Harwich, it would not have achieved the investment level now proposed. I have nothing against British Rail, but its management of the port of Harwich was not good enough. I, for one, am glad that Sealink has taken over the facilities. That is part of our privatisation policy, which I believe is successful. I am glad that private enterprise is providing for Harwich what public enterprise so lamentably failed to do for so long.

I support the Bill also because it is right to have competition among the haven ports. The port of Ipswich is efficient in handling relatively small, specialist cargoes, and I know it well. The port has developed and its progress is assured, especially with the new highway system that the Government have managed to provide for it and the other haven ports.

By any measure, Felixstowe is one of our great national success stories. It has come from nothing in the 1953 floods to being arguably the most efficient port in western Europe. It is a jewel in the east Anglian crown. Felixstowe's progress, when the private Bill on Felixstowe is supported by the House, will further the improvement of our ports industry in the haven area. It is right that there should be competition. As Harwich, too, comes forward, the industries and businesses of east Anglia will have a choice and an opportunity to use Ipswich, Felixstowe or Harwich. We shall have riches in our ports industry, and that will be good.

Felixstowe has raised some objections. It is concerned about whether there should be a seawall or a bung. The promoters say that shelving sand will be sufficient. I do not know the answer, but I am sure that the two ports will work together intelligently to find a sensible answer. I hope that the Committee will form a view on the best engineering solution to that problem. I have read with interest the views of those who wish to look after Gas House creek. That is a perfectly proper matter for the Committee to consider, as I am sure it will. I believe that proper provision will be made.

I am not impressed by the arguments of Mrs. Cullen, whose petition was disallowed by the Committee referees. I listened carefully to the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton). I share his concern about the need to modernise our private Bill procedure. I have sat on enough private Bill Committees, and avoided sitting on more, as the House will understand, to be well aware of the disadvantages of that procedure. I hope that when the House considers private Bill procedure it will not throw out the baby with the bath water because many of the private Bill Committees achieve a profound examination of matters that it would be impossible for us to handle on the Floor of the House. I believe that on balance it is a good procedure and should be changed only cautiously and sparingly. The detailed questions about the Bill can and will be handled intelligently either by negotiation or in Committee or both.

[Sir Eldon Griffiths]

Above all, I support the Bill because it is in the national interest to help the development of East Anglia. In the previous century East Anglia was a forgotten region. It was cut off by the Fens and by poor transport. Today it is Britain's new frontier. It is a fortunate area in that our trade has turned around to the European ports. I believe that 58 per cent. of our trade is with the European Economic Community. Felixstowe, Ipswich and Harwich have certainly benefited from that. East Anglia is also fortunate in that the great research and development centre of Cambridge is beginning to spill over high-tech and biotech into our market towns and provide new, modern and competitive industries. We are also fortunate in that as Stansted develops to the south it will provide us with a new regional airport. I am not in favour of a large Stansted. I have opposed it. However, a modest development at Stansted will complement the tremendous development of the ports and the benefits of academia coming from Cambridge university into our regions. It must be right in a developing region such as East Anglia that the ports industry should go ahead to assist British exports.

I am glad that the hon. Member for Wigan ended by taking a neutral view about the Bill and commending the House to give it a Second Reading so that it can be considered in greater detail in Committee. During my time as a transport Minister, when I had a particular responsibility for ports, I put large sums of Harbours Act money into two of our main west coast ports — Liverpool and Bristol. There was about £45 million for the west dock in Bristol, which was much more money in those days than it is today, and, as I recall, I put a further £40 million into Liverpool to build the new Seaforth dock. There was tangible evidence of investment in the western ports in the belief that they would benefit from modernisation. I am sorry to say that in Liverpool most of it was thrown away by restrictive practices, bad management and the general mood of the country looking more and more to the east. Similarly, although the west dock in Bristol has moved forward — you were very conscious, Mr. Deputy Speaker, at the time of the development in that area—I am not convinced that the money in question would not have been better spent if it had been put into the modernisation of the port of London and perhaps of Felixstowe, too.

Any national ports policy has to take account of the fact that our trade is now to the east. The great world girdling container vessels, which will stop only once in north-west Europe, must have a port in this country where we can handle the goods with speed and efficiency so that they are attracted to come here and not simply to Rotterdam. On a national level, there is only one place where those ports can be provided—that is, on the North sea where they can compete with Rotterdam. It is an unfortunate fact of geography—I say this as someone who was born and grew up in the north-west and who wrote his first essay about the great docks of Liverpool when I was a schoolboy —that our economic structure has altered. We now look more to the east than to the west. Therefore, any national ports policy must comprehend the building of modern and efficient ports within the East Anglian region.

I should like to make this suggestion. Like many others, I have toiled on private Bill Committees. I think, if I am not mistaken, that the first that I sat on, which was one of the longest, concerned your constituency, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It was about the building of a steel jetty from south Wells in such a fashion that it would have intruded on the maritime environment of the area that you so elegantly represent, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In the event, it was one of the many private Bills which, although passed, bit the dust, and the jetty was not proceeded with. You were one of those who opposed it, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Private Bill Committees are not the easiest and the best way to proceed, but the matters which have been fairly raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. McQuarrie), and which no doubt will be raised by other hon. Members who have still to speak, concern Earlpar's problems. There is an issue. Some compensation should be paid. But surely this is a matter for negotiation between the firms. It is not strictly a matter to be dealt with on the Floor of the House. The Committee is the best place to do it; the two firms are the best people to do it. I hope very much that justice will be done between them, but that is no reason for opposing the Second Reading of the Bill in the House.

9.6 pm

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): I should like to start from the point with which my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) finished. He said that there is no reason for opposing a Bill on the basis of a failed negotiation. I cannot agree with him at all. He represents the Police Federation and constantly speaks of the rights and morals of law and order, so I find that a strange point for him of all people to make.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: This is not criminal law. It is civil law.

Mr. Fairbairn: No. Although my hon. Friend may not know it, the civil law also starts from a moral stance. That is the moral stance of equality. It is exactly the same in the civil law as in the criminal law. The point is that there should not be handed to one party a weapon that makes it impossible for the other party to obtain its rights. That is the position that I find so constitutionally unacceptable about the Bill.

I find it extraordinary that Parliament, by whatever procedure—but, in this case, by a private procedure— should have passed an Act of Parliament in 1972 which gives this power to a specific company. I shall read part of the Act to demonstrate what Parliament said. It was "An Act to empower Earlpar Development Company Limited to construct and operate works at Bath Side Bay, Harwich; and for other purposes."

I share this feeling with many hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton), for whom, as he knows, I have a warm regard and with whom, oddly enough, I happen to agree on many matters. That may not be something which, in the evening of his time here, he would wish to be on his curriculum vitae. I am sorry, but it is something that will have to be written in. I agree; I find the procedure extraordinary. Nevertheless, Parliament had the capacity to grant to a company an Act of Parliament. After all, let us not forget that the business before the House, before 7 o'clock, was about empowering the shipbuilding industry to borrow hundreds of millions of pounds. That Bill was on two sides of a sheet of paper. We are dealing with an Act of Parliament, passed in 1972, which has 31 pages, 36 clauses, and a schedule. If Parliament took the trouble to pass an Act in 1972, granting powers to the Earlpar Development Company to which extend to 1992, it is a strange constitutional abuse of procedure that someone else should ask Parliament to remove those powers.

One cannot leave something in a will and then say, "By the way, I am terribly sorry, but my second cousin has come along and asked that the will be cancelled." We have given powers to the company to do certain things until 1992. Parliament cannot come along now and say, "We are terribly sorry, old chap. We have a big brother who wants to take those powers from you without compensation."

I asked my hon. Friend the Member for Harwich (Sir J. Ridsdale) whether there had been any negotiation as his reply might have cleared my mind. I asked him furthermore whether, in his view, the bargaining position in the negotiations would be altered by the passing of the Second Reading of the Bill. My hon. Friend could not answer either question, but he said in answer to one of my hon. Friends that a letter, which offered negotiations, had been sent on 28 April which, if I am not mistaken, is today.

We have heard in several of the contributions to the debate that there was a moment at which Earlpar Development Company, on the advice of its financial advisers, suggested that £7·24 million was the proper price to pay for the work which had hitherto been done and would be of benefit to those who inherited.

I do not know whether that figure is correct, whether it is an exaggerated price, absurdly high or absurdly low. I do not know how that figure relates to the work and I do not wish to develop that matter. However, if I am told that someone has seen my name, the name of the hon. Member for Fife, Central, the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker), the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher) or the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. McQuarrie) on the Order Paper stating that the Second Reading should be in six months time and a letter arrives on that day saying that negotiations will take place, I can only say that nothing would be or could be more equitable. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Member for Harwich could give me a satisfactory explanation—and I will give way if he wishes to do so—why, on 28 April, negotiations were suddenly offered.

As a lawyer I have always represented the law of Scotland and, without offending any Front Bench Members or any other Member of the House, let me say that that law has a more equitable and also a more sceptical approach to equity. I find it very odd that an offer should be made for negotiation on the day when it looked as if someone might block the ability to extinguish the rights of the other party to have any claim. If the rights granted by Parliament in 1972 — these are the rights, the absolute rights, the only rights under this complicated Act passed on 9 August 1972 — are extinguished or prospectively extinguished by the passing of this Second Reading, the letter of intent of today, so belatedly entered into, would immediately be withdrawn and not acted on.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I appreciate my hon. and learned Friend's apprehension and I, too, would be most unhappy if this Second Reading were, as it were, to close the door to the negotiation of the proper compensation that I think all of us would wish to achieve. But does not he accept that a Committee of the House can, if it is not satisfied with the arrangements that are proposed, throw out the Bill and the promoters will be back where they started? Therefore, there is no question of a prospective extinguishment of the rights of the original developers; rather it is a matter of whether my hon. and learned Friend is prepared to trust a Committee of the House to arrive at a just approach.

Mr. Fairbairn: I am interested in that concept of jurisprudence. I find it extraordinary, because if there had ever been any genuine intention to negotiate, a letter saying so would not have been dated today. It would have been proceeded with months ago, indeed, more than a year ago. The company would have said, "We are going to take over from you an asset." Indeed, it would not have needed a private procedure at all; it could have been bought. Therefore, I am sorry to say to my hon. Friend that I do not accept that concept at all.

Is my hon. Friend seriously saying to the House that a Committee will throw out a private Bill? We do not know who will be the members of the Committee. Is he saying that they will form a sort of civil court of their own and that, if they are not satisfied that there has been a proper civil award for work done and contractual obligations due, they will throw out the Bill? I have never heard such an extraordinary concept.

I know that we are the High Court of Parliament, but we are a High Court of Parliament that does not perform the allotment or aggregation of civil claims. When the High Court of Parliament looks like blocking a Bill for six months to concentrate the mind, in the same way that hanging does, I cannot understand why my hon. Friend should suggest that all of a sudden a Committee of the House of Commons, composed of we know not whom, should say, "We shall throw out the Bill because we are not satisfied that a civil claim, with which we have no right to deal, is not satisfactory." I have never heard such an extraordinary concept.

It is inequitable and wrong that a Bill of Parliament under private procedure should be allowed to deprive another company, which has done all the work, of its just claim and that another company, if this Bill were to be enacted, should get all the benefit. That is the most extraordinary concept of jurisprudence that I have ever heard.

If my hon. Friend genuinely means that, why has my hon. Friend the Member for Harwich been unable to answer my question about whether, if we pass the Second Reading tonight, the negotiating position of those in whose favour the Act was passed in 1972 will be improved or worsened by the passing of Second Reading?

Sir Eldon Griffiths: It will be exactly the same.

Mr. Fairbairn: My hon. Friend says that it is exactly the same. I do not think that it is exactly the same. As I am a Jacobite episcopalian, who thus has a certain scepticism about motivation, when I see that the offer to treat is dated 28 April after it had been seen that there was opposition, I say to myself, "Exactly the same, eh?" Let us suppose that none of us had put down our names.

Sir Julian Ridsdale rose——

Mr. Fairbairn: Let us suppose that there was no question of this matter being delayed for six months. Would people say exactly the same?

Sir Julian Ridsdale: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for giving way, particularly because he is labouring the point that this letter is dated 28 April and that this is the date when negotiations have been carried on. I have in my hand a letter from Sherwoods about the Bill which is dated 14 April. It says:

"When we considered with you at the telephone today a possible date for the proposed meeting to discuss the issue raised in your client's petition against this Bill, it appeared that the three alternative dates offered by the promoters would not be convenient. We have since obtained further instructions and are now able to offer the afternoon of Tuesday the 29th April. Please let us know whether a meeting in our offices at, say, 2.30 on that date would be acceptable."

Mr. Fairbairn: I am most obliged to my hon. Friend. I was hoping that an hon. Member would raise that date, too. It was the date when the hon. Member for Fife, Central was joined by Conservative Members on the motion that this Bill should not be considered for six months. I was waiting for the corroboration and was frightened that it would not come. But there it is. We have been persuaded that, because of this matter, an offer to treat has been made.

Mr. Sayeed: Will my hon. and learned Friend give way?

Mr. Fairbairn: In a moment.

When I examine witnesses, I try to understand the motivation of those who give evidence before me. When on the day that it is seen that there may be opposition—14 April—somebody sends a letter and when on the date of the Bill's Second Reading another letter is sent about dates being awkward, all I can say is that in six months' time a date when it is not awkward may have been found, when it would be more convenient not to snatch the baggage. I am sorry to say that I find the evidence ever more convincing that this is an attempt to steal the baggage. I shall develop that point later when I look at both Bills, having first given way to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Sayeed: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for giving way. I am sorry that he appears to demonstrate a lack of trust in a Committee of the House. He suggests that a Committee is not permitted to attach conditions to a Bill. However, I have already sat for 24 days on the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill. The proceedings have not yet been concluded, one of the reasons being that although we are prepared to support the Bill in principle we have attached conditions and the Chairman will not sign the Bill until those conditions are met. A Committee of this House, which I believe all right hon. and hon. Members should be able to trust, should be able to attach conditions that ensure an equitable agreement between the promoters and the objectors to the Bill.

Mr. Fairbairn It has been suggested, I think, that I would not trust a Committee. I would trust Committees to do many things, although I am not sure that I am willing to list them. However, I do not expect a Committee to say that a Bill will be granted provided that the compensation that should be paid for the extinction of the 1972 Act is £122,000,846, £648,000 or whatever. It would be meaningless and inappropriate for a Committee to say, "And we expect you to come to an equitable agreement."

I have served on many Committees, and on perhaps more than my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East (Mr. Sayeed). I am confident, particularly given our eccentric procedures, that they frequently reach a decision that is quite different from that intended by any of those serving on them. Therefore, without casting any aspersions on the honour and excellence of our Committees, I would not trust a Committee to come to an equitable conclusion when one party hopes to take from the other powers granted to it by an Act of Parliament until 1992.

It is not right that this procedure should be used by one company to take from another powers granted to it by Parliament. That is fundamentally objectionable. I might also find it fundamentally objectionable that Parliament should grant the first company any powers, but that is another matter. However, I am certain that Parliament cannot grant rights to one company in a full Act of Parliament and then remove those same powers in an Act of Parliament that makes no reference to the previous Act, other than occasionally to imitate its language and to refer in schedule 2 to

When I studied jurisprudence, private international law and constitutional law, I became aware that one could not grant powers and rights under a private Act—and possibly even under a public Act—and then pass an Act that repeals the first Act without any reference to compensation for the rights under it. Something cannot be confiscated without any compensation for it, and that is borne out by nationalisation Acts, Appropriation Acts and even by compulsory purchase orders. Whether an Act is private, or is a private Act that involves something such as compulsory purchase, as was the case with the Forth Bridge and Tay Bridge Acts, compensation is provided for the powers granted against those involved. But where is there any mention of compensation in this Bill? Where does it demonstrate the extinction of rights granted by Parliament in 1972? Hon. Members may say that this is a private family row, and may ask what Scotland has to do with East Anglia. The answer is that Parliament is a place of principle. It is astonishing that anybody should agree, in the wake of the recent idiotic political, anti-American little-Englandism, that an American company should be allowed to come to Parliament to take away from a British company, whose managing director is Scottish—that does not matter—powers granted to it without any reference to compensation.

Some say that the Committee can always deal with that, but this is the Chamber in which our rights are held. I do not believe that the hon. Members for Wigan (Mr. Stott) and for Fife, Central believe that if one loses in this Chamber one's ideas are safe in the next. As a lawyer I do not say to my client, "It does not matter if you lose in the first court because there is always the appeal court." That is not the order of events. If one does not win in the first court, one's chances thereafter are extremely doubtful. It is a question of tossing the coin. The principle must be decided here and not left to some unknown and undecided Committee, the composition of which we do not know.

Comparing the Act and the Bill, I am torn between two concepts. The first is that the Bill is a crib and the second is that it is a bad crib. The reason is that the powers granted under the 1972 Act which empower Earlpar Development Company Ltd. to construct and operate works at Bath Side bay are to be snatched from that company to allow Sealink Harbours Ltd. to construct works and to acquire land at Bath Side bay. The powers are approximately the same. The Bill also extends the limits of jurisdiction to Parkeston quay. Slightly different language is used, but we are talking about a snatch.

We are talking about a strange concept, because in private legislation all the suppositions and premises are stated, but they are in question. One states one's views and the Bill is the end result. It is interesting to note the comparisons between the two measures. The 1972 measure proceeded on the basis of a genuine proposition. It was said that the company had been formed for certain purposes and that "existing port facilities and allied services . . . in the counties of Essex and East Suffolk are insufficient for present and future needs."

That proposition is not contained in the Bill. The Act stated:

"it would be of national benefit and local advantage if improved and additional facilities and services were provided".

That proposition is not in the Bill. If the hon. Member for Wigan believes in the fantasy concept of a national ports policy, it may well start off by saying that in the counties of Suffolk and Essex the ports are "insufficient for present and future needs and it would be of national benefit and local advantage if improved and additional facilities and services were provided:"

To that extent, the 1972 Act provided a marvellous blueprint for a national ports policy. I notice that the Harwich Parkeston Quay Bill makes no claim upon either local requirements or national interests. To that extent, I hope I may get a nod of recognition from the hon. Member for Blaydon (Mr. McWilliam) for a policy I do not approve of — that is, if he is not too engaged with his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar), whose interest in this matter I know to be crucial.

It is important to compare the two pieces of legislation. When we read the meat of the legislation in section 2 we understand what the authorised works are. In the original Act, the authorised works meant

"works described in and authorised by section 4 of this Act."

In the new Bill it means

"the works and operations authorised by section 4 of this Act."

In other words, this Bill is a crib of the original Act to thieve the benefits. That thieving process was suddenly discovered, apparently, through a matter of negotiations 14 days ago and again today.

The company under the original Act meant Earlpar Development Company. The company under the new Bill means Sealink Harbours Limited. If that is not plain downright theft by a company which decided to negotiate when it realised that there were some people who proposed that Second Reading should not happen for another six months, I do not understand what brought it to the wisdom of negotiation so coincidentally 14 days ago, and when another letter went out on this very day because the dates were not convenient—the day of the Second Reading.

There are many matters which are imitated. One is not imitated and I would be interested to learn from the winding-up speech what makes the difference. In section 2(3) of the original Act, there is a phrase of some importance:

"All directions, distances, lengths and widths stated in any description of works, powers or lands shall be construed as if the words 'or thereabouts' were inserted after each such direction, distance, length and width".

If one considers the new Bill, which for once does not plagiarise the original Act, it states under clause 2(2):

"All directions, distances and lengths stated in any description of works, powers or lands shall be construed as if the words 'or thereabouts' were inserted after each such direction, distance and length."

I do not know whether this is a one-dimensional scheme which is being proposed under the Harwich Parkeston Quay Bill.

I should like to know how the concept of width disappears in measurement, or are we to take it that the Committee will be composed of philosopher kings? We are told, "Leave it to them." It is like Socrates' republic. It was a marvellous idea, but they could not find the philosopher kings to put it into practice. The Committee is to work out compensation and equity and will say that this is all the most marvellous concept that the world has ever seen.

In advance of the philosopher kings being selected, how was it thought in the Harwich Parkeston Quay Bill that all directions, distances and lengths stated in any description should be construed as if the words "or thereabouts" should apply to them, but not the width? Width evidently has to be absolute because, under the 1972 Act, it also had to be "or thereabouts".

The Committee which is to have these powers of remarkable insight might be told by Sealink that the pier will be 180 yd long, 60 ft deep and 640 in wide. The Committee might say, "We will not allow the Bill to proceed unless you provide us with a pier which, in a micrometer screw gauge is 640 in wide because, 'or thereabouts' will not do. It will do for depth and it will do for length but it will not do for width."

I understand that the Committee will be able to negotiate in what must be one of the most difficult arbitrations — the worth of the work done by the company. That arbitration is quite outside the powers and rights of any Committee. Nevertheless, it will apparently have to say, "Ah now, come to width, old chap. There is no 'or thereabouts' about that. Unless you can provide your pier sand plan, bunch, munch or bung, or whatever it is, to the amount that we say, you do not get your Act", because the company has not taken the power to say, "or thereabouts".

If I am told that the Committee is to be so wise that it will arbitrate in what would seem to me, if I was given the brief as a Queen's Counsel, an extremely difficult financial negotiation and that it will be able to refuse the Bill if an arbitration which it believes is equitable is not reached, I must ask on what basis it will make that judgment. I should have thought that it would be extremely easy to make that judgment because those who propose the Bill to extinguish rights granted by the 1972 Act will have no reason to negotiate at all.

Sir Julian Ridsdale: As it appears that I shall not be given the opportunity to reply, I should like to tell my hon. and learned Friend that I only wish that Lord Lauderdale had come to me as the Member of Parliament for Harwich who helped him considerably with the 1972 Bill and told me the facts and figures. I would then have been able to arbitrate between him and Sealink. That course was never followed by the noble Lord. I was suddenly confronted by the £7·2 million and by this new Bill. I am anxious to ensure that the sorely needed jobs of my constituents will be there. Some of the things said by Scottish hon. Members are not correct, and I hope that they will have the confidence to rely on me not only to look after my constituents whose jobs are under threat but also to see that a fair arbitration takes place.

Mr. Fairbairn: I am obliged to my hon. Friend the Member for Harwich, and I take his remarks seriously. My hon. Friend will note that the motion that stands in my name and the names of the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) and of my hon. Friends the Members for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker), Banff and Buchan (Mr. McQuarrie), Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher) and Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) makes the proposal that Second Reading should be postponed for six months.

There is in Scotland at the moment an arbitration about a hospital. That is a matter of no greater complication than this matter. It is estimated that that arbitration may take 12 years. If my hon. Friend the Member for Harwich thinks that six months is a long time in the life of an arbitration, I must tell him that I do not. I say with the greatest sincerity that it is a short time for any development that might come about in his constituency to provide jobs.

In that six months, if my hon. Friend can reach an equitable agreement after arbitration for work done under powers granted by Parliament which persist for another six years, I will be more than happy when he brings his Bill forward in six months time to do all that I can to ensure that every Scottish company and every asset is directed towards creating work in his constituency. Every hon. Member of whatever party wants to create work in his constituency.

It is not that I do not trust my hon. Friend, but given the history of non-negotiation and sudden negotiation it is clear that there is no real intent to negotiate by those who seek to extinguish the powers granted by Parliament to the Earlpar company. I would not be a party to the Second Reading of any Bill, public or private, that sought to remove powers and rights granted to a party where there was not in the whole Bill any mention of compensation or arbitration.

It may be of interest to my hon. Friend the Member for Harwich to have regard to the 1972 Act in which the matter of arbitration is specifically mentioned. My hon. Friend says that he will use his good offices to arbitrate and at the same time introduces a Bill to extinguish rights granted by Parliament. The Act granting those rights specifically deals with the matter of arbitration. The hon. Member does not mention arbitration, but gives his word as the result of a letter written on the day when those of us who are asking that this matter be postponed for six months happened to put our names down. There was another letter today, but that has not been received by those to whom it was sent because they are taking part in this debate.

I am sorry to say that, notwithstanding all the generosity within my heart, I do not believe the good will of those on behalf of whom my hon. Friend speaks. However, I shall believe in the equity and honour of those on behalf of whom he speaks if tonight we decide that the Bill's Second Reading should be postponed for six months. I do not know the procedures that apply in the consideration of these matters and perhaps the hon. Member for Fife, Central does. However, if we are successful and the Bill is not considered for a further six months, we may come to know within the rules of the House that by chance and coincidence rather than chastening the matter has been resolved. That might be tomorrow, next week, or in two months' time. If that happens and if there is anything that we can do to hasten the building by one company or the other of the facilities that will provide employment in my hon. Friend's constituency, I am sure that we shall do it.

If my hon. Friend wishes to have employment in his constituency, what is wrong with the contracts that were entered into to undertake developments under the powers given by Parliament in the 1972 Act, which would provide employment in my hon. Friend's constituency? What is so special about employment that is created by Sealink, the American company, and what is so poor about employment by Earlpar?

I do not know what steps my hon. Friend took. He may have been industrious, and, if he was, I shall applaud him. He may have taken steps with the Department of Transport and other Departments to stop all the blocking of attempts by Earlpar to continue its development over the years. If my hon. Friend is so concerned about employment in his constituency, I do not know whether he took those steps. What I do know is that I can see a rogue deal at a great distance.

We are discussing a minor private measure which involves a principle which my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) and others have raised in the House. We have heard much about the patriotism of the British people being shattered. It is a terrible concept that Americans should own a British company or invest in Britain in any way. This is a private measure that seeks to allow an American company that is based in Bermuda to take from a British company based and registered in England — I use "England" in its proper sense, but there is suitable Scottish representation and guidance — powers that have been granted by Parliament, and to do so without compensation. I find it extraordinary that my hon. Friend should propose that the House should approve a measure which goes contrary to all the principles that are held by those on the Government Benches.

Mr. Stott: Capitalism.

Mr. Fairbairn: With the greatest respect to the hon. Gentleman, removing something from somebody by legislation without compensation has never been conceived, even by Socialism, or achieved in the House, and I hope that it will never be, although it is sometimes threatened.

It is contrary to the principles of Conservative Members, and to the concept announced with apparently shattering effect on the Government and Cabinet, that a foreign company based in Bermuda should be in a position to take away from a British company its right to development. My hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds may be right in saying that East Anglia is, in some way, the heaven on earth of Great Britain, but that is not the view that I have formed. I thought that Scotland had certain advantages that were rather greater, especially in Perthshire and the port of Perth, which has great capabilities that I hope the hon. Member for Wigan will not forget in his national docks policy.

The English often forget that Scotland also has an east coast. There is no particular advantage in East Anglia that there is not in east Lothian, east Perthshire or east Fife. The greatest European trade, and the cause of Christianity coming to Scotland in the first place, was the trade between Flanders and Fife. They missed out East Anglia, and did so wisely, if the East Anglians are as perverse as they appear to be in introducing legislation that attempts to remove from those who are granted them by Parliament powers on trade and development, without compensation or without reference to compensation.

It is extraordinary to use a private Bill to attempt to extinguish powers granted by an Act of Parliament merely by referring in schedule 2 to the extinguishing of a whole Act without compensation or justification, extent or reason. There is no question that the work that has been done under the 1972 Act was passed, in good faith and in confidence, to British Rail and by it to Sealink which was, to all intents and purposes, British Rail. That being so, the company should have been rewarded.

Why is it claimed, as I think that it has been by my hon. Friend the Member for Harwich, that some negotiations are available, which were put in prospect when we tabled the motion objecting to the Bill, suggesting that six months is not too long a time to do a little arbitration? If there was no claim by the Earlpar company, Sealink has nothing to fear and, if it has a claim, it is outrageous that Parliament should be asked to extinguish that claim through legislation. That is a constitutional wrong of which the Minister should take account. For Parliament to extinguish a civil claim by legislation is wrong. If there is no civil claim, why is the company negotiating, and why is it trying for an Act of Parliament to extinguish that claim? That is why ——

Industrial Training

10.11 pm

Mr. John Cope (Treasurer of Her Majesty's Household): In the absence of my hon. Friend the Minister, who will be here shortly——

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North): Where is he?

Mr. Cope: —I beg to move,

That the draft Industrial Training Levy (Engineering Board) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 14th April, be approved.

The order is before hon. Members today because one part of it involves a levy in excess of 1 per cent. of emoluments. Therefore, it requires an affirmative resolution of each House under section 12(6) of the Industrial Training Act 1982. I shall outline the full details of the levy order.

Hon. Members will be well aware, as I am in my constituency and as my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary is in his, of the importance of the engineering industry, which is the largest manufacturing sector in terms of employment. In 1985 engineering output rose by 5 per cent., the fourth consecutive year of growth.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Cope: Mechanical engineering in particular experienced its strongest growth since 1974 with output 6 per cent. above its 1984 level. If the industry is to build on those achievements, it is important that all firms play their part in training. We must ensure that employers continue to develop the skills of their work force in order to increase both productivity and growth.

I refer to the details of the levy. It is expected to raise about £171·5 million before taking exemption into account, and over £19 million after exemption. The levy will cover a period of 12 months to 31 August 1986, and it makes no changes to arrangements currently operating, which were approved by the House last year. It is in two main parts. In the mainstream of engineering establishments of 1,000 or fewer employees, where there is a levy of 1 per cent. of emoluments, 0·06 per cent. of the levy is non-exemptible. In larger establishments 0·06 per cent. is non-exemptible in respect of the first 1,000 employees, and 0·054 per cent. is non-exemptible in respect of the remainder.

For establishments in the mechanical and electrical engineering construction industry sector, the levy is in several parts, and my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary will give the details of that if the House requires it. The employer and employee members of the Mechanical and Electrical Engineering Construction Industry Sector Committee agreed to the levy unanimously and the proposals were subsequently endorsed by the board without dissent. Letters of support have been received from the two major employer organisations in the sector. There is thus consensus in the industry for the proposals, as required by the 1982 Act.

I therefore recommend the order to the House. It has widespread support and is necessary to meet the industry's future training needs. If there are any further points that any hon. Member would like to raise, my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary is here to deal with them.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): This is an historic evening, with the Government failing to get their business by two votes—[Interruption.]—and then with the appearance by the Minister, too late to bat when he was supposed to. I am sure the speech by the Whip, the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Cope), was every bit as good as the one that we might have had, had the Minister got here.

Mr. Evans: It was much better.

Mr. Sheerman: It is important to concentrate on the background against which we see the introduction of the order. I shall seek first to set the order in context because it was the original purpose of the engineering industry training board levy in the 1960s to assess the training needs of the engineering industry, which is so crucial to the industrial effort of our country. It was then the intention of the legislation that the engineering industry training board should levy the requisite amount of money to fund and carry out training appropriate to the needs of the industry and the country.

Originally, that levy was set at 2·5 per cent. It was based on a firm's payroll—the numbers employed—but it was intended to meet the real costs of training for that industry. Sadly — on reflection — there was such an outcry from industry and the employers' organisations that there was an early reduction to 1 per cent. of the payroll. That forced the original intentions of the EITB off the track. Since that time it has never been fully equipped to do the job envisaged for it by the initial legislation. That was to identify the training needs of the industry and the country, in the national interest, and to ensure that they were carried out.

Indeed, the EITB has been forced off the track particularly since the introduction of exemption certificates to the levy. Sadly, the income to the EITB has withered away. We see that 97 per cent. of firms in the engineering industry can claim exemption, and indeed do so. So much of the industry is exempted that the budget of the EITB is far too small to begin to perform the task that it should be doing. The basic criterion for exemption was too low and the system, as the Minister must know, does not work. The Government know that very well.

The effects of that background and the disastrous policies pursued by the Government on education and training since 1979 are clear in the even more clearly reduced circumstances of the industrial training boards in general, the closure of most of them and the fact that the engineering industry training board is supposed to stand on the sidelines while market forces and the philosophy of voluntarism triumphs.

After the abolition of most of the industrial training boards, and taking into account the cowed position of those which remain, 97 per cent. of engineering firms are exempted. The levy is too low and the exemptions are too many. The criteria for training done by industries to enable them to get out of training and paying the levy are laughable. There is a serious need to return to the original spirit of the engineering industry training boards when they were established. The reasons for that are clear if we consider the broad picture of education and training in Britain, and especially in engineering. In this crucial sector of our manufacturing industry, we see a total collapse, skill shortages and the decline of the skill base of the engineering industry. Firms are poaching rather than training. The commitment to training has reached rock bottom. That is a sad position for a once great and proud industry. So much for the Government's devotion to the watchword "voluntarism" as though that was all that ever mattered.

The House would not wish me to rely merely on rhetoric to advance the seriousness of the position. I need rely only on the facts published by the board. The board's influence has withered away and its ability to influence industry has been undermined by the exemption certificate system. For the past three years and longer, the Opposition have warned the Government about what would happen to engineering training if they treated the problem as lightly as they have, and more pressure has been mounting to give exemptions to training so that they are almost universal.

The board compared April 1978 with April 1985. It carried out a spot check on one day in each month and these revealed that the numbers of those in training declined much faster than the decline in manpower in engineering. We are not juggling the figures. Even if we took into account the acknowledged decline in the industry's employment, we can see from the figures for engineering technicians that, in April 1978, there were 140 technicians in training for every 1,000 technicians in the industry. Sadly, that figure has declined to 90 for every 1,000 technicians. For craftsmen, the position is even more disastrous. In 1978, there were 145 men and women in training for every 1,000 engineering craftsmen. The figures today are down to 75 in 1,000, and that is a disastrous drop from 145 per 1,000.

Let us look at another interesting category. We may not associate industrial training boards with graduates, but in 1978 there were 160 graduate engineers per 1,000 in training in the industry. That was down to 120 in 1,000 in 1985. Those are the most reliable statistics. They are more sensitive and accurate than those published by the Department, because the EITB is so much closer to the industry.

What are we seeing in engineering apprenticeships overall? We know that between 1979 and 1986 they have halved, and that is during a period when we have seen a lack of skilled young men and women in industry. In 1979 we had 20,000 craft and technician apprentices. We now have fewer than 9,000. That is a disastrous decline.

It is estimated that we need between 4,000 and 5,000 apprentices coming out of training every year simply to meet the natural wastage caused by retirement. The sad fact is that we are not even producing enough apprentices to meet the natural wastage. The number has fallen from 20,000 to 9,000 and we are on a spiral into decline and frustration for our country and its economy.

I understand that just last week there was an MSC review of engineering industry training board funding which was generally pessimistic. We can expect even further cuts in the board's budget. I remind the Minister that in the past three years that has declined from £17 million to £5 million this year. That is the result of a wicked policy of moving away from the proper funding of proper training to short-term, pump-priming, gimmicky training that does no one any good.

Put those hard facts in the context of a recent independent survey which showed that Britain'ss manufacturing industry spends 0·15 per cent. of turnover on training yet our major industrial competitors spend between 1 per cent. and 2 per cent. That is the measure of the problem that we in Britain face and the context in which the order is being moved this evening.

Put it in the context of a speech made by the chairman of the MSC, Mr. Bryan Nicholson, on 21 March, just a few days ago. He said that Britain' work force is "a bunch of thickies" compared with our competitor countries. That is a sad comment on seven years of Government control of our training programmes.

The MSC has also published a study by a respected firm of accountants — Coopers and Lybrand — entitled "A Challenge to Complacency". When it was published, Mr. Bryan Nicholson wrote to a large number of manufacturing companies in this country, but he received such a pathetic response that even he, whose appointment was made by this Government, is beginning to believe that the Government's adherence to voluntarism and market forces urgently needs to be reviewed.

The lessons to be learned in engineering could not be clearer. Any intelligent Government response would be properly to assess, plan and evaluate British engineering needs. When those needs had been assessed the Government ought to plan ahead for manpower needs, not to rely upon the day-to-day response of market forces. However, this Government do not like to plan ahead. Government resources and legislation would be required to raise the money to meet British engineering needs. That would be in the interests of both the industry and the country.

That brings me back to the order absolutely square-on. That was the original intention of the Engineering Industry Training Board and the levy system. How sad it is for this country's future productivity that we have moved so far from the original intention.

A comprehensive national strategy covering education and training is needed, of which the EITB should be a key part. Instead, the EITB, together with a few other training boards, is embattled, isolated and fragmented. It cannot train properly, because it is not part of a proper training system and is unable to grapple with the immense problems that face the engineering industry and this country. It has no hope of dealing with cross-sectoral problems and the regional problems that are so important to any industrial training plan.

Face-saving gestures are not needed, such as a department of education and training. That would not deal with the problems. It would divert the attention of the public away from the real gaps in our training strategy. We need a commitment to rise from the dead—I use that term reluctantly—this nation's education and training system and to introduce innovation, dynamism and growth.

Inadequate though it is, the Opposition do not intend to oppose the order. The EITB is still part of the slim 25 per cent. of industry that comes under the umbrella of the industrial training boards. Consequently we shall not vote against the order. However, that is not to be seen by anybody, particularly by the Minister, as meaning that we do not believe that the training system is in tatters. The EITB deserves more than the passing of this order. It needs to be completely reframed and resuscitated.

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): My view is that the situation is rather worse than that which has been outlined by the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman). I do not argue about his statistics, but one of the ironies about this great nation, where the Industrial Revolution started, is that, although that historic fact can be denied by no one, Britain is an anti-technology and anti-industrial country. I say that, having reflected upon the attitudes expressed by members of the Civil Service and the education service, and by those in schools and universities and, indeed, Parliament.

I am one of the few hon. Members who is a qualified engineer. Among the middle classes and the better educated people there is a belief that one cannot be proud of engineering and technology, especially of the more mechanical sort, and that a career in engineering and technology is to be pursued only if other opportunities do not present themselves. That fundamental weakness is now catching up with us in terms of our competence in various skills.

I began my apprenticeship with an engineering company 24 or 25 years ago. On reflection, I recognise that the level of skills being taught then was insufficient, but that unsatisfactory state of affairs 24 or 25 years ago has become a great deal worse since then.

I do not intend to defend the former apprenticeship system. It had many merits, but it also had some weaknesses. It was a time-serving operation as opposed to a skill-acquiring operation. However, one is tempted to believe that, although the time-serving part of the apprenticeship system has been abolished, the skill acquisition side of it has not been introduced to the extent that is needed.

The order is all right as far as it goes, but, if we are to pull the country up in terms of competition and industrial production, a different attitude must be adopted at many different levels. For example, far too much of Britain's production engineering is designed by skilled engineers, not using the skills which exist within their companies, but making up for the skills not available within their companies. Job elements are reduced to the minimum so that someone with a few weeks or days training can do the job. That will not build an international reputation for the level of competence in engineering products that we must have to survive as an industrial country.

The Government are in charge and they have power to influence such matters. I urge the Government to re-examine the level of skills acquired in our nation—at all levels. I am not talking only of manual skills. Manual skills are of tremendous importance and I do not underestimate them, but some people seem to believe that all that we have to acquire are manual skills. That is not so. We must acquire low technician skills, high technician skills and entrepreneurial, fresh and new engineering skills. All those skills are required if the country is to get out of the mire.

I have been a Member of the House for about 12 years, and the more that I become influenced by my friends in London, as opposed to my friends in Cornwall, the more I am persuaded of the view that there is, at a middle and upper class level inwards, an anti-technology and anti-making things attitude. Britain's living standards rely upon those who can make things, mine things, grow things or catch things. The country has no other means of wealth production.

The mining people are experiencing difficulties in Cornwall — to put it mildly. For all that, we cannot develop a series of policies which expand Britain's poor capacities when in the long run, in this great nation of ours, there is nothing like an economic future for them. Some Government of the future must turn around this long-ingrained attitude that exists in the British person and British society which, ironically, is anti-technology. That is amazing in view of Britain's history of industrial revolution and innovation over the last 50 to 100 years.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. David Trippier): I apologise unreservedly to the House for my discourtesy in not being present when the debate began.

The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) said that he would set the order in context, but he failed to do that. He ended his remarks by saying that the Opposition did not intend to oppose the order because he thought that to a certain extent it was fair enough. There was something of a dichotomy in what he said to the House. He suggested that the budget was far too small for the engineering industry training board and the purpose for which the board wished to use that budget. However, the House is aware that the board is made up of representatives of the trade union movement and employers. The board was unanimous in its decision that this order should be presented to the House.

There is no difference of opinion between the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) and myself as to the importance of training. We both consider it an important investment and not a cost. When the hon. Gentleman suggests that the levy is too low—I think he used those specific words—why did the ITB decide to agree unanimously to the measures which we are considering tonight?

The hon. Gentleman referred to the decline in engineering, and, more specifically, to the decline in apprenticeships. However, the decline in apprenticeships was arrested as a result of the introduction of the youth training scheme. There is evidence of that fact and I discussed that when we considered the matter in Committee at an earlier date.

I am concerned about some of the hon. Gentleman's allegations about those training organisations which now come under the umbrella of non-statutory training organisations. The hon. Gentleman will be interested to hear that I have recently written to all the NSTOs previously covered by ITBs asking them precisely what they are doing at the moment. It is some time since we introduced legislation to rearrange the training and to keep some statutory training organisations and some non-statutory. I shall be interested to learn what is the current state of play and whether they have honoured the undertakings they gave when they were applying to the consultation exercise with regard to tackling certain ITBs. I am sure the hon. Member for Huddersfield will be interested in their answers.

I welcomed the intervention of the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon). He also referred to apprenticeships and I sympathise with what he said. The hon. Gentleman suggested to the House that there was an anti-technology feeling in Britain. I would go further and suggest there is an anti-industry or anti-manufacturing feeling in Britain.

That is one of the reasons why the hon. Gentleman and I welcome Industry Year 1986. This is another opportunity for us to dispel the dirty overalls image of manufacturing industry. I know that the hon. Member for Huddersfield will welcome the fact that much is being done by the trade unions in Industry Year, as well as by the CBI, the Institute of Directors and other employer organisations. These bodies and the Church are trying to get the message across about the improved interface between industry and education.

We should have done this 40 years. I am not making a party political point; it does not matter who was in power at the time. The effort has been made a little late in the day, but it is never too late. Many moves are afoot to try to dispel the dirty overalls image of industry and that must be for the betterment of improved relations between industry and education.

Mr. Trippier: Some time ago I had the privilege of launching a video, which has gone to every secondary school in the land, entitled "To be an engineer". This works to dispel the dirty overalls image of engineering. I hope it will improve the image of engineering specifically, and I hope it will convince not only youngsters to consider engineering but also their parents. That is important.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): My hon. Friend mentioned the interface between education and training. Does he agree that the dramatic shortage of mathematics teachers in schools——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. We are discussing the industry training board levy, not training and education in general.

Mr. Trippier: I know that my hon. Friend has an important interest in this subject. I am sure that I am to blame for leading him down that path. Those who concentrate on that subject in school would have a natural bent towards engineering later in life.

I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) for introducing this important aspect of what we are trying to achieve in 1986—a matter that draws all sides of the House together.

Mr. Sheerman: Surely the Minister is aware that, on a public relations level, of course the matter draws the House together, but we are deeply divided by the fact that the Government have not put in the resources for the training that is needed. Voluntarism does not work. The Minister has not said how he will get the Government to see that, and get money into training.

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Gentleman says that voluntarism does not work. He is prejudging the results of the consultation exercise that I am conducting, which will be open to public scrutiny when it is completed. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman welcomes the fact that I have written to the NSTOs inviting their views about what is going on. The hon. Gentleman may be in for a surprise. Perhaps I might put it a little more strongly. The hon. Gentleman may be in for a pleasant surprise—it was to me—to discover that some of the NSTOs have gone a little further and done much more than they ever did when the training bodies were statutory. The hon. Gentleman is a little premature suggesting the outcome of the consultation exercise.

Mr. Penhaligon: If a young man or woman has designs on becoming a competent technician engineer, not a graduate or craft engineer, how would the Minister suggest he or she goes about it? Surely he is not telling us that YTS, although it has some advantages, is the most obvious course?

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Gentleman is not making a valid point. Apart from the normal channels, which have been open for some time, YTS can play a significant part in the youngster gaining credit towards a proper craft apprenticeship which would be recognised by a validating body, which would enable him or her to be qualified.

I welcome the fact that, broadly, the alliance welcomes YTS. The hon. Member for Huddersfield is invariably supportive. I despair of some of his hon. Friends, who try at every possible opportunity to knock or rubbish it. It has proved the most successful training scheme that we have had and it bears comparison with international programmes or schemes.

We have had a useful and interesting debate. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Huddersfield for saying that the Opposition will not oppose the order, and I commend it to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Industrial Training Levy (Engineering Board) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 14th April, be approved.

10, Downing Street (Chief Information Officer)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Boscawen.]

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): The genesis of this debate on the post of chief information officer at No. 10 is to be found in the exchange on the Floor of the House on Monday 14 April, which is in Hansard at column 575.

I interject that I welcome the presence of the Leader of the House. It is good parliamentary practice when Mr. Speaker can oblige those of us who in genuine circumstances have had to resort to the time honoured phrasing, "On a point of order. In view of the unsatisfactory nature of the reply, I beg to give notice that I shall seek to raise the issue on the Adjournment at the earliest opportunity."

I am acutely aware that in our system a civil servant cannot directly answer criticisms of him made on the Floor of the House, so let me say at once that my criticisms are directed not at Mr. Bernard Ingham, but at his boss, the Prime Minister, a politician who can answer back, and at the way at which she has allowed and encouraged Mr. Ingham to go about his business.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): Shameful.

Mr. Dalyell: An hon. Member on the Government side shouted "Shameful."

I am not alone in these opinions, and I should like to quote from one of the grandest mandarins in Whitehall in the 1970s, Sir Frank Cooper, permanent secretary to the Ministry of Defence. In the Suntory Toyota lecture, he said:

"A further paradox is that the more it has become technically easier to communicate the less good has that communication become between Government and the governed. Indeed, the aim now is the management of the media with a very much higher degree of central control from No. 10 Downing Street and with the connivance of a part of the media. There is now public relations — which I would define as biased information. I suggest that the post of Chief Informatiion Officer at No. 10 Downing Street is in fact a political job in a party sense and is not a job which it is proper for a Civil Servant to fill unless he or she resigns from the Civil Service on appointment. Moreover, what is said ought to be said on the record. The participation of the media in the lobby system is a public disgrace."

That is Sir Frank Cooper's view.

Mr. Harris: I am the person who shouted "Shameful" at the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr Dalyell) for his attack on a civil servant. The hon. Gentleman was a parliamentary private secretary to the late Richard Crossman. After the debate, perhaps I could refer him to the Crossman diaries. The section dealing with 28 September 1966 says that the hon. Gentleman's boss spent most of the day trying to work out how he could manipulate the press and the Government information services for the then Labour Government. Will the hon. Gentleman refresh his memory about what happened in those days of a Labour Government ?

Mr. Dalyell: I can refresh my memory clearly. There are different views on this. Sir Donald Maitland, for example, would not have acted in the way that a number of other chief information officers have acted. I take seriously the remarks by the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris), because I remember 1966 only too well.

There are problems here. That is why I was careful to say that I was getting at the politicians, not the civil servant who cannot answer back, rough though that civil servant may have been. It is not a cheap attack. In page 60 of Henry Porter's "Lies, Damned Lies" we are told that the advice that Mr. Ingham gave was that "remedial action should be taken against troublesome journals, whether national, provincial or specialist."

Porter and others have at least to be answered.

What I am saying is a serious reflection on the job specification. Is it appropriate, for example, for a civil servant on his own initiative to offer cover for selectively leaking a Law Officer's letter? What sort of position did Mr. Ingham imagine that he was putting Miss Collette Bowe into when he required her to phone Mr. Chris Moncrieff with the selective contents of the Solicitor-General's letter over Westland? Can one imagine Sir Donald Maitland, the late William Clark, Sir Tom McCaffrey or any other holder of the office deeming it proper or ethical to make any such request of a civil servant colleague? [Interruption.] If the hon. Gentleman would like to name names, I shall listen to him.

Mr. Harris: The hon. Gentleman says that he is not attacking this civil servant. The allegations that he has made are a blatant attack on a civil servant who, because of the rules of procedure, is incapable of answering back. As I said in a seated interjection earlier, I think that that is shameful.

Mr. Dalyell: The reply is that any traditional civil servant proposing to do that which ethically he knew he should not do would seek a prime ministerial instruction. Did Mr. Ingham ask the Prime Minister on 6 January about the leaking of the Solicitor-General's letter? After all, the Prime Minister was next door in the very same 10 Downing street building and the then Secretary of State for Trade and Industry was in his Yorkshire constituency. Why are the Prime Minister and Mr. Ingham so coy about appearing before the Select Committee on Defence that is considering the Westland affair on behalf of the House? It was the Prime Minister who endorsed the reference of the Westland affair to the Select Committee of which my right hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, East (Dr. Gilbert) is a distinguished and leading member.

There is one of two explanations. Either Mr. Ingham asked the Prime Minister about the Solicitor-General's letter, or Mr. Ingham knows the Prime Minister's mental processes so well that he knows instinctively what she would want done. If an answer were given at all, was it along the lines, "You know what I think and would want done"—wink, wink?

It would seem most unlikely that the Prime Minister felt that the former Secretary of State for Trade and Industry had done anything very wrong in her eyes, bearing in mind that at the time of his resignation she was reported to have spent over an hour trying to dissuade him from resigning. After his resignation, the Prime Minister was reported as indicating that she hoped it would not be long before he was back in a senior position in the Government.

I have no brief for the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan), but, to put it bluntly, he was the fall guy. Many of us would agree with what Mr. Alan Watkins has stated in print—that he has heard from leading Conservatives that "Poor Leon is carrying the can". We all have to judge one another in this place. I do not find it believable that the former Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, a careful QC, let alone a former Home Secretary, would dream up the device of selectively leaking a Law Officer's letter. Cover having been offered to Collette Bowe, there is only one explanation why Mr. Ingham was not dismissed in the aftermath of the Westland affair — that either implicitly or explicitly the Prime Minister approved of Mr. Ingham's action in giving cover.

We should go into these matters in some detail. On 5 February the Select Committee questioned Sir Robert Armstrong in case he might be able to provide answers which would make it unnecessary to call the five civil servants, including Bernard Ingham and Collette Bowe, as Sir Robert had interviewed them all during his inquiry. However, the Committee still reserved its right to call them if not satisfied with the information obtained from Sir Robert.

It is clear that the Committee was not fully satisfied, because it asked Sir Robert to appear before it again to answer some further questions. This he did on 5 March. However, there were a number of questions which Sir Robert was not prepared to answer. My right hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, East, who is present, asked about the officials' knowledge of the special status of the Law Officers' letters. Sir Robert would not answer. My right hon. Friend asked him if the only person who could answer was Mr. Ingham. Sir Robert said that he could answer but was not prepared to do so. My right hon. Friend then asked:

"Then the only person who can answer is Mr. Ingham?"

Sir Robert appeared to indicate that that was so. My right hon. Friend asked Sir Robert:

"If you can't answer, the only people who can are Mr. Powell and Mr. Ingham."

In reply to several questions Sir Robert took refuge in repeatedly quoting the Prime Minister's reply to me on 27 January, the oft-repeated reply:

"I gave my consent."—[Official Report, 27 January 1986; Vol. 90, c. 656.]

It is of interest to note that on 5 March Sir Robert Armstrong said that the five civil servants were not responsible for the way that the leaked letter was handled, as the former Secretary of State for Trade and Industry had taken full responsibility for the way in which the information was disclosed. It is of even greater interest to note that on his earlier appearance on 5 February, Sir Robert made a different statement. He said that when the letter arrived at the Department of Trade and Industry, the then Secretary of State was out fulfilling a luncheon engagement, that an official had read the letter over the telephone to him, and that the then Secretary of State had decided that it should be brought into the public domain.

Sir Robert emphasised that while the then Secretary of State had authorised the disclosure, it had been the officials who had decided on the method to be used. Sir Robert summed up by telling the Committee that, although the former Secretary of State wanted the information brought into the public domain before the Westland press conference that day, he did not say how this was to be done.

From all this, and particularly in view of Sir Robert's inability or unwillingness to answer questions himself, I believe that on 5 March the need to call for evidence from certain key civil servants had been positively established. To save time, I shall refer to the article by Richard Norton-Taylor in The Guardian on 11 March.

On 1 April, Mr. John Carvel wrote in The Guardian that Labour members of the Committee were planning to repeat their request to examine the officials, particularly Mr. Ingham. He also wrote:

"The Committee has been advised that a request from Mr. Ingham would be refused by the Prime Minister, but that if the Committee instructed him to attend, he would turn up and say nothing."

Although, in theory, the Committee's wish to see the civil servants was still on the table, arrangements were being made to have the final hearing, which a Minister would wind up. On 10 April, The Guardian reported that, at a private meeting of the Committee, the Labour members' move to summon the five civil servants or just Mr. Ingham was defeated.

A question along the following lines could properly be put to the Prime Minister. "It was reported in The Guardian on 1 April 1986 that the Defence Committee had been advised that a request for Mr. Ingham to attend would be refused by the Prime Minister but that if the Committee instructed him to attend he would turn up and say nothing. Is it true that the Prime Minister would refuse to allow Mr. Ingham to appear and, if so, bearing in mind Sir Robert Armstrong's inability to answer questions put to him by the Committee, on what grounds would the Prime Minister refuse to allow Mr. Ingham to appear?" If the Prime Minister replied that she would not refuse to allow Mr. Ingham to appear, the following question might then be asked: "Would the Prime Minister think it appropriate for Mr. Ingham to appear before the Committee and then to refuse to answer its questions?" Why should a civil servant — the chief press officer — be subject to special treatment before Committees of the House of Commons that does not extend to the generality of civil servants?

Westland is not simply a one-off episode. There is a whole litany of operations unbecoming to a civil servant. As one who gave evidence to the Franks Committee for an hour and 25 minutes, I was appalled at the way that the chief information officer gave that complicated report to the Lobby correspondents at 3.30 pm when their deadlines were at 5 pm. This is not the kind of guidance that a civil servant should give on behalf of the Prime Minister, but it is not the civil servant that I blame; it is the Prime Minister, because I bet that the instructions were hers. Did not Mr. Ingham have to apologise to the Lord Chancellor for suggesting that Judge Jeffries might be the appropriate judge to preside over the trial of Clive Ponting at the Old Bailey?

We are tonight not considering the role of a mere press secretary, but dealing with the position of a man who is an adviser on central decisions of Government in Britain, and whose power has grown exponentially, along a geometric progression, with the years during which he has occupied the office. The longer a man occupies this office, the more power accrues to him.

I do not think that I exaggerate if I say that, with the arguable exception of Sir Robert Armstrong, Mr. Bernard Ingham has evolved as the most important man making decisions in British politics. When I put this view to a senior Conservative Privy Councillor, he shook his head sadly and said that he could not dissent.

The blame must rest not with Mr. Ingham but with the Prime Minister who has become so dependent and has allowed this to happen. This is an unsatisfactory position.

11.5 pm

The Minister of State, Privy Council Office and the Minister for the Arts (Mr. Richard Luce): The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) is well known for his persistence on many issues. He certainly gave the House notice recently that he would raise this issue about the chief press secretary at No. 10. Having listened to him, I believe that he is misguided in his views. Indeed, I would go further: the hon Gentleman is continuing to demonstrate his ability to develop obsessions—I can think of no other word—about issues, and to formulate some allegations which are completely unsubstantiated but which become genuine figments of his imagination. I can give an exact example of that from the end of his speech when he referred to Mr. Ingham as one of perhaps two men in Government who take the most important decisions. That is an exact description of a figment of his imagination. Nothing could be further from the truth.

The hon. Gentleman proceeded to talk about the so-called Westland affair, and, more precisely, the events surrounding the disclosure of the Solicitor-General's letter which have been fully explained to the House by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on both 23 and 27 January. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) contributed to the debate on 27 January. The events were the subject of an inquiry conducted by the head of the home Civil Service who subsequently gave evidence to the Defence Select Committee on 5 February and 5 March. The role of officials in this matter has thus been fully described and explained to the House and the public, and I have nothing tonight to add to what has been said. If the hon. Gentleman thinks that there is some great or sinister matter still to discover, I can assure him that he is completely mistaken. This issue is worn to a frazzle.

I shall seek to answer the debate by concentrating on the role of the chief press officer and the most unfair allegations that the hon. Gentleman makes about Mr. Ingham.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): Will my hon. Friend say whether he believes that Mr. Ingham has acted in any way different from the way in which Mr. Joe Haines acted when he was chief press officer to Lord Wilson of Rievaulx when he was Prime Minister?

Mr. Luce: I can establish that. I know that Mr. Ingham has managed to maintain a steady and continuous relationship with the Lobby which has not always been the case in the past.

The hon. Gentleman argued that the post of chief press secretary should be a party political appointment, and that it is no longer possible or right for the holder of that office to be a civil servant. He cites in support of that the views of Sir Frank Cooper, ex-permanent secretary at the Ministry of Defence, in a recent lecture. Obviously, both Sir Frank and the hon. Gentleman are entitled to their views on this, as on any other matter, but I do not agree with them.

It is important to stress the role of the chief press officer or any information officer. It is to promote an informed press and public about the Government's policies and measures, and to advise Ministers and officials on presentation.

Obviously, the chief press officer will aim to ensure that the merits of those policies and the arguments in their favour are brought as fully as possible to the public's attention. He would be failing in his job if he did not do that. But it is his job, as it is the job of all civil servants, to serve his Minister as a member of the Government to th best of his ability, to give him well-informed, dispassionate and impartial advice, and to give effect to the Minister's decisions with skill, vigour and loyalty. The present chief press secretary at No. 10 Downing street does just that.

On 23 January this year, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said:

> "I should like to say that Mr. Ingham has served successive Governments with devotion and dedication, and I have great confidence in him."—[Official Report, 23 January 1986, Vol. 90, c. 459.]

That is absolutely right.

Let us look at Mr. Ingham's career—19 years as a professional journalist and about 19 years as a civil servant, of which 17 have been as an information officer. He has endless experience in information services within government. It is notable that Mr. Ingham has served loyally as an information adviser both Labour and Conservative Governments. It is notable that he has been an information officer to Mr. Varley, and to Barbara Castle. Above all, quite apart from his service to the Prime Minister, he has been an information adviser to the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn). If Mr. Ingham is capable of serving the right hon. Gentleman and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, that is a sharp demonstration of his ability to provide an impartial service as a loyal civil servant with a great deal of integrity. The allegations of the hon. Member for Linlithgow should be totally and utterly refuted.

Mr. Dalyell: If Mr. Ingham has such integrity and is a loyal civil servant, why, with all that experience, did he give cover to Collette Bowe in giving information to Mr. Chris Moncrieff of the Press Association in the form of a leaked Law Officers' letter? A man of such integrity and experience would not have done that unless he either knew the Prime Minister's mind or had prime ministerial instruction. It is the Prime Minister who is at the root of that trouble.

Mr. Luce: As I have already said, this issue has been gone over time and time again. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and Sir Robert Armstrong have given substantial evidence on it. Of course, we await the report of the Select Committee on Defence.

The feeling seems to be that the fact that the chief press secretary deals with the media somehow makes it party political. I agree that the need to deal with the media means that particular skills and qualities are required of an information officer that may not always be required for other jobs in the Civil Service. That is why many, although by no means all, information officers come, as the chief press secretary at No. 10 came, from within the Government Information Service. Information officers must, of course, have the ear of their Ministers but must also have a detailed knowledge of their Department and its responsibilities so that they are well placed to present them to the media. That does not make the task a party political one—indeed, it is the task, for example in the Conservative party, of the party chairman and others to speak for the party.

I wonder whether the correspondents who deal from day to day with information officers would prefer them to be political appointees. The reputation and the effectiveness of information officers depend on our contacts being able to rely on what they say. If they were party political appointees, there would be a much greater danger of suspicion that the information coming out of the Department was being distorted for party political considerations. It is a matter of establishing credibility and trust.

It is worth quoting from a speech in May 1983 in Cardiff by Mr. Ingham to a conference of the Guild of British Newspaper Editors in which he said:

"no one will, or should, take the slightest notice of a word I say if I cannot be relied upon to get it right; my crucial stock-in-trade is reliability; otherwise I lack credibility and cease to be useful either to Government or media".

That is correct. I believe that it is true that Mr. Ingham is widely respected and generally respected by the press for that.

I do not agree that there is something special about the post of the chief press secretary at No. 10, apart from the fact that it is one of the two top jobs in the Government Information Service. Like any other job in the Prime Minister's office, the holder of this must be exceptionally able. A close relationship with Ministers and the ability to command the respect of the press are the essential requirements of the job, as the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) emphasised in his evidence to the Treasury and Civil Service Sub-Committee. As I have just said, to serve a Minister successfully, any civil servant must gain his confidence. Therefore, there is no difference there. Any senior civil servant, chief information officer or permanent secretary, must advise a Minister clearly and in an unbiased manner and carry out the Minister's instructions. Therefore, there is no difference there. All senior civil servants, in advising Ministers, are serving the Government and not a political party. Again, there is no difference with No. 10.

Of course, the chief press secretary at 10 Downing street, like departmental chief information officers, has to have an understanding of political sensitivities and of the political framework and environment within which his Minister and the Government of which he is a member are operating. However, there is nothing unique about that. It is no less true of all civil servants who are in the business of advising Ministers and executing their policies.

History shows that civil servants are no less capable than others of carrying out the duties of the chief press secretary effectively and acceptably. Over the past 20 years there have been both civil servant and journalist holders of the No. 10 chief information officer job. The civil servants concerned have shown themselves perfectly capable of presenting the policies of whichever administration was currently in power. I believe that journalists would agree that the civil servant holders have performed no less satisfactorily than professional journalist occupiers of the post.

I have sought to demonstrate why, in the Government's view, Mr. Ingham is doing an excellent job and why there are strong advantages in having an experienced civil servant to do the job. I think that in answering the debate generally I must take the opportunity to say that my experience as a Civil Service Minister points to the fact that civil servants as a whole, including Mr. Ingham, serve this Government, as they would serve any Government, loyally, professionally and with integrity, and I believe that we can be proud of them.

Mr. Dalyell: If the emphasis is to be put on obeying ministerial instructions, we are now left with the fact that it was the Prime Minister's instructions, implicit or explicit, which offered the cover to Miss Bowe to leak the Solicitor-General's letter against one of her own Ministers. The Minister's reply does not put Mr. Ingham in a bad light but the Prime Minister. If all that he says about the chief press officer's virtues is true, the Prime Minister has to say how, if she was so loyally served by a man obeying ministerial instructions, cover was given to leak a letter against one of her own Ministers. After tonight it is the Prime Minister, not Mr. Ingham, who is in the dock.

Mr. Luce: The hon. Gentleman is continuing to try to make political capital out of an issue from which it is no longer possible to make any political capital. The issue has been covered time and again by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, the Secretary to the Cabinet and the head of the home Civil Service who has given evidence to the Select Committee on Home Affairs.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

SOCIAL SERVICES

Social Workers (Attacks)

1. Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what evidence he has about the incidence of attacks of violence against social workers by their clients.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State expresses his regret that he is unable to be with us this afternoon, as he is overseas on official business.

Detailed information about violent attacks against social workers is not collected centrally on a systematic basis, but the evidence that we have had, distressing though it certainly is, is sadly not inconsistent with the nature of a social worker's job, which inevitably brings him or her into contact with emotionally disturbed or mentally disordered clients. It must be for employing authorities to assess the level of risk to their staff and to take the necessary action.

Ms. Harman: Is the Minister aware of the nationwide research which has been carried out at Cambridge university which shows that social workers are likely to be attacked by their clients on average once a year? In view of the recent deaths of two social workers at the hands of their clients, why are the Government taking such a complacent attitude about the matter? Will the Minister co-ordinate the actions of local authorities, which are trying to reduce the risk to their social workers and encourage and enable them to do something constructive? Will he ensure that people coming out of institutions into the community get proper back-up support so that they do not become a danger to themselves or to the social workers who care for them?

Mr. Whitney: The Government are in no sense complacent about this very difficult issue, and we remain in close contact with the employing authorities. We will, of course, maintain such contact to discover whether further guidance can properly be given centrally. We are also in close contact with the parents of those involved in the specific case in which the hon. Lady has taken a close interest.

Mr. Dickens: Is it not true that there are recruited into the social services many odd-bods who are long-haired, unshaven and who wear political badges on their lapels, who provoke attacks upon themselves by their very attitude?

Mr. Whitney: I am not prepard to generalise about odd-bods in the social services. I believe that social workers have a very difficult job to do, and these cases raise difficult and sensitive issues.

Mr. Wigley: The House will be somewhat surprised that the Minister was not stronger in his condemnation of the question from the hon. Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens).

Does the Minister accept that the risks to social workers would be considerably lessened if there was proper assessment of the needs of people leaving long-stay hospitals with mental illness or other forms of mental disorders? Does he agree that, to enable that to happen, it would be greatly advantageous if the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Bill, now in another place, could have its commencement orders on these sections as soon as possible?

Mr. Whitney: Many of the issues involve clinical decisions, which, of course, the Government carefully monitor, but which are not directly in our control. The House will be well aware of the Government's helpful attitude to the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Bill, to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

One-Parent Benefit

2. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the percentage take-up of one-parent benefit.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Major): The percentage take-up has steadily improved over recent years, and the latest available estimate shows that about 75 per cent. of those who stand to gain by claiming one-parent benefit are receiving it.

Mr. Knox: I accept that there has been a great improvement during the last few years, but does my hon. Friend not think that the figure is still disappointing? Does he have any plans to try to improve the percentage take-up?

Mr. Major: I share my hon. Friend's wish that the take-up should be improved. We shall continue with the brief television fillers, which have proved to be particularly successful in encouraging people to claim this benefit, as well as with the traditional advertisements, which appear in child benefit books and on leaflets and posters in a variety of places, notably surgeries, health centres, post offices, law centres and elsewhere. I hope that in this fashion we will increase the take-up.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: Would my hon. Friend care to speculate upon how many people do not take up the one-parent benefit, although they are entitled to it, and upon what the cost would be if they did?

Mr. Major: I do not have the most recently available figures, but, broadly, about 100,000 families who could have claimed one-parent benefit did not take it up. According to the latest figures, the cost would have been about £18 million a year. I hope that in about three months' time we will be able to update those figures.

Invalid Care Allowance (Married Women)

3. Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will seek to extend invalid care allowance to married women; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): This matter is currently the subject of legal proceedings before the European Court, to which the Government are giving close attention.

Ms. Richardson: Will the Minister accept that if the women, under 100,000, who do not qualify for the invalid care allowance because they are married were not there to provide informal care, the Government would have to fork out between £5 billion and £7 billion in order to provide formal residential care, and that the £85 million that it would cost to extend the benefit to married and co-habiting women is chickenfeed because of the worth of the care that these women provide? Will he recognise that women all over the country are boiling over with anger and frustration because of this anachronistic Government, who should pay up or go?

Mr. Newton: Our most up-to-date estimate is that the cost would be £100 million rather than £85 million. I acknowledge entirely the immense value of the work of these carers and of many others who do not qualify for the invalid care allowance, whatever the law on the invalid care allowance may be. The issue, among others, alongside the legal issue, is about the best way to help such carers in the devoted work that they do.

Mr. Ashley: Why must the Government be dragged, kicking and screaming, into making this payment? Did the Minister read the article in The Sunday Times about the woman who was overwhelmed with caring for her husband who was suffering from multiple sclerosis, and whose family was devastated? Does he appreciate that without the invalid care allowance these women suffer even more because they are confined to their home and lack all help? If the Government do not help them, they lack all hope as well.

Mr. Newton: I have met a number of women, and others, who have been providing this kind of care, and I very much appreciate what they do. However, I repeat to the right hon. Gentleman that it is not automatically clear that a payment of £23 a week, which is what we are talking about, as distinct from the wider availability of respite care or other support services, is the best way to help such women.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Many people will be pleased to hear the Minister's remarks about those who are caring at home for relatives, but is he aware that many Conservative Members very much hope that he will be able to see his way to extending the invalid care allowance to married women?

Mr. Newton: I am very well aware that feelings on this matter extend to both sides of the House.

Mrs. Clwyd: Why does the Minister think that this country is brought before the European Court more often than any of the other countries in the European Community? Is he not thoroughly ashamed of that fact?

Mr. Newton: Quite possibly—I say this in, I hope, a reasonable spirit—that is because of the number of grotesquely discriminatory pieces of legislation that we inherited from the previous Labour Government.

Mentally Ill and Mentally Handicapped People

4. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with co-ordination between health authorities and local authorities in the proper provision of community care for the mentally ill and mentally handicapped with particular reference to financial provision.

Mr. Whitney: Good progress is being made in many areas in the joint planning of community care, but there is room for improvement over the country as a whole. The joint finance and care in the community arrangements enable health authorities to give financial support for community care provided by local social services authorities and voluntary organisations.

Mr. Chapman: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his reply. Is he aware of the confusion and contradiction, at least in my borough, between the local health authority and the social services department of the council as to their exact responsibilities over the provision of care for the mentally ill and the mentally handicapped? That has been tragically underlined in the case of a constituent who is severely mentally handicapped, who within 48 hours lost both her parents who were looking after her at home. In view of that confusion and contradiction, will my hon. Friend look into both the particular case and the general responsibilities so that it is possible unambiguously and unequivocally to assert where the responsibility lies?

Mr. Whitney: This is undoubtedly a difficult matter. As I said in my earlier reply, the good progress is not universal. There may be room for improvement. It may well be that my hon. Friend's constituency is a case in point. I am glad to tell my hon. Friend and the House that a multi-disciplinary meeting on that tragic case will be held on 13 May. I believe that that meeting will demonstrate the good co-operation that exists across the authorities in this tragic and worrying case.

Mr. Carter-Jones: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that, for historical reasons, severe distortions often take place with respect to moving people from long-stay hospitals into the community? Will the hon. Gentleman take into account the anomalous position for Salford health authority and Salford city council regarding his policy on Prestwich hospital?

Mr. Whitney: I shall look into the details. The local health authority and local authorities must work closely together against the background of support facilities, including joint finance, which the Government have provided and continue to provide.

Mr. Sims: Does my hon. Friend accept that, although the policy of moving mentally ill and handicapped people into the community is commendable, it is expensive and shifts the burden on to the social services department and the local authority? It is essential that adequate funds are provided so that the scheme will be successful.

Mr. Whitney: We accept that there are financial pressures. That is why we urge maximum co-operation, to go at the pace of the possible, depending on the local circumstances. That is why we have produced the funding that is now available.

Mr. Kennedy: Is the Minister aware that everybody, including the Government, accepts that successful community care cannot be a cheap option? How, therefore, can there be the co-ordination necessary to ensure the success of the policy when, for example, local authorities are starved of sufficient funds? They require those funds to provide the type of housing and the range of back-up facilities in the community that will enable people coming out of long-stay institutions not to be in a position where they lack sufficient community support or where they simply end up being re-admitted to the very institutions from which they moved. Will the hon. Gentleman consider other aspects of Government policy that operate against the interests of community care?

Mr. Whitney: Local authorities must choose their own priorities. No one would pretend that that was an easy task. Priorities must be set against a background of rising expenditure in the local authority area. The hon. Gentleman should take note of the financial facilities that are being made available. For example, this year, the joint finance allocation will be about £111 million.

Mr. Richard Page: Does my hon. Friend accept that there is considerable concern among parents, especially elderly parents, about their children, often young adults, who are returned to the community without adequate support or back-up? Will he clarify the guidelines between the appropriate authorities so that they cannot argue and bicker among themselves, and so that they will know exactly what their individual responsibilities are?

Mr. Whitney: There should be no question of individuals being returned to places outside the health authority scheme unless suitable and adequate arrangements have been made. That is precisely why the JCCs and the joint care planning teams are provided. They should ensure that the problems to which my hon. Friend referred are solved locally.

Mr. Meacher: Is the Under-Secretary of State aware that a recent survey of private rest homes for the disabled and the elderly found that degradation and exploitation were the norm, not the exception? Is the hon. Gentleman aware that residents were forced to strip in front of others to wash; milk was watered down to save money; incontinent residents were left without underwear; and YTS trainees were made to dispense drugs without knowledge of dosage side-effects? Is it not utterly repugnant that the Government should be encouraging huge commercial profits to be made in this way by private rest homes at the expense of frail and vulnerable patients?

Mr. Whitney: The Government are determined that the highest standards should be maintained in residential and nursing homes and similar accommodation, whether they are operated in the public or the private sector. That is why we instituted the inspection systems. For example, to help local authorities, we have increased the scale of registration fees and introduced regulations under the "Home Life" publication. If the hon. Gentleman sought to suggest that badly maintained homes exist only in the private sector, I invite him to consult his hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) to instruct him on the dreadful conditions found in the Nye Bevan home in Southwark.

NHS Accommodation

5. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received about his proposals on National Health Service accommodation.

7. Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent representations he has received about accommodation for National Health Service employees; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Barney Hayhoe): Since the new national policy was announced last July, about 200 letters have been received. In some cases concern has been expressed that staff might be evicted as a result of this policy. But, as my right hon. Friend made clear in his written answer on 25 April, no one will be required to move from his or her present accommodation without being offered a suitable alternative place to live.

Mr. Dubs: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, despite the parliamentary answer to which he referred, there is still widespread concern among NHS staff—nurses, ancillary workers and others—that they will be pressurised to leave their homes? Will the right hon. Gentleman give an assurance that no one who works for the NHS will be forcibly evicted or removed from his home?

Mr. Hayhoe: As I made it clear, no one will be required as part of this policy to move from his present accommodation without being offered a suitable alternative place in which to live. I am glad that this question gives me a further opportunity to clarify the position and, I hope, to put straight the record, which some people are deliberately seeking to misrepresent.

Mr. Canavan: As many Health Service employees in Scotland live in genuine fear of eviction, will the right hon. Gentleman extend his absolute guarantee to Health Service employees north of the border who live in such accommodation? As much of the NHS living accommodation is in an appalling state of disrepair, because Crown immunity exempts health authorities from the obligation to carry out the necessary repairs, will the right hon. Gentleman abolish Crown immunity in that respect, too, so that Health Service employees have the same rights as other tenants?

Mr. Hayhoe: One objective of the present policy of disposing of vacant and surplus property is to produce the resources which can be ploughed back to modernise and bring existing property up to a decent standard.

Mr. McCrindle: Because of the emotive way in which the matter is being dealt with by the Royal College of Nursing of the United Kingdom and, evidently, the Opposition, will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to restore a sense of perspective by reminding us of the number of employees who live in property owned by the health authorities and the percentage of total employees who do so?

Mr. Hayhoe: This residential accommodation is designed particularly for certain professional employees—junior doctors, student nurses, and other staff—especially in inner city areas. A little more than half the junior doctors, a little under half the student nurses, and fewer than one in 10 qualified nurses live in such accommodation.

Mr. Norris: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the real outrage would occur if the Government neglected the massive amount of property owned by the NHS which deserves to be developed for the better care of patients rather than distributed haphazardly, as at present?

Mr. Hayhoe: My hon. Friend is right. If we extend the matter way beyond the residential accommodation that we are discussing, it is clear that substantial resources are locked up in those properties, which could be disposed of and the resources used for the benefit of patients in general.

Mr. Evans: Where will the NHS get the suitable accommodation from?

Mr. Hayhoe: That will depend upon local circumstances.

Mr. Robert Atkins: What representations has my right hon. Friend received about NHS accommodation for young arthritically disabled children at the Wrightington hospital in Lancashire, bearing in mind the importance to local people of this regional centre of excellence, which the North-West area health authority proposes to close?

Mr. Hayhoe: May I write to my hon. Friend on this matter? Clearly the individuals whom he he has in mind are not NHS employees.

Mr. Kirkwood: The Minister said that no one would be evicted unless suitable alternative accommodation was offered. Is he aware that there are areas where there is no such suitable alternative accommodation? What happens if the offer is turned down? Who defines what is suitable?

Mr. Hayhoe: That must be a matter for local judgment, but it is wholly reasonable that, as part of this policy, one should seek to make more effective use of the NHS estate. If someone is seeking unreasonably to prevent that from happening and suitable alternative accommodation is made available, he is being treated fairly.

Mr. Rogers: Does the Minister accept that often, especially in rural areas where there are psychiatric hospitals well away from any conurbation, there is great difficulty in finding suitable alternative accommodation? In urban areas, where suitable accommodation may be available, because of the low salaries paid to those involved in the Health Service they cannot afford it.

Mr. Hayhoe: More than 90 per cent. of qualified nurses do not live in such accommodation, and, as I said, the stress points are in the inner-city areas.

Mr. Meacher: Is the Minister aware that up to 50,000 nurses and auxiliaries could be forced to leave their NHS homes within the next two years? Is he also aware that, contrary to the impression he has given, some health authorities have already jumped the gun and started to evict staff, even though they are supposed to have at least a year to make alternative arrangements? How can a third-year learner nurse on £4,500 a year find another home in London, where flats are at least £50 a week, which is almost her entire take-home pay?

Mr. Hayhoe: The hon. Gentleman has his figures wrong. I made them clear, but the sort of figures he gave are wholly inaccurate. The intention is that provision should be made for all student nurses, but just under half the student nurses occupy such accommodation.

Prescription Charges

6. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make it his policy to charge patients only the actual price of a prescription when the cost of the prescriptions is below the current prescription charge.

Mr. Hayhoe: I have no present plans to change the arrangements for prescription charges.

Mr. Hughes: Does the Minister recall that in April 1979 the prescription charge was 20p and that today, updated with inflation, it should be 40p? However, Government policy means that it is now £2·20 per item? How does he reconcile that with the Prime Minister's statement that the National Health Service is safe in her hands? Even this Government should not charge people more than a prescription is worth.

Mr. Hayhoe: The crucial aspect of the matter, which the hon. Gentleman has not acknowledged, is that about 75 per cent. of prescriptions are dispensed entirely free of charge and that even 5 or 6 per cent. are dispensed under the season ticket arrangements. That leaves only about one in five prescriptions for which the full charge is payable.

Sir Kenneth Lewis: Would it nevertheless be advisable to tell people who pay for their prescriptions that they can obtain them cheaper by going straight to the chemist? Would it not be better if they did not continually return to their doctors for prescriptions? It would save doctors' time and Health Service money.

Mr. Hayhoe: When an item can be bought more cheaply without a prescription, that arrangement can be followed by the individual and the chemist concerned.

Netley Castle Convalescent Home

8. Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to ensure that the Netley Castle convalescent home near Southampton remains open for National Health Service patients.

Mr. Whitney: Management of this hospital is the responsibility of the Southampton and South-West Hampshire health authority, which yesterday considered its future use. I understand the authority decided that this hospital should remain open.

Mr. Ross: I have had to turn again to the Minister for support, as I have been campaigning for three or four months to ensure that the hospital remains open. However, I am delighted at the news announced after last night's meeting. Is he aware that my constituents, some of whom are cancer sufferers, have very much relied on that home for the past 10 or 15 years? I pay tribute to the care and attention given by the staff at the home, which is very highly regarded in my part of the world. May I tell the Minister that I am grateful that that decision has been reached.

Mr. Whitney: I am somewhat overwhelmed, but I welcome and agree with the hon. Gentleman's points.

Sir David Price: Is my hon. Friend aware that that quite admirable home is in my constituency and that I have looked after it for the past 31 years? [Interruption.] Is my hon. Friend further aware that virtually all of the home's patients come not from the Southampton/south-west Hampshire area but from the Isle of Wight and the Channel Islands? We are delighted about that, but the funding arrangements vis à vis areas that send patients to that home are for from adequate. Given the squeeze on Southampton and south-west Hampshire, the pressure is on to obtain a better contribution from the districts that use the home.

Mr. Whitney: I am very happy to endorse the remarks of my hon. Friend who, over the past 31 years, has made a powerful contribution to his constituency. This year, the allocation to the Wessex area regional health authority, which involves that whole district, has been increased by 7·7 per cent. I very much hope that the authorities concerned will be able to fulfil my hon. Friend's wishes.

General Disability Premium

9. Mrs. Ann Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many representations he has received in support of the Government's proposals for a general disability premium.

Mr. Newton: Responses are not generally in a form that can sensibly be used to provide a simple breakdown of views. But the proposed simpler structure, with the associated aim of improved regular weekly income support for less well-off sick and disabled people as a whole, is welcome. However, there are reservations about some aspects and we are giving continued consideration to how they may be overcome.

Mrs. Clwyd: Does the Minister agree that several thousand of our most severely disabled people will suffer a cut of about 60 per cent. in their standard of living because of the proposals in the Social Security Bill? All the disability organisations have expressed concern. How does the hon. Gentleman square that with the Government's claim to be targeting those in greatest need of help?

Mr. Newton: I very much doubt the figures that the hon. Lady has given, although I know that they have been put forward. According to our latest information, about 2,500 claimants were receiving quite significant domestic assistance payments, but only to an average of £3·60, which does not correspond with the hon. Lady's information. I recognise the anxiety that exists, but we are trying to overcome it.

Mr. Alfred Morris: Will the Minister accept that the Government's proposals could inflict gratuitous extra hardship on some of the most severely disabled people in this country, and could force them into the sort of sub-human existence that Granada's "World in Action" documentary so strikingly exposed last night? Is he prepared to consider an as-of-right community care addition to meet the additional requirements of disabled people? Would it not be self-defeating as well as inhumane not to do so?

Mr. Newton: The right hon. Gentleman knows very well that that sort of community care consideration is very much in our minds in relation to the social fund. I am reasonably confident that we can find a way of meeting the right hon. Gentleman's objectives and mine.

Family Credit Scheme

10. Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many representations he has received in support of the Government's proposals for a family credit scheme.

Mr. Major: Many organisations and individuals responded to the proposals in the Green Paper "Reform of Social Security". The responses were not generally in a form permitting a simple breakdown of numbers for or against specific proposals, but many supported the main objectives of family credit, including the need to improve help for low-income families with children and the need to improve work incentives.

Mr. Evans: Will the Minister confirm that every women's organisation and every employer and trade union organisation representing women has protested in the strongest possible terms about this disgraceful proposal? Why do Tory Governments persist in treating women with contempt?

Mr. Major: I cannot precisely confirm the hon. Gentleman's first observation. To say that we are treating women with contempt is a curious comment to make about a benefit that doubles the number of beneficiaries and ensures that every beneficiary gets more money than before. That is the sort of contempt most people would welcome.

Mr. Squire: Given that the trigger mechanism for activating family credit is identical to the trigger mechanism for family income supplement, but that it is no longer paid to the caring parent, is my hon. Friend satisfied that it will lead to a reduction in family poverty?

Mr. Major: I understand the meaning behind my hon. Friend's remarks. I must point out to him that most two-parent working families rely on one wage and accept responsibility for deciding how to use it. There is no reason why that principle should not apply when family credit is part of the income.

Dr. Godman: What rate of take-up is anticipated for this benefit?

Mr. Major: The take-up for family income supplement is about 50 per cent. We anticipate that family credit will have a 60 per cent. take-up. That, of course, is a matter of speculative judgment and one cannot be sure, but we are relatively confident that it will have a substantially higher take-up than family income supplement.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Does the Minister accept that Governments of various colours have recognised that this benefit ought to be paid to the woman? What made the Government decide to move away from that crucial principle?

Mr. Major: The hon. Gentleman misunderstands the nature of the benefit. It forms a substantial element of help to low-income families. On that basis, it is entirely logical to illustrate its links with employment by payment in the fashion that we propose. We think that it will prove to be a popular benefit.

Mr. McCrindle: I endorse the sentiment underlying the idea of family credit. Has my hon. Friend received any representations from small employers expressing anxiety about the additional workload that will be placed upon them?

Mr. Major: There is considerable misunderstanding about the amount of work that will fall to employers. We intend that the Department of Health and Social Security will make the calculations for family credit and the re-calculations when a new period of benefit is due. We shall shortly issue a consultation paper for employers to comment upon and we shall enter into discussions with them about the way in which the benefit will work.

Mrs. Beckett: Does the Minister acknowledge that a more truthful answer to my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) would have been "one"? Does he also acknowledge that about like 100,000 families who will lose their entitlement to free school meals are not likely to welcome this benefit, especially as their compensation, when offset against housing benefit, is likely to be about 44p a week?

Mr. Major: In reply to the first part of the hon. Lady's question, I have nothing to add to what I said in reply to her hon. Friend. The hon. Lady mentioned school meals. She should bear in mind that the element of family credit that is applicable to school meals is £2·20 a week. Moreover, that is paid for 52 weeks of the year, whereas free school meals apply generally, but not inevitably, merely for 30 weeks of the year.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Does my hon. Friend agree that giving more financial assistance to parents with older children by means of family credit is an important step towards helping those greatly in need?

Mr. Major: I entirely agree with that observation.

Students (Benefits)

11. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has yet received the report of the Social Security Advisory Committee concerning the eligibility of students to claim benefits; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: We received the committee's report at the end of last month and are giving it careful consideration.

Mr. Bennett: Will the Minister publish the report as soon as possible? Does he agree that more and more students have been drawn into the social security net because of the inadequate level of student grants? Rather than taking from students the right to claim benefit, would it not be far more logical to put up student grants, so that students do not need to claim benefit? Does he not think that it would be grossly unfair if, as a result of these changes, students were forced down to the level of the social security safety net?

Mr. Newton: We shall publish the Social Security Advisory Committee's report at the normal time, that is, when we are publishing the Secretary of State's response to it. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that part of the proposition put to the SSAC was for an increase in the grant, countervailing some parts of the social security proposal.

Mr. Latham: Will my hon. Friend confirm that he is approaching the report, whatever it says, with an open mind, and not with a preconceived policy objective?

Mr. Newton: That may be implicit in the fact that we received the report towards the end of last month and are giving it careful consideration.

Ill Health and Poverty

12. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what assessment he has made of possible links between ill health and poverty.

Mr. Whitney: It has been widely accepted for many years that there are differences in health experience between socio-economic groups. However, the causes of these differences have proved extremely difficult to establish and are certainly complex. Research in the area continues to be supported by the Medical Research Council, the Economic and the Social Research Council and by universities.

Mr. Lloyd: I do not know much about the Minister's constituency, but I know about my own, where some of the poorest people in Britain live. I know that the chances of my constituents' children surviving birth is lower than the national average, that they will have worse health than the national average, and that they will die earlier. What will the Minister do about that?

Mr. Whitney: I do, indeed, know about my constituency, and I know something about the hon. Gentleman's constituency. Never has so much money been spent on health care in real terms as it now is in the Manchester area.

Mr. Thurnham: Does my hon. Friend agree that the findings of both the Black report and the Holland report, linking poverty and ill health, show that there should be no delay in the provision of urgently needed new hospital facilities in Bolton?

Mr. Whitney: We are continuing to provide new hospital facilities in the north-west region, which has one of the highest capital spending programmes of all the regional health authorities. Therefore, our concern is manifested by the real resources being devoted to new hospitals.

Mr. Dobson: If the Minister acknowledges—he can scarcely do otherwise — that there are differences in health and life expectations between social classes, why are the Government not doing anything to implement the recommendations of the Black report, which clearly sets out proposals intended to reduce those differences?

Mr. Whitney: The differences to which the hon. Gentleman refers have existed for many years and long before the Black report, which did not explain the causes. The proposals which have been implemented by the Government, for example the significant increase in expenditure on national health provision, and the expenditure on inner cities, the urban programme and such initiatives, clearly demonstrate effectively the Government's practical concern.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my hon. Friend agree that while there must always be a connection between a lack of facilities, wherever they are, and health problems, there are also genuine problems which are created by over-indulgence in many different ways as a result of affluence?

Mr. Whitney: I am happy to agree with my hon. Friend. A great deal of good health depends on healthy living styles, which we seek to promote directly through the Government and through the activities of the Government-funded Health Education Council. I agree with my hon. Friend that the level of income is by no means the deciding factor.

Ambulance Service (Quota Systems)

13. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what guidance he gives to health authorities on the use of quota systems in ambulance services.

Mr. Whitney: Our guidance on the provision of ambulance transport is based on criteria related to medical need. I understand that the Preston health authority has introduced a quota system for non-emergency services, but that there is no question of not meeting all cases of emergency medical need.

Mr. Pike: Will the Minister examine more closely the quota system which has been introduced for the whole of Lancashire? Will he stress to that authority that patients' needs are more important than cutting and saving cash? Will he make sufficient funds available to provide an adequate ambulance service for the people of Lancashire?

Mr. Whitney: I shall reconsider the point that the hon. Gentleman makes. During the five years to 1984-85 the Government have increased ambulance provision nationally in real terms by 9·2 per cent.

Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Bill

14. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has yet made an assessment of the resource implications of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Bill; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: The local authority associations were consulted on the likely cost of the Bill, if amended on the lines of the Government consultation paper issued in February. They estimated that cost as being in excess of £100 million in a full year. The associations and others are now being further consulted on the cost implications of the Bill in the form in which it received its Third Reading.

Mr. Dormand: Is the Minister aware that his answer confirms the suspicions felt by me and by many of my hon. Friends that the Government do not intend to honour their commitments on this measure, which received massive support when it was introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke)?. Are not the Government being a bit hypocritical in giving it an ostensibly warm welcome some two weeks ago, and in now saying that they cannot provide the resources for it?

Mr. Newton: There is no basis whatever for the hon. Gentleman's allegation. The Government, in completely good faith, have made it clear throughout that there were resource implications and that those implications would have to be considered in determining the date of the commencement orders.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr Gerald Bowden asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 29 April.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Bowden: In view of the widespread alarm about the reports of leaks from a nuclear installation in the Soviet Union, will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to reassure the House and the nation that our own security checks and monitoring system will prevent such an occurrence in the United Kingdom?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is aware that we have very high standards of safety, design, construction, operation and maintenance of nuclear plants in the United Kingdom. There is a question tabled on this subject which will be answered later today. I would just like to reassure my hon. Friend that preliminary measurements have failed to detect any increase in the level of radioactivity in this country.

Mr. Benn: Because this is a serious accident at a Soviet nuclear power station, and because the Americans themselves have refused to build a pressurised water reactor in the United States for nine years due to anxieties about their safety, will the Prime Minister give the House an absolute assurance that there will be no decision about building a PWR at Sizewell until the full report on the American accident—[Interruption.]—has been given to the inspector and until there has been an opportunity for the House to take into account the very large number of issues raised, including leaks at Sellafield and the decision to sell British plutonium to America for its weapons programme?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is in a position to know the very high standard of safety which we exact in the construction of our nuclear plants and the very high standards of the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate. As I have already indicated, we are not in a position to make a full assessment, but there has been no increase in radioactivity in this country that we have been able to detect. We shall have to await the report on the inquiry into Sizewell before taking any action.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Has my right hon. Friend had time today to correct the impression given by Kate Adey's report on BBC television that the stick of bombs that fell on some flats in Libya were aimed at a target approved by my right hon. Friend, when, in fact, they came from an aircraft damaged by anti-aircraft fire? The BBC showed none of the targets approved by my right hon. Friend as being used by those taking part in terrorism against this country and successfully struck in that attack.

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend makes his own point very effectively. As I have indicated in previous statements, the parameters which we set for permission to use those aircraft were strictly confined to targets which had demonstrably been involved in terrorist attacks elsewhere. I believe that what my hon. Friend says is correct.

Mr. Hattersley: Does the Prime Minister still hold the view that she expressed on BBC on Sunday—that there is never any possible justification for terrorism and violence?

The Prime Minister: I do not wish to put a gloss on what I said in that interview. It was a long interview and I believe that I explained my views fully.

Mr. Hattersley: Since, as part of that full expression of the Prime Minister's views, she said that violence and terrorism are never justified in any circumstances, will she now join us in condemning the violence and terrorism of the Contras in Nicaragua and in condemning President Reagan for providing military and financial aid to that terrorism?

The Prime Minister: I also referred to that in the interview and I neither wish to add to nor detract from what I said.

Mr. Hattersley: It was because I heard the Prime Minister refer to that that I wanted to express the nation's contempt for her double standards in that matter and give her a second opportunity of joining with the Opposition in condemning all terrorism—terrorism in Nicaragua and Libya. Why does she not do that now?

The Prime Minister: Because the right hon. Gentleman will also recall that I said what our policy on Nicaragua was. It was to support the Contadora process and get out all advisers from Nicaragua, including the many thousands of Cubans.

Q2. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 29 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. MacKay: Will my right hon. Friend find time today to confirm that she supports the view of the overwhelming majority of law-abiding people in Britain that the police are doing an excellent job, often in difficult circumstances, and not the view of Sharon Atkin, the prospective Labour candidate for Nottingham, East, who tells us that they are on the rampage and out of control?

The Prime Minister: I join my hon. Friend in believing that the police do an excellent job in Britain, completely impartially. I condemn those politicians who never hesitate to take a chance of criticising the police and the powers that enable them to carry out their task.

Mr. Dubs: When did the Prime Minister first learn of a plot to intimidate Mr. Gerry Gable of Searchlight magazine, and when was she told that a Conservative Member of Parliament was implicated in that allegation?

The Prime Minister: If the hon. Gentleman has any information of any kind he should give it to the police. Police matters, as he is well aware, are not for me.

Mr. Alex Fletcher: Was not the Soviet Union's failure to give the earliest possible warning to neighbouring countries about the dangers of nuclear fallout, and to say nothing about the lack of advice to their own citizens, a most callous and irresponsible act? Will my right hon. Friend take the earliest opportunity to condemn that action of the Soviet Union, both directly and through the offices of the EEC and the United Nations?

The Prime Minister: As I say, there will be an answer to a private notice question later, but I understand that the Swedish and Finnish Governments were informed of the accident only after radioactive clouds had reached their territory. It is, of course, a duty upon an authority that belongs to the International Atomic Energy Agency to report accidents to that agency.

Mr. Alton: What help and advice have been requested of the United Kingdom's Atomic Energy Authority in combating the fires that are now raging following the disaster in the Soviet Union yesterday? What transfrontier agreements exist between the Soviet Union and other countries for combating leaks of radioactive waste, and what agreements exist dealing with the disclosure of information after such leaks occur? Does the right hon. Lady not think that the disaster yesterday should cause us at least to reflect on the desirability of proceeding with the reprocessing of nuclear waste at Sellafield?

The Prime Minister: As I said, there is a reply to a private notice question, I believe, coming up later. We have not, as far as I am aware, received any requests for help, which is perhaps not surprising in all the circumstances. We are not in a position to make an assessment, and I have already indicated my views on the British nuclear industry, which has very high standards indeed.

Q3. Mr. Stern asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 29 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Stern: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the apparently small increase in the old-age pension this July is caused by the fact that it is an interim increase, with a further amount due next April? Does she further agree that this Government's record in caring for the old-age pensioner is second to none, not least by bringing down the rate of inflation to a level that would have been declared to be both impossible and unattainable by the Labour Government?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is correct. The increase that takes place in July is an interim increase following the major increase last November, which was £2·50 for a single pensioner and £4 a week for a married couple. There will, of course, be a further increase next April. I also agree with my hon. Friend that it is a great advantage to pensioners and to their savings to get down the rate of inflation. I hope that that advantage will continue. It will, for as long as we have a Conservative Government.

Mr. Raynsford: Does the Prime Minister agree that had the increase in the pension continued to be based on the increase in inflation or earnings, whichever was the greater, as was the case under the Labour Government, the average pensioner would be several pounds a week better off now?

The Prime Minister: Yes, but a Labour Government would have been broke long before they could implement their policy. Whatever the hon. Gentleman says, the pension under a Conservative Government buys more than it did after the last increase of Labour.

Mr. Alexander: In view of the wide appreciation in the United States of my right hon. Friend's support for the Libyan bombing, will she take the opportunity at this week's summit to ask President Reagan whether he will take further steps to curb the activities of Noraid, which promotes and subsidises terrorism in parts of the United Kingdom?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is correct. Of course this subject will be discussed at the summit and in the margins of the summit. I should like to thank both the President and most — indeed, all — Members of the Administration for the strenuous efforts that they have made to condemn terrorism and violence in Northern Ireland and to stop any finances coming from the United States to feed that terrorism. I shall make the point again to the President, and hope that the Senate will pass the extradition treaty.

Q4. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Prime Minister if she will list official engagements for Tuesday 29 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Does the Prime Minister recognise that the concern expressed following the accident at the nuclear power station in the Soviet Union obviously expresses the concern that everybody feels about such accidents? Will the Prime Minister recognise that international action is required, and will she initiate action under principle 21 of the United Nations declaration on the human environment of 1972—[Interruption.]

The Prime Minister: I wish that I could have heard all the hon. Gentleman's question, but, as I indicated, there will be replies to supplementary questions on a private notice question afterwards. The record of our own nuclear industry is absolutely superb. If there are any accidents overseas of the kind that we have seen in the Soviet Union, they should be reported to the International Atomic Energy Agency, so that the lessons can be learnt universally.

Mr. Sayeed: Will my right hon. Friend take time today to consider how best to use her very considerable abilities and standing in the world to persuade the USSR to abolish the use and production of chemical and biological weapons, so that the United States does not feel it necessary to develop binary weapons?

The Prime Minister: Yes. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State had something to say about this yesterday. The Soviet Union possesses over 300,000 tonnes of chemical warfare agents. Like the United States, we in Britain are committed to seeking a negotiated ban, and a successful outcome to the Geneva talks would obviate the need for the United States to pursue modernisation. The fact that the Soviet Union has continued to build up its stockpile, while no United States weapons have been produced since 1969, is conclusive proof that one-sided disarmament does not work.

Q5. Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 29 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Mitchell: Will the Prime Minister take time to reflect on, and explain to the country, what she sees as the moral difference between killing and maiming innocents by exploding bombs underneath them, and killing and maiming innocents by throwing bombs on their heads?

The Prime Minister: If the hon. Gentleman is saying that one must never be prepared to use force against those who attack us with force, he is giving in to terrorism.

Mr. Rowe: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, arising out of questions. As is so often the case, it took the Opposition Front Bench three attempts to make a point that a Back-Bencher would have had to make in one. Was it in order for the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) to have made his third attempt in a form that was not even a question?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has been here long enough to know that a certain latitude is always given to the Front Benches.

Soviet Nuclear Accident

3.31 pm

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the dangers to the British Isles of fallout from the accident at the Soviet nuclear plant at Chernobyl, near Kiev.

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Kenneth Baker): The whole House will want to join me in expressing sympathy to the people of the Soviet Union. We do not know with any certainty the precise nature of the incident, but it is clear that there may have been significant casualties.

A disturbing feature of this incident is the way in which knowledge of it has come not from the Soviet Government, but from monitoring in other countries. I would urge the Soviet Government to give a full account of what has happened and the steps that have been taken to bring the incident under control.

We for our part are monitoring, through the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority, the National Radiological Protection Board and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, levels of radioactivity in the United Kingdom. Present evidence suggests that there is no danger to the United Kingdom, but the situation will continue to be monitored carefully.

Dr. Cunningham: I thank the Minister for that statement. Will Her Majesty's Government make strong and immediate representations to the Government of the Soviet Union on the need for the most full and urgent disclosure of all information about the nature and the scale of this accident? Can he confirm that a graphite moderated reactor in the station, comprising four light water reactors without, apparently, any secondary containment, has been on fire for several days?

Do Her Majesty's Government have any information about the nature of the radioactive emissions that are taking place? Will Her Majesty's Government respond positively to any requests from the Soviet Union for assistance? Can the Minister confirm that there are no nuclear stations of this type and design in the United Kingdom? Will any additional monitoring in the United Kingdom be required and what liaison is taking place with other European Governments on the nature of the contamination?

Will Her Majesty's Government join other European Governments to request international inspection of the site and the consequences of the accident? Does the Secretary of State know whether there are any British citizens in the vicinity of the plant? Finally—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I am astonished that Conservative Members apparently do not regard this as a serious matter. Will the Secretary of State convey the sympathy of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition, my hon. Friends, myself and the House to the Government and people of the Soviet Union?

Mr. Baker: On the hon. Gentleman's last point, I am sure that the beginning of my statement will cover that. I speak on behalf of the whole house. There have been casualties and clearly we are concerned. On the matter of strong representations to the Soviet Government, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy this morning asked that full details of the accident and what is happening be made available. I cannot confirm details about a continuing fire at the moment.

We have not received any request for assistance through our embassy, but I can assure the House that if we receive a request for assistance of a scientific nature and we can be helpful assistance will be made available.

I can confirm that we have no power stations of the type involved in this incident in the United Kingdom. There has been extensive monitoring in the United Kingdom by the National Radiological Protection Board in Oxford and Glasgow with gamma monitors. There is no evidence of increased radioactivity at present. The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is checking deposit in the United Kingdom. It has collecting posts on the east coast and also on high rainfall areas in north Wales. Milk samples will continue to be taken this week.

All the Central Electricity Generating Board power stations have monitoring equipment and there is no indication of an increase in radioactivity. On the issue of international inspection, the Soviet Union is a member of the International Atomic Energy Agency, and, as such, I hope that it will make information about the accident available through that body—because that is part of the principle of it. It is valuable for the world nuclear industry to know as much about it as possible.

The hon. Gentleman asked about British citizens. At this stage we do not know whether any British citizens were affected, but the embassy in Moscow is making inquiries.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin (Wanstead and Woodford): Is it not clear that many of the questions asked by the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) would have been better addressed to the Soviet Government? Is there not a remarkable contrast between the reticence of the Soviet authorities about what is obviously an extremely serious accident and the openness of the system in western Governments, most recently exemplified by the statement of the new chairman of BNFL, Mr. Harding, which has been so warmly welcomed by environmental interests in this country?

Mr. Baker: Unfortunately, there is a striking contrast. We have to be concerned about public opinion and it is only right and proper that we should put our cards on the table and be open—as we are—on these matters. I have been speaking this morning and this afternoon to representatives of our large team of nuclear inspectors and confirming that in our nuclear policy safety is absolutely paramount. In fact, if nuclear energy is to be generated, as we believe that it should be, it must carry the conviction of the people. That can be done only by very rigorous safety standards.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Is the Minister aware that the British Council has said that there are some 100 British students and several teachers in the Kiev region? What have the authorities in Moscow and Leningrad done to try to make contact with them to ascertain their safey? Will he also agree that it is somewhat wry for the Government to criticise the lack of information coming from the Soviet Union, regrettable though that is, when the Government have a very tight rein over the information made available from our own nuclear industry? Far too much secrecy shrouds our nuclear industry.

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman does his cause no good by exaggerating. There is openness and frankness in this country in dealing with the nuclear industry. It is one of the most regulated industries we have, with a vast number of checks and balances on environmental grounds and safety in the plants. The embassy in Moscow is checking on the students. We know that there are some students in Minsk which is just 100 km to the north of the incident.

Mr. David Crouch (Canterbury): Will my right hon. Friend, in conjunction with his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy, stress to the Government of the Soviet Union the importance of the complete release of all the information concerning this tragedy so that we may share the information regarding such a disaster and learn from it?

Mr. Baker: Yes, I will certainly do that. The information will be of interest to us and to the Scandinavian countries which have been more directly affected. It is important that the information is available, as we all make strong representations to the Soviet Government.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Before the right hon. Gentleman is too ready with his criticism of concealment of information, which I too regret, would he accept that a major nuclear explosion at Kyshtym in the Soviet Union in 1958 was monitored by the Central Intelligence Agency which notified the Atomic Energy Authority in Britain but told the British agency not to make the information public for fear that it might cause anxiety about the use of nuclear power? There are many other examples of such concealment.

Apart from the risks of a radioactive cloud reaching Britain, which I agree is unlikely, will the right hon. Gentleman undertake to ensure that, before any authority is given to proceed with the pressurised water reactor, there is a full report of the cause of the light water reactor accident at Chernobyl? Is it not time that the House had an opportunity for a debate on nuclear power as a growing number of people believe that the time has come to phase it out?

Mr. Baker: The right hon. Gentleman's last point is not a matter for me. However, with regard to his first point, the right hon. Gentleman would be on stronger ground if the Soviet Union had told the world about the accident when it occurred rather than our learning about it from the monitoring equipment in other countries. I strongly contest the right hon. Gentleman's view that there is anything less than frankness in our dealings with the nuclear industry in Britain. I dare say that, over the coming weekend, the protests about nuclear energy will be much stronger in the West than in the Soviet Union.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): Does my right hon. Friend not agree that the disaster illustrates the international dimension to nuclear accidents? As a result, does he think that it is now time for some international monitoring, or better still, international safety standards for nuclear reactors?

Mr. Baker: My hon. Friend will know that we are a member of the International Atomic Energy Agency; that involves obligations of openness and a willingness to allow inspection and examination of records and things of that kind. That is very important as it stresses the international nature of the nuclear industry.

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the catastrophe has demonstrated again that such accidents cannot be confined to national boundaries, like other less deadly forms of pollution? Will he intercede with his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland to postpone the present inquiry into the Dounreay reprocessing plant until the countries which might be affected by any radioactivity from that plant have been consulted?

Mr. Baker: The right hon. Gentleman should appreciate, as I am sure he does, the very good safety record of the British nuclear energy industry. There has been no full-scale major incident in 25 years in the operation of several power stations. The highest standards of safety are used in the design and construction of British nuclear power plants.

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): Will my right hon. Friend consult his right Friend the Home Secretary to discover the best way to deal with the hordes of CND and Greenpeace protestors who are no doubt at this moment massing outside the Soviet embassy?

Mr. Baker: As I said in reply to the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), the protests are likely to be much greater in western capitals this weekend than in Moscow.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): I have taken note of the opinion expressed by the Secretary of State, that the nuclear industry in Britain has been open and frank about its operations; I am reassured by that. However, in view of the difficulty experienced in obtaining information about Sellafield in the past, will he assure us that the information that is made available by the Soviet Union will be freely available in Britain? Furthermore, will he ask his right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary to ensure that his Department makes representations on behalf of people like my constituent Mr. Robin Denham who is currently studying at the university of Kiev and who has been exposed to grave danger as a result of the accident? Will the Secretary of State arrange for the British authorities to make arrangements for the evacuation of British subjects, should it prove to be necessary?

Mr. Baker: On the hon. Gentleman's last point, I shall draw to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs the name of the hon. Gentleman's constituent. I assure him that the British embassy in Moscow is making urgent inquiries about the number of students in both Kiev and Minsk. The information that we get will be made publicly available.

Mr. Robert Banks (Harrogate): Does my right hon. Friend agree that there are many lessons to be learnt from this disaster, not least that it is immensely important for a nation to have the insurance of trained civilian personnel to deal with emergencies and to offer advice and protection from radiation to those who seek it?

Mr. Baker: I agree with my hon. Friend that there are elaborate emergency arrangements in all civil nuclear power plants which are tested fully; and the staff are trained to deal with emergencies. I emphasise again that the design of the Russian reactor—a light-water-cooled graphite moderated reactor—is unique and that there are no other stations like it in the West. I understand from the Central Electricity Generating Board that British experts have evaluated this design and rejected it as unstable.

Mr. D. E. Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): Will the Secretary of State accept the deep concern and sympathy of those who have nuclear power stations in their constituencies for the community which has been affected by this disaster? Will he take new initiatives at the international level, through the International Atomic Energy Agency, to ensure that new safety standards worldwide are implemented? It is clear that radiological emission is no respecter of nations and state boundaries.

Mr. Baker: Yes, but that also implies that other countries have to conform to this country's standards. If there had been an accident of that kind in this country, there is no question but that we would have been open and frank about it straight away and that it would have been treated in that way. It is regrettable that that did not happen in this case.

Mr. David Madel (Bedfordshire, South-West): In view of the slow way in which the Russian Government let out this information, will Her Majesty's Government make a formal request to the Russian Government for international inspection of the disaster area?

Mr. Baker: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy passed a message to the Soviet Government this morning asking for the fullest information. I am in no position to say whether or not the Soviet Government will respond to that message. Their response may be delayed, but I very much hope not. All sides of the House have made it clear that it is in everybody's interest that as much information as possible should be made available about this incident as soon as possible.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): If the present rules of the International Atomic Energy Agency do not provide for the earliest possible disclosure, will the Secretary of State set out to amend those rules, particularly as the Soviet Union is a participator in that agreement?

Mr. Baker: It is no good taking a unilateral position unless the other parties to the agreement are prepared also to be frank and open. The international agreement allows for international inspection of civil power stations. The CEGB was, and is, prepared to conform to that agreement, but I am afraid that that is not the case, as far as we know, in Russia.

Cornish Tin Industry

3.47 pm

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement indicating the Government's intention regarding the future of the Cornish tin industry.

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Peter Morrison): The Government have made it clear that they are willing to consider applications for assistance towards the cost of projects which will make the mines competitive in a free tin market. An application from Geevor tin mines is already being considered. An application from the RTZ group is expected shortly. Both will be assessed as rapidly as possible.

Mr. Penhaligon: I remind the Minister of the seriousness of the situation, as these mines are in an area where average male unemployment is in excess of 25 per cent. Already this saga has been going on for six months. Furthermore, I remind the Minister that he still has the £50 million that was offered to the tin dealers. Will the Minister accept that because of the current price for tin very few mines in the world are breaking even, let alone making a profit? If, therefore, Rio Tinto Zinc could be persuaded to give the mines and the £15 million that they would incur in closure costs to a management-employee buy-out and if the employees could be persuaded to take a pay cut in lieu of some form of long-term profit sharing, would the Government be prepared to make a significant contribution towards enabling a new company to be relaunched on the market so that advantage could be taken of the rise in the price of tin when it occurs?

Mr. Morrison: As the hon. Gentleman knows, I am aware of the serious position in Cornwall. With every respect to him, his question about management buy-outs by those involved in the RTZ mines was hypothetical. As I said in my original answer, we expect a proposition to be put forward by RTZ on the ground that it will make the mines viable at some future stage. Like all Governments, we need to have a test of viability foremost in our minds.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): Is my hon. Friend aware of the desperate situation facing Geevor mine—that, unless help is forthcoming this week, it is almost certain that the pumps will be switched off at the weekend and that the mine will be flooded, probably never to reopen? I make an earnest and urgent plea that, before this week is out, the Government will make assistance available to Geevor, at least to keep those pumps going while negotiations continue on the Geevor application.

Mr. Morrison: I assure my hon. Friend that it is important to expedite the Geevor application. Whether we can have care and maintenance in the meantime will depend upon that.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Do not the Government have a cheek to talk about a test of viability regarding the thousands of people who have lost or will lose their jobs in the tin mines in Cornwall and the south-west when the Government never applied that test of viability to the Export Credits Guarantee Department, when it was £350 million in the red, but used taxpayers' money to bail it out? The Government found £252 million to bail out the Common Market, because it had run out of funds, and more than £100 million to bail out Johnson

Matthey Bank, because their friends were involved. The Government talk about a test of viability. Why do they not give people a chance to earn some money instead of throwing them on the scrap heap and paying out dole money which the taxpayers have to find?

Mr. Morrison: If I recall correctly, the hon. Gentleman supported a Government during the 1970s——

Mr. Skinner: Supported a what?

Mr. Morrison: —supported a Government during the 1974-79 period that used the test of viability to close down the Ebbw Vale steelworks in the constituency of the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot). They used the test of viability, as we must.

Mr. Robert Hicks (Cornwall, South-East): Is my hon. Friend aware of the rising sense of frustration and annoyance at the delay in resolving the tin question with specific reference to the Cornish tin-producing mines? Will he assure the House that the various suggestions and applications that have been made will be dealt with immediately by his Department in the context of our county, which is already in a hard-pressed economic position?

Mr. Morrison: The simple answer to my hon. Friend is yes. If my hon. Friend were to discuss the matter with the management of Geevor and of RTZ, he would be informed that my officials have dealt with the matter as expeditiously as possible in terms of the preparation of submissions, and so on. Therefore, the simple answer is yes.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): I advise the hon. Gentleman to check his facts a little more carefully before he again refers to Ebbw Vale. Regarding the specific question which he is supposed to be answering today—on the Cornish tin mines—will he look back and see what a Labour Government did to put money into those mines and to keep them going thereafter? Without that money, the closures might not have taken place in the late 1970s. Many miners in Cornwall know that that is the truth, even if some of their representatives in this place do not.

Mr. Morrison: I am delighted to be reminded by the right hon. Gentleman that I should check my facts more carefully on the steel works which I mentioned. I certainly am aware of what happened under the previous Administration.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): I remind my hon. Friend that, as long ago as Easter, the Select Committee on Trade and Industry published an interim report urging the Government to be prepared for the possibility of the action that has now come about and to be ready to take interim measures to sustain the position until final decisions can be made. Will my hon. Friend express a greater assurance which we can pass on to management and workers in Cornwall and which will allow them to continue until a final decision has been made? Surely it would be fatal to have the matter closed now, because the Government might come forward with a favourable decision in four or five weeks.

Mr. Morrison: I am aware that the Select Committee on Trade and Industry spent a considerable time looking into the matter. Its report goes into detail in many ways about the whole tin problem. I am aware also that the Select Committee recommended certain proposals that the Government should adopt. I hope that my hon. Friend agrees that it would not be sensible to reply to the Select Committee's proposals until we have had an application from RTZ—we shall reply as soon as we can—because that would be the wrong way to proceed. I listened carefully to my hon. Friend's other question.

Mr. Stan Crowther (Rotherham): Would it not be disgraceful if this small but important industry, which contributes many millions of pounds a year to the national economy, were allowed to die from lack of help from a Government who claim to be devoted to the free market philosophy but who have actively supported an international cartel which was set up to manipulate the market and whose activities the Select Committee found came pretty close to the borders of criminality? If Ministers are prepared, as they said they were, to put £50 million of taxpayers' money into trying to rescue the dealing end of the business, does it not make sense to accept the Select Committee's recommendation that the Government should invest at least that amount in the producing end of the business where the real wealth creation takes place?

Mr. Morrison: With respect, I do not think that the hon. Gentleman listened to my original answer. I said that my Department was looking carefully at applications to ascertain whether they passed the test of viability. That is precisely what we are doing and, I think, what the hon. Gentleman would want us to do. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that we could not be looking more closely at the applications.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Is the problem for my hon. Friend as a Minister the fact that the test of viability depends upon predicting the world price of tin after the banks have finished unloading the tin warrants they hold as security and after the mines throughout the world have finished unloading the stock which they thought they had sold ahead but for which the contracts have gone bad? Will my hon. Friend follow the much more positive recommendations of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, as expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery), and support the development work in the mines which will reduce production costs, whatever the price in five years' time? None of us can possibly foresee that price. As this crisis will drive out many marginal producers in the world, is it not sensible to take a "risk"—no one can predict the price four or five years ahead — and support employment rather than suffer unemployment?

Mr. Morrison: I agree with my hon. Friend that one important element is the price of tin in three, four or five years. I agree also with his proposition that, if there is to be investment in any of the mines in Cornwall, it must be aimed at reducing production costs. The judgment to be taken is based more on the former than on the latter. We shall have to take those matters into account, as will the companies concerned.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Judging from the example of Polkemmet in my constituency, once the pumps have been turned off in any mine, one might as well call it quits. May I ask a question of fact? How much tin will actually be anaesthetised by any decision to close down the mines and cut off the pumps? It may not be possible to regain the tin at any time. Frankly, is this not another case of accountants in the City of London making decisions on matters for which they have little feeling?

Some of us support strongly the views of the Cornish tin miners. As one who has attended party meetings in Cornwall, I know how strongly they feel. Their factual questions have not been answered. What are the reserves of tin which will be anaesthetised? Does the Department know, or does it have no notion?

Mr. Morrison: Of course the Department knows. The amount of tin produced at the current price, which is just under £4,000 a tonne, is equal to the sum of £25 million a year. Of course the hon. Gentleman will appreciate that tin is an international commodity——

Mr. Dalyell: What are the reserves? The Minister is not answering the question.

Mr. Morrison: I have answered the question. One of the points which must be taken into account is that there is, to a great extent, over-production; that is why the price of tin has come down gradually.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): Will the Minister confirm that, in 1979, RTZ was offered money under the Labour Government scheme to develop the mine? The company turned down that offer because it was confident that it would prosper under the present Government. More important, is the Minister aware that over 1,000 members of my union and other unions are likely to be made unemployed as a result of this action? While the Minister is waiting for RTZ and the other companies to state the schemes to make the mines viable, what are the Government prepared to offer the firms to maintain jobs? That is what Cornish people want to know, and that is what my union want to know. What are the Government prepared to offer the companies to keep people in jobs?

Mr. Morrison: The hon. Gentleman asks a hypothetical question. The answer depends entirely on what applications are made. The hon. Gentleman is aware that, under regional grant and regional assistance, aid is not cash-limited so the answer is as long as a piece of string.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): If these mines are closed there will be dire consequences for Cornwall, the industry and the country. In view of that, will the Minister explain more fully to the House what he means by viability? When considering viability, will the Minister take into account the long-term position of these mines, and the enormous cost to the public purse as well as the companies involved of closing any pits?

Mr. Morrison: I hope that it goes without saying that the long term is what we must take into account. Obviously, at this stage, there is no question of the mines being anything but unviable. Any investment will be in terms of production costs and the price of tin in three, four, or five years' time.

Mr. Dalyell: What a bloody way to run the country.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): Why is the Minister reluctant to show any relevant initiative when he is faced with this critical problem? Will he recognise that this is not a normal rescue case? In addition to needing the appropriate investment decision to which he has referred, there is a desperate need for interim aid to meet the crisis which has followed the collapse of the International Tin Council. The Minister has sat back for six months. He has watched the situation develop, he has done nothing and now he has been caught unawares.

Does not the hon. Gentleman realise that it is not just a matter of 1,300 jobs at Geevor and RTZ, but also of more than 2,000 other jobs in the Cornish community which depend on those mines? The present 3,000 jobs in Cornwall will be impossible to replace now that regional aid has ben diminished to a cosmetic sham. When the Minister eventually makes his penny-pinching calculations, will he recollect that these mines put £26 million a year into the local Cornish economy? What is at risk is not just the viability of the mines, but the viability of a sub-region.

Will the Minister reflect on the fact that, last year, the same mines saved the country £40 million in import substitution? The Minister could rescue the mines for less than the annual £80 million cost of keeping 3,000 miners and dependent workers on the dole queues for two years.

Mr. Morrison: I do not think the right hon. Gentleman is correct when he says that no real initiatives have been taken. During the last few weeks my Department could not have done more in terms of encouraging applications, sifting them carefully and giving guidance on how best they could be put forward. That is the fact of the matter. The right hon. Gentleman suggests that we should go down the route of operating subsidies regardless. On reflection, that would not be the right course to pursue.

Prison Officers' Dispute

4.5 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hurd): Mr. Speaker, I will with permission make a statement on the dispute with the Prison Officers Association.

The House will recall that I set out the issues in the dispute in my reply to a private notice question from the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) on 17 April. Since then I have twice met representatives of the national executive committee of the Prison Officers Association. Following my first meeting, I put to them, in writing on 22 April, a package of proposals for resolving the dispute. When I met them again yesterday, POA representatives accepted that my proposals provided a way forward. They undertook in return to consider my request that they call off industrial action in order to allow a resolution on this basis to proceed.

In the event, the POA declined yesterday to go beyond the offer of an undertaking that it would instruct its members not to take action while talks on the basis of my proposals were proceeding. In effect, that amounted to an offer to suspend, but not to call off, its industrial action. But its previous undertaking to suspend had proved ineffective, and damaging industrial action had taken place despite it. So its position yesterday represented no advance on the situation it had taken in talks last week and was not acceptable. The Government cannot conduct talks under the continuing threat of further industrial action in this vital public service.

The POA therefore broke off discussions and has announced that it is considering ways of extending its industrial action, which may include strike action. As I make this statement, it is still not clear what action the POA may take in practice.

I deeply regret this action by the national executive committee of the POA, which shows no regard for the longer-term interests of its members or, equally importantly, for the prisoners in its members' charge. The sort of industrial action that we have already seen at Gloucester prison—where prison officers yesterday took control of the prison and refused to accept the orders of their governor and where they are still refusing to return to normal working—is unacceptable. The Government will take all possible steps both to sustain the right of governors to manage their prisons and to protect prisoners and the public from the consequences of POA action. In this context, a circular will be issued tomorrow to the courts containing advice on the implications for them of the dispute. A copy will be placed in the Library of the House. I shall consider any further measures which may be necessary.

I take this opportunity to make a further appeal to prison officers to look at the package of proposals I have placed before them and to judge whether it is worth throwing that away by taking further industrial action. As I have publicly acknowledged many times, prison officers do a difficult and often dangerous job. They deserve to be well paid. But the heavy burden of overtime must be lightened and there must be increased efficiency.

Progress towards formal discussions about a range of new systems designed to meet all these objectives was being made when the NEC call for industrial action went out. The agenda for talks, set out in my letter of 22 April, represents a positive way forward for prison officers and, indeed, the whole prison service. I very much hope that even now, prison officers will end their action to avoid lasting damage to the prison service and to their own interests.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): Two years ago the Government were insisting that industrial action was unacceptable without a ballot. Now they are insisting that industrial action is unacceptable with a ballot: a ballot with 78 per cent. voting and 81 per cent. in favour of industrial action, and a ballot held under the Government's own legislation.

Prison officers carry out a dirty and dangerous job in increasingly difficult conditions, caused by the collapse of the Government's law and order policy and the record crime wave under this Government, which has produced a huge increase in the prison population and unprecedented overcrowding, with as many inmates now as the Home Office forecast for 1993. Prisoners are often three in a cell. They may be locked in their cells for 23 hours and the workshops may be closed.

The Government are spending more money on building prisons but are seeking to save money on running them, with prison officers being left to carry the burden, especially with the extra duties that they now have in servicing the unprecedented number of prisoners on remand. The prison officers have made it clear that they fully agree that it is not their role to control manning levels, but why will the Home Secretary not agree to a proper and sensible role for them in deciding safe manning levels, particularly as the POA has offered to instruct its members to take no further action while talks are going on?

That would be the sensible way of solving these difficulties, and would be much more sensible than the ridiculous antics going on at Gloucester prison. Last night, the deputy governor arrived at the prison gate and announced that he was bringing fish and chips for the governor. Under cover of that fast food, four assistant governors rushed in to take over the prison. Will the Home Secretary repudiate such tactics, and admit that the Government have been planning for this very dispute for many months?

That is demonstrated by the 80-page document that I have with me, which was circulated months ago. It is headed:

"Confidential

Association of Chief Police Officers of England, Wales and Northern Ireland

Industrial Action In The Prison Service

Police Contingency Planning

Notes of guidance."

Among other things, the document says:

"Confidentiality is most important in relation to contingency planning. Should it become known to the POA that such planning was taking place by police it may result in the escalation of an already delicate situation."

It is a delicate situation, and the contingency planning has become known.

The Government long ago decided that, after other groups of workers whom they had chosen, the prison officers would be their next enemy. I warn the Home Secretary that with his intransigent bungling in this exceptionally delicate area he is recklessly playing with fire.

Mr. Hurd: I always hope for better from the right hon. Gentleman but I am always disappointed on occasions like this.

The neglect that the whole prison service suffers from is the neglect of previous Governments to do anything about prison building—[Interruption.] My right hon. and noble Friend the Lord President of the Council started the prison building programme after years of neglect by others. By now the right hon. Gentleman should know that we have recruited 18 per cent. more prison officers since 1979 while the number of prisoners has increased by 12 per cent. Consequently, it is completely false to say that we are not staffing to match the increased prison population. We have staffed over and above the increase in prison population.

The POA and I thought that last week we were very near agreement on the POA's role in being consulted over manning levels. I wrote the POA a letter which I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will study. The POA wrote back indicating that the contents were very near to what it had in mind. Industrial action then followed. The POA said that it would be willing to suspend industrial action, but it was not suspended. In those circumstances, I am sure that discussions can only fruitfully take place if the POA calls off industrial action.

I entirely disagree with what the right hon. Gentleman said about Gloucester. Yesterday, the situation there was serious, because POA members refused to run the prison in the way that the governor directed. Later, as a result of the governing grades' ingenuity, a number of governing grades were able to enter the prison. The situation is now under control. However, if they had followed the right hon. Gentleman's advice, the situation in Gloucester prison would be out of control.

Of course there are contingency plans. If we had reached this position and it had appeared to the House and the right hon. Gentleman that there were no contingency plans, he would have been the first to jump up and down in excited indignation, wanting to know why we had not foreseen this possibility. But as I said at the end of my statement, I believe that we were close to agreement last week. I also believe that we are close to an understanding now. However, I hope that the POA will understand that it is not possible for any of us to get on with the agenda that we are anxious to discuss while the threat and reality of industrial action hangs over us.

Mrs. Sally Oppenheim (Gloucester): I concur with my right hon. Friend in his general line, and deplore the militant action that has taken place. But will he bear in mind that—as he will know from correspondence that he has had with me—prison officers in Gloucester have been under considerable pressure? That pressure is the result, among other things, of the presence of a special unit in the prison and of at least one prisoner who is suffering from AIDS. Those prison officers have a long history of fine service and non-militancy, and I hope that my right hon. Friend will bear that in mind when discussions resume. Will he give an undertaking to take whatever steps are necessary to protect the citizens of Gloucester if things get out of hand?

Mr. Hurd: Yes indeed. I do not believe that there is any threat to the security of Gloucester prison, thanks to the timely action that the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) criticised. What my right hon. Friend has said about the role of prison officers is true, not only in relation to Gloucester but elsewhere. However, in view of some of the things that have been said, I should make it clear that no one has been dismissed as a result of these activities. If the POA staff agree to work normally under management's instructions, they will be reinstated.

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): As I have three prisons in my constituency and two of them are high security prisons, may I support the call for saner counsels to prevail? Is it not a fact that on Sunday, at least, prison officers at Leicester went back to work at the POA's request? Is the Secretary of State aware of the niggling things that have been introduced into the prison service, particularly in Albany, that payments due to prison officers have been withheld, niggling restrictions have been imposed, and the number of prison officers on night duty, in particular, has fallen to a dangerously low level? Surely it would be possible to renew negotiations with a postponement of industrial action, even though that action has been voted for by a very large majority of the POA. That would be better than calling for absolute abandonment, which is totally unrealistic.

Mr. Hurd: Yesterday I was holding discussions with representatives of the POA. In theory, action was suspended, but in fact action of particularly damaging and disruptive kind was under way at Gloucester, Swansea and Northallerton. One cannot allow such a situation to continue. With his knowledge of these affairs, the hon. Gentleman will understand that we have been recruiting prison officers at a substantially faster rate than the rise in the number of prisoners. However, we are not using them correctly.

There are all sorts of rigidities and inflexible practices which, if we could discuss them constructively with the POA, would be resolved. We could say goodbye to a good many of them, and that would increase the resources available for other purposes within the prison service. That is what I want to get on with, but I cannot do so in the sort of circumstances that obtained yesterday, when in theory action was suspended but in practice it was raging.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Will my right hon. Friend accept that, as a Leicester Member of Parliament, I did not agree with the industrial action taken by some of Leicester's prison officers? However, they are under some strain because of the secure wing. May I have my right hon. Friend's confirmation that there will be no surrender, that the courts will not be deterred from passing custodial sentences, and that everything possible will be done to ensure not only that there are custodial sentences but that there is a proper ballot by all prison officers before any further strike action is taken?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend will know that there was a ballot that empowers the national executive to take industrial action but does not compel it to do so. I agree with my hon. Friend and hope the executive will decide in the interests of its members and of the prison service not to use that mandate. My hon. Friend will wish to look carefully at the circular to the courts. I hope he will agree that it does not run counter to the principles he talked about.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): I accept that the problem of running the prisons has been with us for a long time. It goes back to the Administration in which I was Home Secretary, but also goes back beyond that, to previous Home Secretaries. An approach in narrow party political terms, suggesting that it is all the fault of the Labour Government, will get the Home Secretary nowhere. [Interruption.] The Home Secretary can answer for himself and he does not have to respond. I realise that this is a difficult subject. What was this agreement of a mere few days ago from which all would have been well? Would it not help public discussion to see who was wrong and who was right if the Home Secretary told us what the agreement was?

Mr. Hurd: I responded temperately to the attack by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) who said it was all our fault. I had hoped that such an attack might not be made on this occasion but it was made. The right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) will absolve me from too much intemperateness in my reply to his right hon. Friend.

My letter of 22 April has already been made fairly well known and is in the Library. That is the letter to the general secretary of the POA in which I set out the understanding upon which we were close to agreement on the role of the POA in being consulted and in discussing manning levels. I went on to discuss the pay claim, which should be about to be negotiated with the Treasury. Obviously, such negotiations cannot take place in present circumstances. I also discussed tax compensation on housing allowances and the whole matter of working practices, which I have already discussed. That is the agenda that I want to get on with and, given his experience, the right hon. Gentleman will understand the importance of that.

Mr. David Crouch (Canterbury): There is a prison in my constituency and I have been meeting prison officers for the last 20 years. I have a high regard for the officers and for the service that they provide, both to the public and to the prisoners. However, I wholly condemn their approach in taking industrial action, just as I wholly condemn the attitude of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) who exacerbated the problem by what he said. Can we do something to assist this somewhat silent, forgotten and hidden service? The prison service is somewhat hidden when compared with the police. The officers do not have a parliamentary spokesman and sometimes think that they are somewhat forgotten. I hope that my right hon. Friend can assure them that taking industrial action is not the way to be remembered or noticed.

Mr. Hurd: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. The prison service has suffered from under-discussion — if there is such a term. It would be a good thing if the House, the political parties and the public in general outside the specialist groups, took a greater interest in the state of the prisons and in what we are doing to remedy the conditions that we find.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): Is it not entirely understandable that officers at Pentonville prison in my constituency are anxious and angry about the conditions under which they have to perform their duties? That prison was built for 600 and is now housing 1,000 prisoners. Three workshops are being closed down and, because of under-staffing, wings are left for hours at a time without being patrolled. Those are the problems. What action does the Home Secretary intend to take to tackle those basic issues that lie at the heart of this dispute?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman describes the scandal of overcrowding. If he had carried out his research correctly he would know where to attribute the blame for that. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the knotty part of the problem is the high level of overtime. It averages 16 hours a week per officer and makes up for 30 per cent. of average earnings. By any standard, that is too much. We want to discuss with the POA the proper balance between staffing hours and increased manpower and overtime. As the hon. Gentleman will see from the figures that I have given, an increase in manpower is coming through. Out of such discussions could come a new deal that would get rid of some of the present rigid and restrictive practices and add substantially to the prospects for the prison service as a whole.

Mr. John Hannam (Exeter): I deplore the action taken by the Prison Officers Association but I should like to pay tribute to the prison officers in Exeter prison. It is a remand prison and conditions there have deteriorated over the years. There is severe overcrowding and a shortage of staff. Will my right hon. Friend look again at a subject that worries prison officers — the policy of enforced early retirement? That was imposed in recent years and is a source of great anxiety to prison staff.

Mr. Hurd: I shall certainly look at that, although my hon. Friend will know the reason for it. I agree with my hon. Friend that the rise in the remand population is disturbing. He will know about the efforts that we are making, for example through trials on time limits, to encourage the processes of law to work faster so that there are fewer people on remand.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): I was recently given an answer to a question about Featherstone prison which was wholly misleading. It was about the overcrowding there and the pressure on officers. It is that kind of false information from management to Ministers that causes Ministers to get into the mess that they are in now. I shall be grateful for an early alteration to the answer that I was given.

It is better for Ministers and others who visit prisons such as Winson Green to do so in the early hours of the morning, at slopping out time, instead of at midday. If they did that they would see the real effects of overcrowding and understand why the prison officers have explained that they cannot any more do random searches of the cells. We have reached a ludicrous state of affairs and it is aggravated by people being sent to prison for less than seven days. It is inexplicable that this kind of thing can go on, because it puts unnecessary pressure on already overcrowded prisons.

Mr. Hurd: It is important for Ministers to visit prisons. As the hon. Gentleman knows, I try to do that and my noble Friend who deals with the prison service also visits the prisons. I reject the hon. Gentleman's remarks about the advice and information that we receive from a highly competent prison management. Of course, he is right about slopping out. That sort of thing is a scandal and has its roots in Victorian times. The arrangements made by the Victorians were perfectly acceptable by the standards of that day, but they are not acceptable now. It takes a long time and a lot of money to put that right, but he will know that we are building 16 new prisons and proposing to refurbish 100 more. A large part of that work will deal with sanitation. We are getting on with the work and the prison officers are well aware of that.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): Many people will be surprised to find that it is possible for prison officers lawfully to engage in industrial action or to go on strike. Can my right hon. Friend think of anything more vital to the internal security of the country than the prison service? Should we not consider instituting a no-strike agreement in any settlement of this dispute that may be obtained?

Mr. Hurd: I have a lot of sympathy for my hon. Friend's view. He is not the only person to whom this thought will have occurred. We need to give consideration to the matter.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Any enforcement on prison officers of a no-strike agreement would be deeply resented and would remove from them one of the freedoms to which they are entitled. Does the right hon. Gentleman not realise that they have an extremely rough job that is greatly aggravated by wicked overcrowding? If he does recognise that, will he answer two questions? First, will he tell the House something about the circular that will go out to the courts tomorrow, and not leave it to the press to find out about it so that the House cannot question it? Does the circular include provisions for alternatives to imprisonment for people sent to prison for debt? Secondly, has he plans to deal with overcrowding in Leicester prison, which was built for 200 prisoners and is holding 400? It is staffed by people trying to do a good job in the most difficult and sometimes dangerous circumstances.

Mr. Hurd: I shall certainly write to the hon. and learned Gentleman about the plans for Leicester prison. My hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) talked specifically about a no-strike agreement, and, indeed, the hon. and learned Gentleman used the same phrase. It is not a question of imposing, but of considering an agreement. That is what my hon. Friend suggested, and that is what I said required consideration.

The circular letter will refer to the fact that if industrial action is taken — I hope it will not be taken — the business of the courts will inevitably be disrupted. The letter will seek the understanding of magistrates courts, and will suggest ways of reducing the burden on the police; for example magistrates courts may be able to adjourn some cases or to grant bail immediately in others. We shall draw attention to difficulties and ask the courts to bear them in mind, while making it plain that we are not seeking to interfere in judicial decisions. As I understand it, that follows closely what was done on a previous occasion. The full text of the letter will be put in the Library.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): Is it not important that the POA and its membership recognise that however much sympathy they may have from the public now—the public recognises the difficulties of their job —it will soon be lost if there is a disaster caused by disruption, especially when the public knows that talks are available to them?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend is right. The public has sympathy for the job which prison officers do. I should like to see more publicity for what they do and the problems that they face. That is entirely understandable. The public also knows that prison officers are not badly paid, in recognition of the difficulties of their job, and that we are willing and anxious to consult them about the future of the prison service.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Recognising that the resumption of talks is essential if this grave position is not to deteriorate still further, will the Home Secretary say what his present conditions are for the resumption of talks? Is he waiting for the NEC of the POA to extend the effectiveness of its call for the suspension of industrial action, or is he looking to the NEC to take a different line?

Mr. Hurd: I want the NEC to call off the industrial action. In that way we can get on with the real job of discussing real matters.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): Does not the Home Secretary's circular come to the nub of the problem? If, as the Home Secretary says, the circular will explain to the courts the problems of overcrowding in the event of a strike by prison officers, and will recommend a number of options to be exercised by the courts and the police in the event of a strike, why on earth cannot those same options be operated when there is no strike and no industrial action? Could they not go a long way towards preventing the position that the Home Secretary has brought the prison service to?

Mr. Hurd: Obviously they can. The hon. Gentleman is right. The granting of bail and the timing of cases are at the discretion of the courts. The hon. Gentleman will know that recently I have several times gone out of my way to urge the courts to consider tough and practical alternatives to custody for relatively minor offences. Indeed, I have to some extent stuck out my neck on that point. It is also right in these circumstances, where we may be under a serious threat of industrial action, that in striking the balance in each case, the courts should have regard to the position. That is the purpose of the circular.

Mr. John Ryman (Blyth Valley): May I draw two specific points to the Home Secretary's attention? The first relates to prison officers' pay. Is not the crux of the problem that the basic rates of pay are so bad that officers are forced to engage in what are sometimes considered to be excessive overtime duties, such as accompanying prisoners to court, because without overtime their wages are unreasonably low? Is not the answer to raise the basic pay so that officers are not forced to rely on overtime? One may disagree as to whether they are working excessive overtime, but that is the motive behind it.

Secondly, does not the Home Secretary's circular, undoubtedly couched in moderate and temperate language, interfere with the judicial process? The judiciary is well aware of its powers of sentencing other than a sentence of immediate imprisonment. Surely it is not for the Home Secretary but for the Lord Chancellor to guide the courts on sentencing policy?

Mr. Hurd: I would not dream of issuing even a modest circular of this sort without the approval of my right hon. and noble Friend the Lord Chancellor. It specifically does not seek to interfere in judicial decisions. The hon.

Gentleman is entitled to his view about what decent rates of pay are, and there is obviously room for argument and negotiation on that. It is an irony that negotiations precisely on that point were about to begin between the POA and the Treasury, which has responsibility for such negotiations. Obviously, such negotiations cannot take place while industrial action is under way or threatened.

Political Parties (Income and Expenditure)

4.35 pm

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide for a limit on the amount of money which may be spent by or on behalf of a political party during the period of a general election campaign; to require companies to establish a political fund from which all political donations shall be made; to provide for a ballot of shareholders and employees before a political fund is established; and to ensure an entitlement for each shareholder to an additional dividend from the company in lieu of any donations to which such shareholder has objected.

For more than 70 years it has not been possible for unions to donate money for political purposes without balloting their membership about whether a political fund should be established. There was never any controversy about that, and unions never complained that a political fund was required by law. However, the Government were not satisfied with the position, so legislation was introduced to require unions to ballot their members every 10 years if they wish to retain a political fund. The first such ballot had to take place by the end of March this year.

The legislation was, understandably, clearly seen as a rather crude and clumsy attempt by the Conservative party to undermine financial support for its main opponents. In the event, every union with a political fund secured a massive majority for a "Yes" vote. Indeed, two unions which did not have political funds won majorities to establish them. Who knows, other such unions may secure such a majority.

If it is right for unions to have to establish a political fund to contribute to a party, why should not the same apply to companies? Why the glaring difference in law? Today, I am seeking leave to introduce a Bill — an extremely modest measure — to ensure that companies must ballot shareholders, and employees with more than 12 months service — that is only fair — on whether a political fund should be established. Under the measure it would be illegal to donate to a political cause without such a fund. In this matter the law should apply to companies and unions alike.

It is also right and proper that in any such arrangement provision should be made for shareholders who do not want to contribute to a political fund to be compensated by some extra shareholding, in the same way as during the past 70 years trade unionists who did not want to donate for political purposes could contract out. I am merely seeking the same provisions for companies as apply to trade unions.

The Economist of 22 June 1985 commented:

"In practice, the directors of a company now arbitrarily decide how much to give to a party—usually the Conservative party or one of its front organisations. Their decision is simply noted in the directors' report, which is usually passed on the nod at the company's annual meeting."

In the same article The Economist said that, unlike the Labour party, the Tories, Liberals and SDP do not publish a full set of financial accounts. As we all know, the truth is that the whole area of Conservative party finance is rather murky. It is understandable that there are some Conservatives, such as Mr. Eric Chalker, who believe and have campaigned that the Conservative party should publish full accounts. I also note that Mr. Chalker is keen on democratic accountability in the Conservative party, and on the chairman being elected.

[Mr. David Winnick]

A recent MORI poll on public attitudes to political donations found that 51 per cent. of those asked felt that companies should not be allowed to make political donations and only 35 per cent. were in favour. In the same poll, 82 per cent. believed that companies making donations should first consult their shareholders. So public opinion on this particular issue is very clear. I see no reason for discrepancy between trade unions and companies which make contributions in the political sphere.

Since this Government took office seven years ago—I do not want to be personal, but I think that this information should come out—64 industrialists have been awarded knighthoods. Of these, 69 per cent. are directors of companies which have given £4·5 million to the Tory party since 1979.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): It is a fiddle.

Mr. Winnick: Of the 11 industrialists who have gone higher, who have been given peerages, six are directors of companies which are among the top 10 financial donors to the Tory cause.

Mr. Tony Banks: Come back, Lloyd George.

Mr. Winnick: These companies give money either directly to the Tory party or to front organisations like British United Industrialists. I am not sure on occasion which has more front organisations, the Conservative party or the Communist party.

In turn the Government favour their friends and financial backers, as in the Finance Bill, which is to be debated today, and in previous Budgets. There is a clear need for reform as quickly as possible.

The next reform that I seek in this very modest measure is to ensure a limit on expenditure by political parties during a general election campaign. We all know that there is a limit on expenditure on behalf of parliamentary candidates. There is no controversy about that. It is right and proper that no very rich candidate is able to secure election by buying votes. If it is correct for there to be quite a tight limit on expenditure by candidates, why should there not be a limit nationally for political parties? Why should a political party be able to spend as much as it likes? Here again there is a clear discrepancy between the national and local scene. In the last election the Tories had some £15 million to £20 million to spend. It may well be that they decided not to spend the lot, but they could have done so, and they could have spent much more. My party had as its maximum some £2·5 million. So we need to ensure that this reform is effected.

If I am asked what should be the ceiling on political party spending during a general election campaign, being a generous-minded sort of person I would say that, at present-day prices, it should be around £5 million. This amount could always be updated just as the amount of money that can be spent on behalf of a candidate is periodically updated to take account of inflation.

I do not know whether my Bill is to be opposed. If there are Conservative Members who oppose in any way what I have put forward, I hope that they will have the guts to oppose it today. That is far better than to get the Whips to oppose me and to shout "Object" one Friday afternoon.

If the Conservative party believes that my proposal is wrong, why does it not oppose me and vote against it today? If I am to be defeated in a Tory-dominated House of Commons, so be it, but if I am to be given leave, it is only right that the Cabinet should find time for me to process my Bill. I see no reason why, at the Cabinet meeting, say, on Thursday, this item should not be top of the agenda, or why the chairman of the Conservative party and perhaps the Leader of the House should not ensure that, having been informed that this Bill has been passed without opposition, I have sufficient Government time to make progress and to ensure that my proposals become law before the next general election.

That is only right and fair, so I shall assume that if there is no opposition today the Cabinet will decide along the lines that I have suggested.

Question put and agreed to.

Mr. David Winnick: It is clearly the unanimous wish of the House of Commons to support the Bill, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and that only strengthens what I have said about being given Government time to progress the Bill.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. David Winnick, Mr. Tony Banks, Mr. Dennis Canavan, Mr. Terry Davis, Mr. Derek Fatchett, Mr. James Lamond, Mr. Austin Mitchell, Mr. Allan Rogers, Mr. Brian Sedgemore and Mr. Robert Sheldon.

POLITICAL PARTIES (INCOME AND EXPENDITURE)

Mr. David Winnick accordingly presented a Bill to provide for a limit on the amount of money which may be spent by or on behalf of a political party during the period of a general election campaign; to require companies to establish a political fund from which all political donations shall be made; to provide for a ballot of shareholders and employees before a political fund is established; and to ensure an entitlement for each shareholder to an additional divident from the company in lieu of any donations to which such shareholder has objected; And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 6 June and to be printed. [Bill 147.]

Orders of the Day

Finance Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

[Relevant document: Fourth Report of the Treasury and Civil Service Committee, House of Commons Paper No. 313 of Session 1985-86.]

4.45 pm

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John MacGregor): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Finance Bill embodies the legislative implications of my right hon. Friend's Budget six weeks ago. That Budget was set in the context of an unprecedented drop in the oil price, which meant the prospective loss of half our oil tax revenues from the North sea. But the underlying strength of the United Kingdom economy, and particularly the healthy growth of profits, mean that non-oil tax revenues are buoyant. So my right hon. Friend was still able, within the context of a prudent and cautious Budget, to propose a further net reduction in the burden of taxation of almost £1 billion, while at the same time announcing a modest reduction in the planned public sector borrowing requirement for 1986-87 to £7 billion.

Against the background of the fall in oil revenue, the imaginative proposals in this very positive Budget have come as a pleasant surprise to many who had perhaps underestimated the underlying strength of the economy and overestimated the degree to which, so it was thought, we remained an oil-based economy. Both perceptions have now changed, not least internationally.

The Budget has also received an encouraging initial response which has been maintained ever since. It was welcomed by representatives of business, large and small. To quote a survey of business opinion by Binder Hamlyn:

"Businessmen are by and large happy with Nigel Lawson's Budget last week. The result is seen as good for their companies, with positive effect on macro-economic indicators, too."

The moves to spread share ownership further were welcomed by the stock exchange and the Wider Share Ownership Council; the moves on charities were given a unanimous welcome by all those involved in charitable work and the arts. The Secretary-General of the Arts Council saw the move as "an important and much-needed supplement to basic government funding."

The Association for Business Sponsorship of the Arts was reported as seeing a direct benefit of £7 million a year —with the potential to go much higher. The president of the Union of Independent Companies described the scrapping of capital transfer tax on lifetime gifts as "the most significant shot in the arm for the unquoted independent company sector for 50 years".

The fact that the Chancellor did not need to increase duties on drink raised the spirits of the Scotch Whisky Association and the brewers.

But the positive reaction was not confined to those with a direct interest in the Budget. The prudent yet imaginative course that the Chancellor was able to steer has meant that interest rates have fallen—base rates have come down 2 per cent. since Budget day. That, in turn, has allowed major building societies and banks to lower their interest rates, by 1·75 to 2 per cent., with an extra reduction of 0·5 per cent. for many of those with endowment mortgages. This will be of direct help to the eight million home owners with a mortgage loan. That, in turn, has contributed to the prospect of a rapid fall in inflation. Even before the mortgage reductions, inflation had fallen from 5·1 per cent. in February to 4·2 per cent. in March.

So the prospect now is for low inflation combined with sustained growth. That was acknowledged by the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee in its report on the Budget, which was published with its usual impressive speed last Friday. Today is not the time to discuss the Committee's report in detail, as it makes no comment on the tax changes in the Budget, which is what today's debate is about, but concentrates on the conduct of monetary policy, which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor discussed comprehensively in a speech to the Lombard Association on 16 April. The Government will respond to the Committee's recommendations in due course.

In this year's Bill, the most important change, in terms of its impact on the majority of taxpayers, is the reduction in the basic rate of income tax to 29 per cent. in clause 15.

The Government's objective has been, and remains, to reduce the burden of income tax for people at all levels of income. In 1979 my right hon. and learned Friend the then Chancellor cut the basic rate from 33 per cent. to 30 per cent., helping the vast majority of taxpayers, and reduced the higher rates to a much more realistic level, improving incentives for those in the higher income brackets. I note that the Labour party has already declared its intention of restoring — indeed, even worsening — the position of those people. To raise the £3·6 billion of the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) from this group would mean not only increasing the severity of capital taxation and reintroducing investment income surcharge at the indexed equivalent of their 1978-79 levels, but imposing a 70 per cent. tax rate on all taxable incomes above £18,600 — hardly the way to retain incentives in the economy and encourage enterprise and risk-taking. I firmly predict that if the Labour party ever returned to power, that commitment, like so many of its others, would be a job destroyer.

Up to 1985-86 there was no further change in the basic rate, while the main personal allowances were progressively increased in real terms by a fifth over their 1978-79 levels, taking 1·4 million people out of the income tax net altogether compared with an indexed 1978-79 tax regime.

This year, as my right hon. Friend explained in his Budget, as I did during the course of the Budget debates, we decided that it was right to concentrate tax cuts on the 95 per cent. of all taxpayers for whom the basic rate of tax is their marginal rate, both to reduce their tax burden and to improve their incentives. It was for that reason, against the background of the substantial real increase in allowances under the Government, that my right hon. Friend this year announced a cut of 1p in the basic rate. That cut also improves incentives for unincorporated businesses, 90 per cent. of which pay tax only at the basic rate, and we have mirrored it with a reduction to 29 per cent. in the small business corporation tax rate.

The reduction of 1 per cent., which is all that could be prudently afforded this year, is in itself relatively modest. But, as my right hon. Friend explained, that 1 per cent.

reduction is a further step towards achieving our long term objective of reducing the basic rate to no more than 25 per cent.

I have already dwelt at some length during the Budget debate itself on the case for this cut in basic rate this year as against concentrating resources entirely on thresholds, so I shall not dwell on those arguments again today. But let me add one further point. The case for reducing the basic rate this year is reinforced when one looks at our international competitors. The United Kingdom's income tax thresholds, which, as I have said, we have increased substantially in real terms since 1979, are around the middle of the range compared with other major developed countries. Indeed, as a proportion of average earnings, our thresholds are significantly higher than those in the United States, Canada and West Germany. However, they are still below the levels of certain other countries, notably France.

It is on the starting rate of tax that we are really out of line. In the United States and Japan the starting rate is 15 per cent., or less. In France, West Germany and Italy the percentage rates are no higher than the mid-20s. Our starting rate of 29 per cent. is still the highest of the seven major industrial countries, and that is a further reason for acting on the basic rate this year.

But the Government remain committed also, to raising the level at which people start to pay tax. The Green Paper on personal tax reform shows how we could increase thresholds in a way which is more cost-effective and recognises the changes in a family's needs over its life cycle.

This year, not only have we reduced the basic rate, but the main personal allowances will still be indexed under the provisions of section 24 of the Finance Act 1980, so there is no need for this to be provided for in this year's Bill. As the House knows, the higher rate thresholds are all increased by £1,000—less than the amount needed to index fully the thresholds for the 45 per cent. and above higher rates. The effect is to reduce the gains from the basic rate cut for those on higher incomes, so that the 60 per cent. taxpayer, for instance, gets broadly the same as under statutory indexation without a basic rate cut.

The overall effect of the income tax changes this year is not at all inconsiderable. The cumulative effect of successive Conservative Government Budgets is very considerable indeed. Income tax liabilities in 1986-87 will be about £8 billion lower than if the rates and allowances which we inherited from the Labour Government in 1979, indexed to 1986-87 levels, were in force. That is the true mark of the difference between us so far. As for this year's changes, one has to take into account not the tax changes alone, but the beneficial effects which have flowed from the interest rate changes since the Budget itself and which a prudent Budget helped to encourage.

For a married man on average earnings, with a typical outstanding mortgage of £15,000, the Budget income tax changes, combined with a 1·75 per cent. cut in mortgage rates since the Budget, can mean a total gain of £5·80 a week. That is a significant figure, and I repeat the message that I gave in the Budget debate: that employers and employees should take heed of this boost to real take-home pay—a boost which does not damage the competitiveness of British goods—and take it very much into account in their pay negotiations.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): Did the Treasury take that into account when it recently made an offer of 6 per cent., which I would have thought is rather high in view of the estimated level of inflation?

Mr. MacGregor: That was obviously one of the factors that was taken into account, but I remind my hon. Friend that the negotiations that he is talking about in relation to Civil Service pay relate to the pay year for which most settlements have already been decided. Therefore, it is significantly below the settlement for the same year for the local authority manual workers, the full amount that the teachers are getting in that pay year and the private sector generally. I am talking here particularly about the pay settlements that are to come.

A number of other major points arise from the Bill which I should briefly draw to the attention of the House, and I deal just with clauses 2 and 3. The House will recall that, despite the dramatic fall in oil prices and the consequent loss of tax revenue, my right hon. Friend introduced a Budget which was tax-neutral for the motorist, to the surprise and delight of everyone but the Opposition. The increase in road fuel duties over revalorisation was, of course, offset by the standstill on vehicle excise duty for cars and most other vehicles, so the burden of duty on the motorist was not increased in real terms.

When announcing that move, my right hon. Friend said that there was no need for the pump price of petrol to go up at all. The Opposition no doubt felt that they had to try to get some political mileage out of the motorists' package, so they attempted to pour heavy scorn on my right hon. Friend's judgment on that point. The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook said:

"I can't understand why Mr. Lawson said he believed they wouldn't pass it on, they are a monopoly, they rig their prices. The idea that they might say Mr. Lawson would like us not to pass the price on so we won't is frankly ludicrous."

In a television programme in which I took part the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) said that my right hon. Friend was "silly and foolish to imagine that they"—

the oil companies—

"wouldn't add this tax to the price to the consumer."

The Opposition, led by the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock), demanded the immediate imposition of a windfall tax on oil company profits to force them to make the move.

Once again, competition, rather than Government interference, has had its effect and proved my right hon. Friend to be totally correct. His judgment, as against that of the Opposition, has been wholly vindicated. There is a marked variation in prices, because competition is working, and in some garages prices are now below 160p a gallon.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): In some areas.

Mr. MacGregor: But what is clear is that petrol prices have not only absorbed the increase in road fuel duties; they have actually come down since the Budget.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Does the Minister accept that in many parts of the country there has been very little movement in petrol prices? It was to those parts of the country that we were addressing ourselves. What is he going to do about those areas? Does he intend to do nothing about them?

Mr. MacGregor: I believe that it was across the country as a whole to which the Opposition were addressing themselves when they talked about petrol prices. In most parts of the country petrol prices, as the AA confirms, are now well below the levels at which they were during the Budget. What is more, within individual parts there is wide variation. Therefore, taking the generality, what I say is right and my right hon. Friend has been proved to be correct.

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): Will the Chief Secretary tell us whether he thinks the reduction in petrol prices reflects the reduction in oil prices before and since the Budget? Does he not understand that had there not been the imposition of this tax, there would have been a further movement downwards to reflect the reduction in oil prices?

Mr. MacGregor: That is extraordinarily different from what the right hon. Gentleman was saying at the time of the Budget, so he has admitted that my right hon. Friend's judgment was right. In tax terms there has been no real increase for the motorist at all as a result of the Budget. Therefore, the drop in petrol prices—which is, of course, because of the fall in oil prices before and after the Budget—has been properly reflected. What the right hon. Gentleman was trying to get over was that somehow or other petrol prices would go up in real terms as a result of the Budget changes. That has been proved to be totally wrong.

I wish next to draw the House's attention to clauses 26 to 30 of the Bill, which contain the provisions for my right hon. Friend's proposals to extend the scope for charitable giving. Our aim is to stimulate giving by both companies and individuals. Non-close companies will now be able to gain tax relief for single gifts to charities up to a limit of 3 per cent. of ordinary dividend payments, and individuals will be able to take advantage of the abolition of the higher rate limit on convenanted donations and the new payroll giving scheme which will operate from next April.

These provisions have been warmly received by charities. For instance, the Institute of Charity Fund-Raising Mangers has said:

"This is the most exciting and imaginative Budget for charities there has ever been."

The Charities Aid Foundation described them as "more radical and far-reaching than we could have hoped for."

I am sure that the House will share those sentiments.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin (Wanstead and Woodford): Can my right hon. Friend offer some comfort that the Government will look at the provisions of clause 29, which makes a perfectly reasonable effort to curb abuse of the private foundations? There is a widespread view that the numbers written into the clause have gone too far and may damage some very important charitable bodies.

Mr. MacGregor: I know that my right hon. Friend shares our intent in the proposals in clause 29, to which he drew attention. These are aimed at misuse of the tax reliefs for charities, which it was felt were justified anyway, but especially now, I think, in the light of the substantial extensions of tax relief. They are not intended to apply to the ordinary charities that do not misuse them. They apply only to a restricted class of private indirect charities, not to charities which spend at least 90 per cent. of receipts on genuine charitable activities. I am aware of the concern of genuine charities, and I know that representations are being made. I believe that we shall have a full discussion of these points in Committee. I take note of my right hon. Friend's point.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): I notice that my right hon. Friend did not refer to clause 31. I hope that he will take credit for that clause, which will make an important contribution to curbing some of the abuses that we are all anxious to curb.

Mr. MacGregor: I did not refer to it because I do not think that I can refer to all the clauses in what turns out to be, yet again, a rather large Finance Bill. However, I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his point, and I am glad that he has made it.

I turn briefly, to corporation tax. There are no major changes to business tax this year, which sees the completion of the reforms begun in 1984. These reforms were aimed to reduce the distortions imposed by the tax system — notably the bias in favour of capital and against jobs — to improve efficiency and encourage enterprise. We see no case for changing this structure, and believe business welcomes the stability and certainty which our approach provides. The United Kingdom's corporation tax rate is now, at 35 per cent., the lowest of any major industrial country, and the reduction in the basic rate of income tax has enabled us to reduce also the small company's rate of corporation tax to 29 per cent. When one bears in mind that at the time this Government took over from the previous Labour Government the small business rate was 42 per cent., one sees the significant reduction in the small business corporation tax to 29 per cent.

Chapter II of part II of the Bill does, however, include two detailed business tax measures—first, to bring the mines and oil wells allowances regime broadly into line with the new structure of capital allowances. Secondly, the Bill would allow a full measure of depreciation for tax purposes for short-life agricultural building and works by providing the option of making balancing adjustments on their disposal.

I deal next with the provisions in the Bill on stamp duty, two of which I wish to refer to particularly. As the House will recognise, it is not possible to consult fully ahead of the Budget on tax changes. First, the new tax proposed in the Budget on the creation of certificates representing the deposit of shares, such as American depositary receipts, or ADRs, has led to a good deal of misunderstanding of the Government's intentions. Let me correct that misunderstanding.

We do not want to discourage American investment in British shares. We recognise, as many of the British companies concerned have told us, that it can have advantages for them. It can make it easier for them to raise money and to expand sales in the United States. We have had extensive consultations with the companies and we understand their views about that.

Our concern is only to protect the tax revenue. Stamp duty on shares, even at the new 0·5 per cent. rate, should bring in £600 million during the current year, and we cannot allow that large sum to be put at risk by investors turning to the purchase of depositary certificates, which trade free of stamp, instead of the underlying shares. There is the possibility, especially after the big bang, of more use of ADRs by British investors, although I recognise that ADRs have some disadvantages for them.

The solution we have sought is to tax these depositary certificates —and similar arrangements—at a rate which will, broadly speaking, eliminate the incentive to use them for tax avoidance. This means that the tax on the creation of the certificate must broadly recompense for the loss of stamp duty on subsequent sales and purchases. From the point of view of the investor, he will be getting a transferable "season ticket." He pays more now, but subsequent transfers are free of duty.

We have re-examined the rate of the tax against this criterion and in the light of the representations we have received. We have decided that the revenue should be sufficiently safeguarded if the tax on conversion of shares into ADR and similar forms were put at 1·5 per cent.—three times what the duty on registered shares will be after the big bang. This is the multiple that has applied for some years to issues of shares into bearer form, and ADRs themselves are effectively bearer certificates. The tax on all bearer shares from the big bang will also therefore be set at the level—1·5 per cent.

The rate of 1·5 per cent. on conversion of shares into ADRs will apply from 19 March. This rate, we judge should be sufficient to safeguard the revenue without adding unreasonably to the financing cost of United Kingdom companies overseas. It compares with the rate of 1 per cent. that applied before the Budget. I must, however, give due notice that if after big bang it looks as if ADRs are being used as a means of avoiding stamp duty by United Kingdom residents, we would have to reconsider the rate of tax.

I now turn to loan stocks. The Budget proposed that most of these should bear stamp duty at the rate of 0·5 per cent.

Since the Budget there has been a sharp fall in long-term interest rates, and there are signs that the sterling corporate bond market is reviving.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-Under-Lyne): Does the right hon. Gentleman know how much the Revenue will lose as a result of ADRs moving from 5 per cent. to 1·5 per cent.?

Mr. MacGregor: One has obviously to make estimates, but I shall come to that in a moment, if I may.

There is also some evidence that the withdrawal of exemption from stamp duty is diverting some borrowers in issuing bearer and Euro-sterling stock.

In the light of this, we have decided that it would be right to restore exemption for those categories of loan stock that were previously exempt. Registered convertibles will, however, continue to be taxed like equities, as they were before the Budget. We shall make proposals accordingly in Committee. If they are agreed, the exemption for ordinary loan stock would be restored one month later.

Details of these changes will be given in a parliamentary written answer and Inland Revenue press release later today. The estimated yield from stamp duty, as forecast at the time of the Budget, remains unchanged. Any reduction in revenue arising from the changes that I have just announced should be offset by the higher yield we now expect from the application of stamp duty to takeovers.

The adjustments that I have just announced to our proposals for stamp duty will help maintain the range of options available to companies in financing investment. They will also help maintain the depth and breadth of London's financial markets, and London's role as a major financial centre. I am glad also to be able to announce now a proposal that, though not part of the Finance Bill, should help further in both respects.

We have decided to remove the constraint imposed by the Banking Act which prevents companies from financing themselves by issuing sterling commercial paper—that is, by issuing sterling debt securities of less than one year maturity. The establishment of a sterling commercial paper market should provide a useful alternative for companies to bank borrowing and also extend the range of sterling markets available in London to investors. Further details are being provided in a written reply published in today's Official Report.

I should mention two further measures that the Government will have to introduce at a later stage. The first will set out provisions to withhold tax at source from payments made to non-resident entertainers and sportsmen, announced in the Budget. The second will give effect to the proposals announced by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary in written answers, on 26 February at columns 564-5 and on 27 March at column 549, to make changes to the structure of the ITV levy.

I move on now to the enterprise and small business package in the Budget. Some of the measures — for example, in relation to the loan guarantee scheme—do not require legislative action in the Finance Bill itself, but the business expansion scheme does. The scheme has proved a great success, attracting more than £100 million a year from subscribers.

The Peat Marwick report, published on Budget day, found that, on the basis of a survey of 1983-84 investments, 70 per cent. of the money invested would not have been raised by companies in the form of equity and almost half would not have been raised at all. Two thirds of the total BES finance raised in that year was invested in companies less than five years old — those which typically have greatest difficulty in raising finance through other methods. The BES has been particularly helpful to firms wanting to raise relatively small amounts of capital. More than half of the companies in the survey raised no more than £50,000.

That survey, and much anecdotal evidence of the benefits of BES since, have justified the introduction of the scheme and shown that, broadly speaking, it is achieving its objectives. Clause 38 provides for the indefinite extension of the scheme and for improvements to ensure that capital is not diverted to low-risk investment in companies with high asset backing—in other words, that it is targeted on the original objectives. This scheme is enhanced with the provision of capital gains tax exemption for the first sale of new BES shares.

These proposals have also been widely welcomed by the CBI, by the Union of Independent Companies and by other representative bodies. I was glad to see that the right hon. Member for Islwyn, in response to the Budget, was moved to say:

"we sincerely welcome some aspects of the Budget. I think, for example, of the provisions relating to the business expansion scheme both in its continuation and its exclusions, which appear to be sensible and helpful." — [Official Report, 18 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 185.]

I am delighted that he has become converted to the encouragement of risk-taking and of venture capital investment through the tax system.

We have made a further important move to boost enterprise. We have had repeated representations from those who work hard to build up family businesses and family farms, and then, as they expand, face a potentially crippling capital transfer tax charge. That is no way to encourage enterprise and initiative. That is the main reason why we propose to abolish CTT on lifetime gifts to individuals. Part V sets out our proposals, which include detailed provisions to protect the continued charge on transfers on death. It is significant that 74 per cent. of the business men surveyed by Binder Hamlyn immediately after the Budget felt that the change would help here.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: They were not going to say no. Grow up, man.

Mr. MacGregor: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman has any conception of what it is to build up a small business, to expand, and then find, all over the place——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I have built up a small business.

Mr. MacGregor: In that case, the hon. Gentleman has no conception of what most others in the business world say about the impact of capital transfer tax. It is significant that some of the fastest expanding small businesses regarded this as one of the most significant moves that could be taken in the Budget. It is also significant for family farms. We shall be introducing additional inheritance tax provisions at a later date, first, to ensure that regular premium payments made after Budget day under an insurance policy taken out before then are taken out of the gifts with reservation regime, and, secondly, to deal with the consequences for the heritage of the shift to inheritance tax.

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): Why does there appear to be some retrospective effect in this year's Budget? Any individual who effected a tax mitigation scheme on the morning of or up to 3.30 pm on Budget day is being caught in a retrospective way and in a fashion that I cannot recall having been introduced in a Budget before.

Mr. MacGregor: I know the point that my hon. Friend is making, but I am sure that he will recognise that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor must have a point at which tax changes are introduced, and they are normally when the Budget is introduced.

Mr. McCrindle: I apologise for pressing the point further. That would be understandable, but my hon. Friend will recall that the Budget was introduced at 3.30 pm on 18 March. I am referring to legitimate arrangements, effected before that time on that day, which are being eliminated. That introduces an element of retrospective legislation.

Mr. MacGregor: There is a difference between such changes in the law and when the Chancellor announces genuine retrospective legislation. This matter can be looked at when we come to the detailed points in Committee.

The final strand in our enterprise package is to encourage people to put their money into business. We have already made exceptional progress with our target of broadening share ownership. New figures from a poll carried out by National Opinion Polls reveal that the proportion of individual shareholders in the population has doubled since 1979, from 7 per cent. to roughly 14 per cent. With all the statistical qualifications that anyone might wish to make, there is no doubt that that shows that this is a solid and most encouraging advance. Interestingly, over half of all shareholders are now from socio-economic groups C, D and E. The revolution in attitudes towards individual investment has begun.

We are determined to build on this success. A key element will be the new personal equity plan. As the House knows, the Bill provides the outline of the scheme. Our intention is to allow tax-free build-up of investments of up to £200 a month in shares over a minimum period. The details will be set out in regulations, after consultation with interested parties.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): My hon. Friend talked about research into the socio-economic groups that has been done through National Opinion Polls. Does he agree that some people in those groups who may not know much about investment would be better protected by being allowed to invest in investment trust shares, thereby gaining a wider spread? Will investment trusts be included under the Bill's proposals?

Mr. MacGregor: Again, this is a matter on which we have been receiving representations and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will take them into account in the consultations. The consultations will enable us to tailor the scheme to meet the requirements of potential investors and plan managers, and thus ensure that it can be taken up as widely as possible. That is our intention. This scheme will give the private investor a substantial incentive to take a direct stake in British business, and it will also help to counterbalance the considerable fiscal advantages already enjoyed by institutional investors.

Finally, there is one area of remaining concern in the economy which, although not in the Bill, the House might expect me to mention—employment. Last Thursday, in the House, my right hon. Friend the Lord Privy Seal suggested that it could appropriately be discussed today. Of course, the latest unemployment figures were disappointing. However, perhaps that obscured the encouraging announcement of a fact that emerged at the same time of the success of the economy in creating net new jobs—almost 1 million since June 1983. Continued employment growth can be expected as output grows this year and next, and it will be faster still if pay increases more in line with productivity.

The Budget has supplemented what was already an ambitious and wide-ranging Government programme of specfic employment measures. By 1988-89 we shall be spending nearly £3 billion on employment measures, plus the youth training scheme. I shall not discuss them in detail today as we did that in the Budget debate. However, I must repeat that those are substantial sums.

We are often urged to spend more by Opposition Members and recently by the Select Committee on Employment, which put forward proposals aimed, so it claimed, at creating 750,000 extra jobs. The Government have considered the proposals in that report. On the Committee's own assumption it would be necessary to look for 1·25 million extra jobs to support the 750,000 the scheme was designed to create. That could be done only at substantial extra cost. The Department of Employment estimated that the net cost would be £4 billion on top of what we are already spending.

The report was short on prescriptions on how to finance that. If it were financed by reducing expenditure elsewhere, the net effect on jobs would be much smaller. Indeed, it could be negative because it would be replacing more cost-effective employment measures. If it were financed by higher taxation, incentives would be damaged and that would lead to job losses. If it were financed by higher borrowing, the likely result would be higher inflation and interest rates and higher costs to industry. So the job creation programme on that scale would end up destroying jobs in the private sector. Temporary jobs would be bought at the expense of permanent jobs in the rest of the economy.

Those who wish to see a major expansion of employment measures also ignore the practical constraints. It is not clear that there is scope for a major expansion of places on the community programme or similar schemes. There are limits to the number of cost-effective schemes that can be developed. There are limits to the extent which health and social services could absorb unskilled labour. There are limits on the number of sponsors we could attract.

In contrast to the Select Committee, the Government's aim is based on providing direct practical help to the long-term unemployed who need it most. The restart programme will mean that everyone unemployed for a year or more will be contacted and offered an interview at a local jobcentre. They will then be offered a range of ways towards finding work.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I know that conventionally we have a wide-ranging debate on Second Reading, but the Minister is going very wide of the matter before the House. He has invited the House to debate employment measures rather than the Finance Bill.

Mr. MacGregor: I felt it necessary to make a brief reference to those matters because the Lord Privy Seal suggested that they might be raised in the debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Chair will be responsible for the scope of the debate within the rules of the House.

Mr. MacGregor: I understand, Mr. Deputy Speaker, so I shall move straight back to the position on the economy as a whole.

These specific measures, which we have introduced in the Budget, although I agree not in the Finance Bill, should be seen against the background of the Government's overall economic policy. That strategy is designed to encourage enterprise and efficiency. Low inflation and lower taxes are vital to secure the growth that will produce more jobs. That strategy has produced nearly 1 million new jobs over the past three years. I accept that that is not enough to absorb fully the major increase in people coming on to the labour market, but it is a better record than the rest of our European partners combined.

That strategy would be severely undermined if we were to depart from implementing realistic, practical and cost-effective employment measures. A wholesale boost, at substantial additional public expenditure cost, would create a few temporary jobs, but at the price of putting brakes on economic growth and the accelerator on inflation. That is why I believe that the policies being implemented in the Bill are right.

Mr. Peter Rees (Dover): There is one area of the economy to which my right hon. Friend has not directed his attention, although there are few measures in the Financial Bill, and that is the production of oil in the North sea. I readily declare an interest as the director of an oil company. My right hon. Friend and the House will be aware that as the price of oil climbed, so the petroleum revenue tax was restructured in various degrees to ensure a proper take for the Government. As the price of oil has declined sharply to the point that it may discourage exploration and development in the North sea, would my right hon. Friend perhaps concede that there might be a case for a further and fresh look at the structure of PRT, especially advance PRT?

Mr. MacGregor: I know that my right hon. and learned Friend takes the closest possible interest in these and all other tax matters. As he knows, the present oil taxation system is durable and flexible and is highly sensitive to movements in oil prices. The Government are not convinced that any change is needed. However, we have made it clear that we shall continue to watch the situation closely and keep in contact with the industry.

I was concluding by saying that, given the financial constraints which limited my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's room for manoeuvre this year, the Finance Bill contains an impressive range of measures of tax relief and tax reform, which will reduce the burden of tax within a sound overall economic strategy. Those measures have been well received by business, those involved in fund raising and those who want to see more people own shares. The fall in interest rates since the Budget has demonstrated the markets' belief and confidence in the course the Chancellor has charted in the year ahead. I commend the Bill to the House.

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): On Budget day my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition said that the Budget of 1986 would be remembered for two characteristics. The first was its irrelevance to the real problem facing this country, and the second was its divisiveness—the help it provided for the rich and its neglect of the least well off. Those two characteristics are reinforced and reproduced in the Finance Bill.

The Chancellor prudently pretends that items such as the niggardly increase in pensions and child benefit are none of his business. He deals with the other part of my right hon. Friend's criticisms by saying that the way in which the British economy has survived the fall in oil prices is a testimony to the fact that his management of the economy has been wise and prudent. He used the word "unscathed" from the fall in oil prices. He used it in the House on 18 March and to the Economic Club of New York on 11 April.

The Chief Secretary, who a moment ago led the cheers, was notably less ambitious, less buoyant and less bullish about the claims he made over the way in which we have survived the reduction in the price of oil. That is not surprising, because since the Chancellor made his grandiloquent claims we have had the April balance of payments figures. Those figures are unique in their depressing quality. They show the folly of the Chancellor's boast that we could pass the reduction in oil prices without cost, and the folly of the policy which the Chancellor sought to justify. It is surprising, even allowing for the rules which from time to time constrain the Chief Secretary, that he did not deal with the principal criticism made of the Budget's application to the economy, the omissions which are, therefore, to be seen in the Finance Bill and the fact that nothing the Finance Bill does deals with the central issue of economic decline, which is that we are too dependent on oil and too vulnerable to changes in oil prices.

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): Rubbish.

Mr. Hattersley: The hon. Gentleman must have been elsewhere when the balance of payments figures were produced last week. They denoted the facts of the economy once the oil price is not there to boost and reinforce our neglected, declining and deteriorating manufacturing industry. The Budget and the Finance Bill do very little to deal with those fundamental problems which we tried to draw to the Chancellor's attention six weeks ago. The Chief Secretary takes refuge in the one piece of good news—at which I rejoice and about which I wish to express my pleasure—which is the reduction in the base rate and the fall in mortgage rates which followed.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hattersley: Not yet. I will tell the hon. Gentleman when.

The Chief Secretary told us the good news about the reduction in the base rate. I said during the Budget debate, and I repeat it today, that he obtained a cheer from Conservative Back-Bench Members because they are delighted that an intolerable interest rate has been reduced to an insupportable interest rate. We are still enduring and being burdened by the highest rate of interest in the OECD. The six-month Euro rate is as follows: in Denmark, 4·5 per cent.; in the United States, 6·75 per cent.; in France, 7·5 per cent.; and in the United Kingdom, 10 per cent. Those are the notional figures. If the figures for real interest are compared and calculated, the British interest rate is 2 per cent. higher than the average of our OECD competitors. The fact that there is rejoicing among Conservative Members that the figure should now be only 2 per cent. above the average rate shows how easily they are satisfied. It also shows that the excuses that we have heard for seven years about interest rates have worn thin and disappeared.

Mr. Budgen rose——

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West) rose——

Mr. Hattersley: I shall let the hon. Gentlemen know when I am ready to give way.

Originally, we were told that interest rates would be brought down below those of our competitors because the Government would cut public expenditure. That did not work. We were told that our interest rates were high because of the rates in competitor countries, but now they are higher than those rates. Sooner or later, the Government will get round to the idea that interest rates are too high because of the follies and failures of Government policy, and not least because the Government are keeping up the interest rate so that they can help to maintain sterling at an artificially high rate as an alternative to a monetary policy.

Mr. Budgen: I thought the right hon. Gentleman said that high oil prices were to the advantage of manufacturing industry. Will he explain that passage of his speech?

Mr. Hattersley: I explained that in my Budget speech, but I shall repeat it now. A reduction in oil prices would be to the benefit of an economy in which manufacturing industry was strong and ready to expand. I said that, thanks to the folly of the Government in allowing the collapse of manufacturing industry, we could not take advantage of a reduction in raw material costs which some of our more successful competitors will enjoy. Last week's balance of payments figures underline the wisdom of the Opposition's insistence that to rely on oil revenues as the Government have done is a disaster for Britain.

It is also a disaster for the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for it allows him to pin another medal on his chest. He can add the largest visible balance of payments deficit ever to the highest level of unemployment ever, to the highest real interest rates ever and to the lowest value of sterling ever, which he has contrived to ricochet up to a height which is so great that it penalises our manufacturing industry and cripples our exports. Yet the Chancellor remains incapable of even imagining that he might be wrong. He does not even acknowledge, far less attempt to resolve, the two great crises to which the Finance Bill should have directed the nation's attention. Those are the crises of unemployment and poverty. Instead of facing those issues direct, with each Finance Bill the Chancellor takes refuge in irrelevancies. This year, the chief irrelevancy was built around and hidden behind the slogan "people's capitalism". The diversion was intended to deflect attention from the Government's failures of personal equity plans in clause 37 and schedule 8.

I hope that when the Financial Secretary replies this evening he will have the grace to concede that personal equity plans help the small investor almost not at all. The small investor already benefits from the £6,300 threshold on capital gains tax.

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West) indicated assent.

Mr. Hattersley: I am delighted to receive endorsement from at least one Conservative Member.

The PEP provides little or no incentive for new share ownership. It offers a further tax privilege to existing share owners, many of whom are already very rich and most of whom will convert their existing holdings into PEP. Those two facts typify the Chancellor's record. It is a gimmick intended to obscure the Budget trivialities, and as well as providing a couple of days' headlines, it puts money in the pockets of the better-off.

I hope that the Financial Secretary will have the grace to concede that the Chancellor's schemes have several other built-in disincentives for the small and new shareholder. The investment must be made through authorised PEP managers, who will charge a fee and who have been open in saying—at least the City in general has been saying—that they are not prepared for them, do not welcome them, cannot cope with them and do not want to manage the small investor's resolution. What is more, unit trusts will be excluded. Although PEP will help existing shareholders with a new form of tax exemption, the Chancellor's claim during the Budget debate that it will bring about a dramatic extension of share ownership in Britain is typically and patently the grandiloquent nonsense that we have heard from him from time to time.

Mr. Roger Freeman (Kettering): The right hon. Gentleman criticises personal equity plans. Would he propose a more generous scheme for wider share ownership?

Mr. Hattersley: I was about to comment on exactly that point. To show the hon. Gentleman that he did not prompt me into that assertion, I shall read from my notes. I wish to make it clear that I support genuine extensions of share ownership schemes which enable and encourage employees to acquire stakes in their companies. The schemes that I want would carry voting rights proper to share ownership, and would be available to all company employees; they would not simply be another executive and top management bonus payment. The schemes I want would be made available in practice as well as in theory, because many of them will be financed by the share option schemes about which the hon. Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern) asked the Chief Secretary but obtained no reply. The funding of those schemes would allow real workers to make small and gradual investments. If the hon. Gentleman who asked the question has doubts about our intentions, let me assure him that we shall seek to amend clauses 21 and 25 in Committee to enable such an extension in genuine employee share ownership to be promulgated, propagated and encouraged.

The Committee will also discuss the proposal for tax relief on contributions to charities, which are obtained in clauses 26 to 31. They are in part the result of the Chancellor's desperate search for a sympathetic headline —[HON. MEMBERS: "Come on!"] Those Conservative Members who are moaning probably do not recall the pressure that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition put upon the Prime Minister and the Chancellor to provide some tax relief for the Band Aid initiatives, and their hard-hearted replies to our pleas. Only when a body of public opinion built up saying that the Government should be more helpful to charities did the Government decide that that was the popular thing to do.

I shall make the Opposition's view absolutely clear. We applaud the proposal to help genuine charities, but the description of charities is wholly inappropriate to some of the institutions which presently enjoy that legal status. I would like to help Oxfam and Save the Children Fund, but tax exemptions for Eton and Harrow are especially offensive at a time when public education is being starved of cash. The next Labour Government will certainly maintain the exemptions for charities, but a new definition of charities will be provided which will concentrate the help on those institutions which genuinely deserve it.

We will also reintroduce capital transfer tax. That tax is virtually abolished under clauses 70 to 86 except when it is applied as an inheritance tax. As the Chief Secretary to the Treasury must know, inheritance tax is now voluntary or an additional punishment for sudden death. Anyone can avoid inheritance tax by following two rules. The first is to appoint a competent accountant and the second is not to die unexpectedly.

It is impossible—I was going to say difficult, but impossible is not too strong a word to use—to imagine a more arbitrary way of calculating the incidence of a tax; in practice that tax turns out to be another of the Chancellor's concessions to the rich and, often, the very rich. Already, the first £70,000 of estate duty is exempted from tax liability.

Before I discuss the subject which is clearly central to the Budget and the Bill, and the one on which the Chief Secretary naturally concentrated most of his speech—the subject of income tax—I would like to ask the Chief Secretary a question about a subject which I am astonished that he failed to mention. I wish to ask the Chief Secretary about the pension fund surplus. When the Financial Secretary replies, will he tell us why the Government have chosen 5 per cent. as the level of surplus at which the pension funds must arrange one of the three alternatives which the Government require—a contributions holiday, an increase in benefit, or a refund?

I understand, applaud and support the principle of discouraging excessive surpluses, but the figure of 5 per cent. is clearly arbitrary. It is the view of virtually every authority other than the Government—the Trades Union Congress, the Confederation of British Industry, the Institute of Actuaries and the National Association of Pension Funds—that 5 per cent. is too low and that 10 per cent. is a more likely figure. The Financial Secretary should tell us why the 5 per cent. level was hit upon when, in the view of all the authorities that I have referred to, there are considerable risks to the prospects for pension funds in these uncertain and fluctuating times.

The Chief Secretary said, and the Opposition agree, that the principal features of the Budget were the changes made in direct taxation—the £1 billion resulting from the penny off the standard rate of income tax. Before I offer my opinions on that, I want to remind the House of the pattern of tax changes which has occurred during the lifetime of the Government.

We all know that the gross annual tax bill has increased in real terms by almost £29 billion. The overall figures of increased taxes imposed by the Government, who had been elected twice to cut the tax bill, and the pattern of tax increases and their incidence upon the population was revealed in a parliamentary answer in Hansard on 27 March. The written reply on 27 March contained a calculation of income tax, national insurance contributions and child benefits as they apply to various groups within the population.

The figures show that individuals and families on half or two thirds average earnings now pay a larger proportion of their earnings in income tax than they did in 1979. All those who receive half or two thirds of average earnings are paying more, and in some cases dramatically more, of their income in taxes than they did seven years ago.

I am sure that the Chancellor's silent PPS would cry out, with the expertise that he must have achieved through his occasional calls at the Treasury, that they are paying more because their real earnings have increased. The lucky earners who are earning five or 10 times the national average are paying less because their real earnings have increased. The people earning 10 times the national average are paying 15 per cent. less of their earnings in tax than they paid when the Government were elected in 1979.

That confirms the simple phrase which must be engraved on the Government's heart and which is already understood outside the House, that the increase in taxes imposed by the Government has fallen on the poor and the middle-income groups rather than the rich and has produced the position which the Opposition prophesied. There has been a redistribution of income by taking money from the poor and giving it to the rich.

Mr. Maples: While the right hon. Gentleman is discussing the structure of income tax, and as he told us in a previous debate on these matters that he would plan to raise almost £3·5 billion from the so-called better-off, does he agree that the figure given by the Chief Secretary would involve an average tax rate of 70 per cent. on all income in excess of £18,500? If the right hon. Gentleman does not agree with that, what higher rate tax structure does he think would be necessary?

Mr. Hattersley: I have said time after time that the arbitrary and risible way in which the Chief Secretary deals with these matters, fools no one. The Chief Secretary plucks one tax out of the air. At one moment he decides upon 41 per cent. VAT and then he chooses 80 per cent. for income tax.

There are many ways in which the favoured 5 per cent. of the population have enjoyed tax privileges and concessions under this Government. Some of the taxes removed by the Government, like the unearned income surcharge, must be reimposed. However, the real assault on the privileges of the very rich does not concern their marginal rates but should affect their allowances. Most of the money should be raised from that area. That naturally and inevitably leads me to my next point. I understand why Conservative Members complain about, resent and say that they will resist the increases in taxes for the very rich. I hope that they will also understand——

Mr. Butterfill: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hattersley: I will not give way now.

I hope that Conservative Members will understand that the tax cuts which they have boasted about are not discrete options. The income which the Treasury has forgone as a result of tax cuts for the favoured income groups, could have been used for other purposes. To choose to cut taxes for one group is to choose to increase taxes or reduce benefits for another.

In relation to that equation and balance, I would like to ask the Financial Secretary to the Treasury several questions which I do not mean to be rhetorical and for which I require answers. How can he justify the balance that the Government have struck between their provision of benefits and welfare and their cuts in taxes for the very rich? How can they justify abandoning the unearned income surcharge when the pension is so low that old people die from the cold in winter? How can they justify abandoning the highest tax band when the long-term unemployed who are now so numerous—there are more now than the total of unemployment when the Government came to office—lose full unemployment benefit after a year? How can the Government justify abolishing capital gains tax when child benefit this year has increased by only 10p?

These are all compensatory factors—one cut in one area accommodates a failure to improve welfare and benefits in another. The Financial Secretary and the Government, over the next few years, will have to demonstrate why their priorities lie, as they do, with the rich and why they hardly ever lie with the groups who in a civilised society ought to receive most assistance. The Chancellor and the Government have chosen to do very little about poverty and absolutely nothing about unemployment.

If the Chief Secretary contests that assertion, may I put to him again a question that I asked during the Budget debate but which nobody answered. The Chief Secretary seemed to be about to answer that question today, but in the end he shied away from it. Why was the £1 billion that the Chancellor said that he had at his disposal used to reduce the standard rate of income tax by 1p? The Chief Secretary said, "We did it because we had not done it before." That is an answer from "Alice in Wonderland". "We do it, because we do it," said Tweedledum to Tweedledee. Why did he choose this option when other clearly preferable options were available to him? Why, particularly in the light of the Government's record, was the £1 billion not used directly to tackle unemployment?

I add a note about the Government's employment record, since the Chief Secretary chose rashly to boast about the number of jobs that have been created by this Government. I think he said, "We have created more jobs than the rest of the EEC, put together." That boast is substantiated only by this country having adopted a practice that has not been adopted in the rest of the European Economic Community: the practice of counting part-time jobs as though they were full-time jobs. What is undoubtedly true, according to honest statistics that are genuinely comparable between Britain and the rest of the EEC, is that now 1 million fewer people are employed in Great Britain than were employed in 1979 and that we have lost more jobs than the rest of the European Economic Community put together.

Mr. MacGregor: The right hon. Gentleman asks me a question about a main part of the Budget, the reduction in the basic rate of income tax. I gave several reasons for that reduction in my speech today and also during the Budget debate. If the right hon. Gentleman is so critical, why has he said that he will not oppose the reduction of 1p in income tax?

Mr. Hattersley: I repeat gladly what I said in the Budget debate. The Opposition believe that the economy needs that boost. However, the Chancellor and the Chief Secretary had five possible ways in which to provide that boost. The question that I am asking, and which the Chief Secretary persists in not answering, is why, of the five possible ways, through which I propose to take the House, did he choose the one that helped unemployment and the poor least but helped the rich most?

I propose to remind the Chief Secretary of those five alternative ways. This afternoon he said virtually nothing about unemployment. People would not have believed it had they been warned in advance that during a 40-minute Second Reading speech on the Finance Bill, only two or three minutes would be devoted to unemployment. If the Chief Secretary had wanted by fiscal means, which is what this debate is about, by tax stimulus, which is also what this debate is about, and by methods that are legitimate to a Finance Bill, and therefore would have been within the rules of order, to concentrate upon reducing unemployment, he could have used his £1 billion upon public sector capital investment and maintenance.

That would have been a quick, cheap and certain way to create jobs. It would have minimised the adverse effects on inflation and the balance of payments. It would have helped to meet the desperate need for new and improved houses, renovated hospitals and the replacement of decaying schools. All of that could have been done by using the £1 billion for that purpose, but still we have not received an answer as to why the Chief Secretary made the choice that he did.

If the Government and the Chief Secretary were remotely concerned about the low paid and the least well off, they could have used the £1 billion to increase child benefit and to concentrate help upon those areas where it is most needed. If the Chief Secretary and the Chancellor had found the compulsion to cut income tax to be overwhelming, because they had to do something to attempt to fulfil the promises that they have so flagrantly and blatantly broken since 1979, why did they choose the standard rate of income tax that helps the rich the most and the lowest paid the least? Why did they not introduce a reduced rate band? Why was there not an increase in the threshold?

The Government have attempted to answer none of those questions. Therefore I put it again to the Chief Secretary: of the five ways of spending the £1 billion that were canvassed before the Budget, why did he choose the one that helps the lowest paid the least and the unemployed not at all, but that delights the 1922 Committee?

Last year the Chancellor called his Budget a Budget for jobs. When measured against the Chancellor's criterion, it was a catastrophic failure. Unemployment has risen by 100,000 since the Chancellor gave that title to his Budget. This year we have had a Budget for the Tory party. That, too, will fail in its objective because the Government's unpopularity has increased since the Budget announcements.

The manipulation that was supposed to do so much for flagging morale on the Government Back Benches and for declining status in the opinion polls has failed for two reasons. First, the general public have higher standards than the Government realise. The voters, if not the Tory party, are concerned about the Health Service, the education system, pensions and, above all, the unemployed. They have contempt for a Government who ask the prosperous members of society to forget or to neglect their least well-off neighbours and simply to rejoice in their own 1p in the pound tax cuts.

The general public, if not the Tory party, also realises that we all have a direct vested interest in financing housing—where again there will soon be a shortage of 1 million dwellings—in financing the additional cost of adequate law andd order and in financing an improved road system and rail network.

The British public is a great deal less gullible than the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Cabinet believe. It knows that the Government's tax policy has virtually nothing to do with the needs of the economy, the unemployment crisis, the collapse of manufacturing industry and the increasing number of families who are living below the established poverty line but that it has everything to do with the Government's disarray and the Tory party's disintegration. The Government's economic horizon stretches no further than the next general election. They will lose it, because the British people are a great deal more moral, practical and decent than the Chancellor will ever understand.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. A large number of right hon. and hon. Members are seeking to take part in the debate. Mr. Speaker has asked me to say that he wishes preference to be given to those hon. Members who unsuccessfully sought to take part in the Budget debate. The whole House will appreciate brief speeches from Privy Councillors and other hon. Members.

5.56 pm

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): First, may I raise with you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, a point of order. It arises out of your earlier comments about what is in order in this debate. Will you confirm that it will be in order for us to discuss the contents of the Fourth Report of the Treasury and Civil Service Committee on the Budget that is on the Order Paper for discussion today? It touches upon subjects that go slightly wider than the contents of the Finance Bill, although they are directly relevant to the conext in which the Finance Bill is cast.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair will allow that, but it is important to bear in mind that earlier I chided the Chief Secretary for, as I put it, seeming to invite the House to discuss specific employment matters. That would be stretching a little too much the limits of the debate.

Mr. Howell: I am grateful for your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The House will not wish to be detained for too long by the featherweight comments that we have just heard from the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), which seem to be curiously unrelated to the economic issues, the economic changes and the remarkable successes that are beginning to develop in the economy, especially the apparently virtuous spiral of downward inflation and interest rates and the rising investment and confidence in the British economy.

I agree with my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury that this Budget was ingenious and full of a number of extremely lively and important proposals. I should like to comment on a few of them before turning to some broader points about the Finance Bill.

I welcome enormously the heavy emphasis that has been placed on wider ownership and what has been called popular capitalism. This is a vital thrust and a major part of miniaturising capitalism in line with the fragmentation and miniaturising of the labour market and the industrial structure. I greatly welcome that emphasis. As to the proposal for personal equity plans, this is very interesting, but I believe that more work on this scheme will be needed. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury told us that regulations will be introduced.

The present difficulty is perfectly straightforward. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said, it may be right for the small investor who puts money into individual shares not to go near the tax inspector, but the manager of an investment must approach the company concerned or the Revenue to claim back the tax on the dividend. He will incur a cost. He will have to charge that cost—he cannot live on air—and that will fall on the PEP investor. The charge may be as large as any tax saving that the PEP investor makes from putting his money in a PEP scheme.

If the PEP scheme is confined to individual share investments, I am not that sure that it will run. It will be necessary to consider arrangements through which personal equity plans can be married up with perhaps a new PEP trust so that the cost of claiming tax on all the dividends from the companies that pay dividends on the shares in which investments have been made can be handled in volume and minimised. If that is not done, I do not believe that the scheme will be enormously attractive to the small investor with a capital gains tax exemption of about £6,000.

If it is intended to drive forward the spread of ownership, which has moved a long way already—my right hon. Friends have that intention very much in mind —some modifications to the scheme may have to be produced. The Government should have taken their courage in both hands and gone for a tax-free entry saving scheme—something like the French Loi Monory scheme —which would allow millions of workers to put part of their salary into investments and shares and claim back all the tax. The inducement of a tax-free investment is powerful.

It will be argued that such a scheme will be costly. If my right hon. and hon. Friends had looked at the scheme which was introduced by Lord Vinson and Mr. Philip Chapell of the Centre for Policy Studies, they would have seen a proposal on the same lines as Loi Monory. In theory, the cost would have been about £1 billion a year. In dynamic terms, it would have been considerably less.

If pressed, I am not sure whether I would have said to my hon. Friends that, although I would be the first to urge that we go for the 25 per cent. tax rate, which I think we will achieve before the end of this Parliament—that was the figure that we had in mind long before 1979—this year there may be a case for diverting the funds into a dramatic push on the wider ownership and personal savings side of such schemes. I am slightly sorry that the Government have not shown enthusiasm for going down that route. I hope that they will, that the PEP scheme will be the first toe in the water and that we will now consider more dramatic tax-free schemes.

The revenue calculations behind the Finance Bill and the Budget are based on the assumption that the oil price will be about $15 a barrel in 1986-87. That is optimistic. The price is already $12 a barrel, and it is highly likely that it will fall further. There are no underlying reasons why it should not go lower, as long as the Saudis maintain their output at present levels, as they have every intention of doing, and as long as demand stays low, which I think is likely because there has been a fundamental change in the world's need and thirst for oil.

Many energy experts reassuringly say, "Do not worry. The price of oil will go up and that will make the Budget arithmetic straight. It will also take the heat off the coal industry, the oil industry, and so on." One should regard those predictions with some caution. There may be another oil shock before 1992, although perhaps the expectation will avoid the very thing that people fear. In the meantime, oil prices could remain at low levels for several years.

If the average oil price is $10 or $11 a barrel in 1986-87, we will have to revise our expectations for next year. If, in 1987-88, the price runs at $10 or even lower, which is not impossible, my right hon. Friends will have to ask themselves how their long-postponed, but very important, strategy for cutting personal taxes—I remain convinced that that is the best way to create jobs, because the experience of every nation has been that low taxes and low unemployment go together—will be sustained if the Government have to suffer a further cut in oil revenues.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor made an interesting speech to the Lombard Association. It was, as it were, part of the Budget speech which he felt should be made elsewhere, not in the Budget speech. The report of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service commented on that.

My right hon. Friend said, rather quaintly, that the fall in oil prices was the result of a return to prudent monetary policies and that that had been responsible for the oil price collapse. With respect to my right hon. Friend, I do not think that is the position. First, it is highly questionable whether we have returned to prudent monetary policies. Secondly, I believe that the fall in the consumption of oil has occurred because the demand for oil has become detached from the process of output growth in the Western economies.

Sheikh Yamani, whom I greatly respect, is incorrect when he forecasts that, after a while, the West will return to gas-guzzlers and oil heating on a massive scale, that there will be a general switch-around and that demand will rise as supply falls. The truth is that the world has gone off oil. The Budget calculations and the Finance Bill have to be cast on the assumption that oil revenues are not only substantially lower now than they were last November, when there was much heady talk about tax cuts worth £3·5 billion, but are lower than they were expected to be a few weeks ago, and will remain lower. The arithmetic will have to be recast on that basis.

It is not just a matter of losing tax revenues. New downside problems emerge and those are directly relevant to the tax regime and the Finance Bill. We have seen the first signs of alarm and concern over the future of the coal industry which, as far as its planners are concerned, is in a state of total paralysis. If the price of oil were to remain at $15 a barrel—let alone the present price or the price to which it will fall shortly—there would have to be a total revision of all the coal industry's plans, which would make everything about which Arthur Scargill went to war look like peanuts. Those are the serious industrial realities behind the falling oil price.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dover (Mr. Rees), who is a leading authority on oil industry taxation, both inside and outside Government, reminded us that the oil industry was looking at an entirely different landscape. There have been reports that a major loss of jobs is in prospect in Scotland as a result of the collapse of the demand for offshore equipment. It has been mentioned that 6,000 jobs are at risk. If the recoverable reserves in the North sea are to be reduced substantially, as is estimated now, as a result of the price of oil settling down at about $10 a barrel, it will re-jig the role that the North sea programme has played in the British economy. That may be inevitable.

It is possible that it will give Britain an opportunity to adjust to being a more normal industrial consumer economy than has been the case in recent years. The reality that my right hon. Friends will want to face, and which they must face, is that the changes in the energy economy, which I have described, will involve a further substantial loss of jobs, whereas the changes in the non-energy economy, which can take on board lower-cost energy and expand with new technology, will probably not involve many new jobs. Jobless growth is a worldwide phenomenon. I do not see that Britain will be free of it. We must look ahead. Further moves of a direct kind to assist the problem concerning jobs will have to be contemplated by my right hon. Friends. I am sure that they have some plans.

Tax cuts are the best way of getting new jobs, but there is probably now no escaping some more direct measures of the type I hoped would appear in the Budget and the Finance Bill. I was interested to see the suggestions from the Department of the Environment and departments of housing that the time was approaching when some local authority capital receipts could be released. An article in the Financial Times suggested that the Government were considering that measure. That would be a sensible move.

I have a partial liking for some of the measures to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) referred when visiting some inner-city areas which are derelict and miserable. The association that some people make between inner-city infrastructure investment and unemployment is cruelly misleading. Not many jobs will be turned on in that way. But the association which needs to be made between grim surroundings and investment is much more valid. What my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley tells my right hon. Friend the Chancellor is that the time has come not for massive handouts of public funds but for a type of seedcorn — a pump-priming operation whereby small amounts of public money bring large amounts of private investment on their back. I urge my right hon. and hon. Friends to consider that course as they monitor the development of their Budget strategy once the Finance Bill is passed.

I hope, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you will allow me to refer to monetary policy because the report of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service looked at it in some detail and because my right hon. Friend the Chancellor made an extremely interesting speech on monetary affairs outside the House in what was an annex, as it were, to the Budget speech. I have already mentioned the speech he made to the Lombard Association. He clearly signified that we were saying goodbye to technical scientific monetarism. I am glad to be associated with that goodbye—I was going to say "au revoir", but I hope that it is a permanent goodbye.

My right hon. Friend has made it clear, as has the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service with its usual lucidity, under the guidance of my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) with his usual lucidity, that our policy is to use short-term interest rates and the firm exchange rate to act as the main curbs on inflation. It is even questionable whether they will be operated through the mechanism of money supply to curb inflation.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor in his speech to the Lombard Association said that sterling M3 had gone on an indefinite furlough. It is no longer considered to be a suitable measure. My right hon. Friend referred to its changed velocity, and so on. He also made it clear that the MO position had been reasserted. But it has been reasserted not as a governor of the rate of inflation—something to be influenced which will, in turn, influence inflation—but as an indicator, similar to a dial on a clock. If the dial points too high, short-term interest rates, presumably, will be used directly to curb inflation by curbing credit and other deflationary factors. In short, our policy is to use short-term interest rates and the exchange rate.

What is our exchange rate policy? I am sure that my right hon. Friends will want to address themselves to the difficulty that arises. The impression outside the House is that our exchange rate policy is in mid-air. We are in the European monetary system as a country member but are not involved in the exchange rate mechanism. Will we become involved in it, or will we not? There seems to be some contradictions.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has been extremely firm and clear about where we are going with respect to exchange rates. In his speech to the Lombard Association he said:

"in the right circumstances membership of a formal or fixed exchange rate system can itself provide a very effective framework for monetary policy".

He said:

"over the medium term maintaining a fixed exchange rate against countries who share our resolve to reduce inflation is a pretty robust way of keeping domestic monetary policy on the rails".

My right hon. Friend continued:

"I see no role for an exchange rate target outside a formal exchange rate system . . . And that, for the UK, means outside the exchange rate mechanism of the EMS".

He said:

"it clearly makes sense . . . to limit wild swings in the exchange rate, particularly against our European competitors".

In spirit and in intention we seem to have moved into the exchange rate mechanism of the EMS and, if so, we have an exchange rate policy. That needs confirmation.

Having made those comments on short-term interest rates and the exchange rate, which seem to be the main two engines of our policy, I must say, a little perversely, that it probably does not matter much whether the policies are being modified. I suspect that the real issue is rapidly ceasing to be inflation and is becoming deflation. I was interested to see this morning in The Times that Mr. Timothy Congdon had changed his tune remarkably and was questioning whether Governments had gone on too long wringing their hands about inflation when, perhaps, the wind had changed. Inflation in Germany is 0·1 per cent. Inflation in Japan is negative and prices are falling. Since 1 January, commodity futures prices in the Western world have fallen 10 per cent. and, since 1979, non-oil raw material prices have fallen by well over 20 per cent. in real terms, according to the Bank of England Quarterly Bulletin.

With prices falling in on all sides, the problem will be how to keep world economies going. I doubt that domestic monetary policy will play much of a role. Nor, as Mr. Congdon apparently thinks, will it be much more than pulling a piece of string to urge more and more interest rate disarmament in the hope that somehow it will keep the economies going. The reality is that probably nothing can be done. If anything can be done, it must be on an international level, not by individual Governments. I imagine that that matter will be discussed at the end of the week in Tokyo among all the talk of global medium-term financial strategies and objective indicators.

Mr. Budgen: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Howell: If my hon. Friend will allow me, I shall come to the end of my remarks, because I have delayed the House too long.

I do not know whether the Tokyo conference will have the slightest effect on the scene. I suspect that Ministers are beginning to stand around at these international gatherings saying, "After all, boys, we are all Keynesians." That seems to be the new mood. I suspect that the reality will be more modest. The outcome will simply be that the Japanese need to become more globally minded in using their colossal surplus and buy more Mexican bonds, or whatever will help the balance of the world economy, and that the United States will cut its vast deficit. If those two measures are achieved, I believe that there will be more world stability and a better background against which we can proceed with interesting tax reforms in the Budget. I am sure that my right hon. and hon. Friends are aware of these rocks ahead as they steer their way through the Bill.

6.18 pm

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): I shall refer to some of the points raised by the right hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell), especially oil prices and monetarism.

One of the pleasures of speaking on the Second Reading of the Finance Bill is that one does not necessarily have to join the chain gang on the Finance Bill Committee. I suppose that some of us have either been granted parole or even full remission of sentence.

I should like to refer to an omission from the Bill. One of the pleasures of being a Back Bencher is that one does not have to agree with everything said by one's party. [Interruption.] That will not give much pleasure to the Government. I am concerned, as I am sure is the Chancellor, about the way in which mortgage interest relief is getting out of hand. Two years ago, the cost of mortgage interest relief was £2·15 billion and, in 1984-85, two years later, it was £3·5 billion—a 60 per cent. rise. That is bad enough because, clearly, it will continue. It distorts the housing market and directly adds to the cost of housing, but there are further problems.

There is an increasing sophistication among borrowers. The Government have done much to foment that, with advantage, and I am not against that. That sophistication means that there will be a greater leakage of money, ostensibly for the purpose of housing, going into other areas. Many people have a second holiday on the basis of an extension to an outhouse. Such leaks will continue and the cost of mortgage relief will increase again and again. What are the effects of these expensive subsidies to expensive houses? At one end, it encourages over-housing and at the other end taxpayers living in rotting, decaying and cheap accommodation are subsidising the relief. These opposing positions are getting further and further apart and it is a matter of concern.

The right hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) raised the important subject of the price of oil and the consequence of the fall in price. That ties in with the fourth report of the Treasury and Civil Service Committee. Once again we are extremely grateful to the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) and his Committee for producing the report. In paragraph 41 of the report refers to "the nature and the lack of a satisfactory explanation by the Government of its response to the oil revenue."

The report calls it a "disappointing response", and I agree with that.

The high price of any commodity benefits the producer against the purchaser. However, the total world purchasing power remains the same. It is the distribution which varies. The benefit to countries which import oil is exactly balanced by the disadvantage to those which export oil. The transitional effects are difficult and cause problems. If there is a sudden rise in the price, time is needed for the market to settle down. The OPEC increases in 1974-75 could have been absorbed if those price increases had taken place over a longer period. An oil price shock causes imbalances.

We should have used our oil revenue to increase our growth and investment instead of waiting for the price to fall. If Britain had no oil, our domestic costs would benefit from the lower oil prices. France, Germany and Japan have benefited greatly from the fall in price. Our exports would benefit if our major customers were oil importers and they would suffer if our major customers were oil exporters. We are in a different position because we have oil which we export. At one time our domestic costs benefited in the same way as the non-oil producing countries are benefiting now.

Britain could have reaped the benefits of the profits from North sea oil revenue if we had used it to assist industry. The non-oil industrial countries were unable to do that and Britain had a commercial advantage which we have never used. In a competitive world, it is the oil importer countries, our industrial competitors, that now have the advantage. We have forgone that prime advantage as the rich rewards of North sea oil have been used as an excuse for a high pound, with its debilitating effect on our industry and employment figures. The right hon. Member for Guildford was correct when he said that the oil price would have a consequence on the coal industry.

Britain's advantage lay in talking sensibly with the OPEC countries. A rational sensible oil price should have concerned Britain. It was not of interest to Germany, Japan or France. We forgot our personal involvement in a matter which should have had high priority.

The PSBR is held to be the right one because so much will be obtained from the sale of publicly owned assets. The exchange of a public monopoly for a private monopoly causes us grave disquiet. There are laws in Britain which enable the courts to take action in a way which the Government may not find thoroughly acceptable. However, there is a short history of regulation for the private monopolies. British Telecom regards itself as not having a public interest with regard to 999 calls but that was held to be of public interest before privatisation.

These new super-monopolies require special controls which we do not have and which we are not even thinking of providing. We have only to look at the United States to see the way in which its corporations can circumvent the tight controls. I compare that with our thin, under-nourished quangos fighting it out in the jungle with some of the largest industrial corporations. We have discarded ministerial supervision but the replacement is quite inadequate and the public will suffer. The Government should bear in mind that tax cuts would come from the sale of public companies which will then lack adequate supervision as private companies.

One of the most important measures in the Finance Bill concerns the capital transfer tax. It is serious because it illustrates the philosophy of the Government. The Government claim to be radical, but nobody can conceive of returning to something less than the old death duties as a consequence of radical government. What is given is assistance to the idle heirs of those who have been responsible for Britain's misfortunes. I can understand the notion of rewarding those who create wealth. One can give financial inducements to those who create wealth and such inducements have not been considered by the Government. One can make out a case for rewarding the creators of wealth, although I would dispute it.

The emasculation of the capital transfer tax by the 10-year rule and the less onerous death duty provisions have made it a voluntary tax. It is a shameful proposal. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has replaced a useful tax with a voluntary contribution paid only by the miser, the procrastinator or the negligent.

The principles of the capital transfer tax were sensible and equitable. The enjoyment of capital which an individual creates is the right of that individual. However, the enjoyment of capital by virtue of birth has long been regarded as eminently suitable for taxation—a tax which ought to be high and enforceable. That was the basis of death duties long before Socialist Governments involved themselves in these matters. The approach was to make the loopholes smaller. That was undertaken by Labour Governments but has not been undertaken by Conservative Governments, and the result has been a division between the two sides of the House as to how far capital wealth ought to be taxed.

We are all agreed that income tax should be paid, and it should be progressive. We argue about the amount but not the principle. However, with regard to capital transfer tax and a tax on wealth, we argue about the principle. That is a great pity. There is no question but that wealth should be taxed. But we are now back to the old optional tax in an even worse form than before.

I do not know what is the Government's policy towards mergers. There are even many Conservative Members who, like me, had hoped that there would be some form of taxation that would have some effect. However, I do not know how far that is practicable. In the rising stock market, those who have exchanged the long view for immediate profits can see their share prices sharply improve, and can use them as the base for a takeover which may make no industrial sense and which any Government should be concerned with. The Government seem to say that we should forget the industrial logic and concentrate on the one aspect of competition between companies. But the trouble with limiting takeovers to mergers that do not reduce competition is that it encourages the growth of conglomerates.

I thought that the one lesson that we had learnt in all our years of industrial policy and of changes of view was that no firm has such managerial wisdom and expertise that it can rejuvenate and advance any industry that it turns to. I know that many captains of industry are confident of their prowess and that of their managers, and think that there is no firm where they cannot improve the structure or organisation. But we should have a healthy scepticism of such individuals or companies. At a time of a booming stock market, it is wise to call a halt to the fever of mergers and to calm down those frantic companies by introducing a long period of delay and reflection.

Mr. Maples: I think that the extent of recent takeovers and mergers concerns us all. However, the threat of a takeover is just about the only weapon to be held over the head of an inefficient manager of a large public company. If it was removed, assets would be even more inefficiently managed.

Mr. Sheldon: I think that that is true when activity on the stock market is fairly quiescent. However, when the stock market booms, a company that has fashionable shares can make a takeover bid for those companies that are not quite so fashionable. During the period of stability the system works reasonably, but during the period of instability it does not. We are in a period of instability, and it is difficult to justify those mergers. In five years' time, I am not sure how many of them will be vindicated.

The Treasury and Civil Service Committee has once again done us a very good service in drawing our attention to the issue of the money supply. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was insultingly dismissive in his Budget speech about his changes backwards and forwards over the question of money supply. It is useful to turn to the first statement of that medium-term financial strategy. I have a copy of the relevant Budget report, which I treasure as there are not many of them around.

When the concept of the money supply was introduced, there were great hopes and expectations. It was to be the foundations of all prosperity for ever and ever. We know that the Chancellor of the Exchequer wrote the words that I am about to quote even though, at the time, he was the Financial Secretary to the Treasury.

He wrote:

"The Government's objectives in the medium term are to bring down the rate of inflation and to create conditions for sustainable growth, output and employment. To reduce inflation it will progressively reduce the growth of the money stock and will pursue the policies necessary to achieve that aim."

There is then the wonderful table, with sterling M3 scheduled to reduce from 11 per cent. in 1981, 10 per cent. in 1982, 9 per cent. in 1983 and between 4 and 8 per cent. in 1983-84. The Treasury was so certain about it that it allowed VAT to be increased to 15 per cent. It thought that there would be no effect on inflation because the money supply would do it all. The Chancellor of the Exchequer made a shambles of a speech. He has many ways of estimating the money supply, yet that concept is no longer in use. The last thing that I would advise someone who wanted to know what the Chancellor proposed to do would be to look at the money supply.

The right hon. Member for Guildford was right. There is an interaction between the exchange rate and the interest rate. If the exchange rate seems to be doing badly, up go interest rates. If the exchange rate is doing reasonably well in the Chancellor's eyes, interest rates can fall. The exchange rate is the prime determinant, just as it has been in Britain for the past 20 or 30 years. That little affair with monetarism lasted a few short years and then passed like a thief in the night. We now see the exchange rate mechanism working.

The right hon. Member for Guildford wanted Britain to join the exchange rate mechanism. I am not so sure about that. In the European monetary system we have, in effect, a deutschmark zone. We should not fool ourselves; that is what it is. Thus we either go into a deutschmark zone, or we have the deutschmark and sterling. Having two important currencies in the same zone is not the same as having one dominant currency. That is one problem.

Another problem is that we are likely to go in at far too high a rate. I believe that that is a serious point, although the Government may not see it as such.

The right hon. Member for Guildford also pointed out that the immediate danger was not inflation but deflation. That danger is serious. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the wind of change. We have spent too much time giving inflation super-priority. Nobody would doubt that there was a need to reduce inflation, but a change must now come. The danger is that it may come too late. We have suffered greatly from the Government's monetarist policies, and it is time that the agony was ended.

Mr. Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) is a much respected Member of Parliament. Although I might have been tempted to agree with some of his comments on competition policy, I was rather less tempted to agree with his remarks on capital transfer tax. Nearly 2 million people run their own independent small businesses, and they may react adversely to his sideswipe at people's idle heirs and at his comment that they were a good reason for having an effective and tough capital transfer tax.

I believe that the change made represents a central and long-term part of the Budget, which will encourage independent businesses. If it is impossible to pass on a business intact to the next generation of owners or managers, that unit of competition will go. Moreover, why should we encourage people to start firms if they must be sold on their death or retirement? I warmly congratulate the Government on abolishing capital transfer tax, to all intents and purposes, on lifetime gifts.

I listened to the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) and found it sad that he seemed to have learnt or understood nothing about independent businesses. Most, if not all, do not reach their optimum size in one generation. They need to be passed from one generation to another, and to grow at every stage. Thus it is vital that our tax policy should facilitate that.

The passing on of productive assets from one generation to the next is crucial if a free enterprise system is to work effectively, and it is in this area that two thirds of new jobs are currently being produced. I hope that in a purely party political sense people in independent businesses will pay careful attention to what the Opposition have said about their determination, if they are ever entrusted with power again, to reintroduce a swingeing capital transfer tax. I hope that will be noted by everyone.

I want to move away from that subject and speak about a matter that was debated nearly a year ago, that of unitary tax. The House will remember that we had a major debate on that last year. The issue is of great importance not only to the United Kingdom but to the United States and to our main trading partners. The House will remember the debate on Report stage of last year's Finance Bill. It is important that as we debate this year's Finance Bill we should recall that debate. Perhaps during the summer the House will want to encourage the Government to take further retaliatory action to keep up the pressure on the United States Administration.

Last year the House unanimously passed a new clause which is now section 54 of the Finance Act 1985. That gives the Government power by order to withdraw payments of tax credits attached to certain dividends received by companies with a presence in a unitary tax state such as California. I know that many of my hon. Friends carefully follow this issue in the United States and there is no doubt that the passing last year of the retaliatory provision was a milestone that has inspired action in Washington.

On 8 November 1985 President Reagan issued a presidential statement in which he said that his Administration would introduce legislation to abolish unitary tax on a worldwide reporting basis. Secondly, he said that he would enter into negotiations with the United Kingdom to try to amend the United Kingdom-United States tax treaty and try to ensure that when court cases occurred in the United States US interests were represented. In response to the American Administration's initiative our Government also issued a statement. They welcomed the Administration's proposed action and announced that the Government intended to enter into negotiations also to amend the United Kingdom-United States tax convention.

In recognition of the statement issued by President Reagan, our Government announced that they would forbear from initiating retaliatory action under section 54 of the Finance Act 1985 on the strict understanding that the United States legislation—this is an important point for the House to recall—will be passed into law and will take effect by 31 December 1986.

The United States Administration introduced their legislation into Congress last December but, alas, I have to say that it received what at best can only be described as lukewarm Congressional support. Indeed, the legislation did not have as many sponsors as many of us hoped it would have. I understand there was to be a sub-committee hearing in the Senate on 16 May but that intiitial hearing has been cancelled. We are now at the end of April and no further action has been taken in terms of a Bill being heard by the two key Congressional Committees, the Finance Committee in the Senate and the Ways and Means Committee in the House of Representatives. Little progress seems to have been made on the treaty route. The House may want to press the US Administration today and on every other occasion we can to give much more vigorous support to legislation in Congress than they have to date. I hope the Government will pay attention to that comment.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): I support what the hon. Gentleman says. Many of us on this side of the House would support the Government if they took that sort of action.

Mr. Grylls: I am grateful for that comment. It is helpful to know that the House is united on this issue. Hon. Members may not be united on many issues but we are united on this one. It is worth mentioning that the early-day motion on the Order Paper on the subject has the support of 240 right hon. and hon. Members from all parties. I hope that my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer will take the opportunity at next week's economic summit to tell President Reagan and Treasury Secretary Baker yet again that this House is frustrated at the lack of progress on this issue in the United States, despite all the promises that we continue to receive.

All-party support is important. In that context, I am grateful to the hon. Members for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) and for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) and to my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary who has given untiring support to this issue even though he has many other things to deal with. It is crucial that the Government continue to give that tough support. It is essential to pay tribute to those British companies that have major investments in the United States and that have launched a campaign to fight this issue. That is vital. Although to an extent it is self-interest, there is nothing wrong with that. Those companies are determined to see an end to this damaging tax.

When he is winding up, my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary will encourage all hon. Members and British industry which holds United States investments if he confirms that the Government's deadline for action in the United States is still 31 December 1986. If it is not passed into legislation in the United States by that date, perhaps he will confirm that the Government will return to section 54 of the Finance Act 1985 and the retaliatory clause and do something to bring tougher pressure on the United States Administration.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Surrey, North-West (Mr. Grylls) and reiterate the point that he speaks for hon. Members of all parties in expressing the frustration that we have felt for many years about unitary taxation. I hope that people in Congress especially but also in the United States Administration will take note of the fact that the whole House is united in its frustration.

Our central criticism of the Budget and of the Finance Bill was that the strategy which the Government embarked upon amounted to giving away by a reduction in taxation some £1 billion while spending only some £100 million on efforts to create jobs. That is quite the wrong strategy, and it was for that reason that I and my hon. Friends voted against the cut in income tax from 30p to 29p. We did that because we had the courage of our convictions and followed the strategy that we outlined in our own Budget proposals. That strongly contradicts the strategy that the Government have embarked upon.

It is deplorable that the Labour party did not have the courage of its convictions. Despite the protestations by Labour Members in this debate that they disagree with the Government strategy, they did not follow their voices by their votes and vote against the strategy when they had an opportunity to do so.

Mr. Robert Sheldon: Let me defend the members of the Opposition Front Bench. There was, of course, the factor that a tax cut increases demand in the economy and that is of value. Iain Macleod used to say that one does not turn away Father Christmas because he is not giving exactly what is wanted.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: I am disappointed by the right hon. Gentleman. He gives as inadequate an explanation of the lack of courage on the Labour Benches as his own Front Bench spokesmen have done. We criticise not the Labour party for wanting to expand the economy, but the method by which the Government have chosen to give away the money. As the right hon. Gentleman knows, that money could have been spent as his right hon. Friends and we have been advocating for many years—for example, on expanding the economy through spending on infrastructure and housing.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes) rose——

Mr. Wrigglesworth: I do not want to pursue this point throughout my speech, but that is where the money should have gone, which is why we opposed the Budget's central strategy. The Labour party was not prepared to do that because it wants to have it all ways. It was not prepared to be consistent in its strategy.

The Chief Secretary painted, just as the Chancellor of the Exchequer and other Government spokesmen have done, a rosy view of the economy's performance. He provided a posse of selected statistics to demonstrate the success which, we are told, the Government's policies are achieving. Not surprisingly, the statistics which have been chosen are based on the economy's recovery from the depths of the recession in 1981.

We hear little these days about what happened to the British economy and British industry between 1979, when the Government came to office, and 1981. Obviously the reason for that is that during that period large sections of our industry were decimated and unemployment increased dramatically. It is like a person who wilfully and pigheadedly risks his health, and, having suffered from the inevitable consequences, expects congratulations on his recovery from his self-inflicted injury.

If one considers the record of the past seven years, not merely the period since 1981, one sees that employment —we have heard a great deal about the number of jobs that have been created recently—is still 1 million below what it was when the Government came to office in 1979. Indeed, that decrease is greater than that of the European Community as a whole. Output is only 7 per cent. above the 1979 level, manufacturing output is still 6 per cent. below the 1979 level, and manufacturing investment is more than 20 per cent. below the 1979 level. That is not a record to crow about. The empty or demolished factories and the 3·5 million unemployed are testimony to that record.

The Chancellor boasts that recently we have moved from the bottom to the top of the European growth league. However, if allowance is made for the effects of the miners' dispute, the 1985 rate of growth was 2·5 per cent. and only just ahead of Germany and Italy, and in the second half of 1985 the United Kingdom, with 2·1 per cent. growth, dropped well below France, Italy and West Germany. During that period West German growth was at 6·3 per cent. Therefore, the real record is dreadful. The most recent figures show a distinct slowing down in the United Kingdom economy, with manufacturing output stagnant during the past nine months and industrial production slowing down.

The Chancellor claims that we have survived unscathed the halving of the oil price. We heard a great deal about that at the time of the Budget. I wonder whether the Government have studied the Bank of England Quarterly Bulletin which points out that real national disposable income will be adversely effected by the impact of falling oil prices on the terms of trade. The Bank's analysis shows that the direct consequence of the recent fall in price is to reduce net disposable income by 1 per cent., since real net oil exports account for 2·75 per cent. of gross domestic product. According to the Bank of England, that accounts for a direct loss to the balance of payments of up to £3 billion a year, at probable 1986 levels of production.

The bank suggests that that could be offset within four years by a 9 per cent. fall in the effective exchange rate. But it adds the crucial qualification that the improvement on the non-oil current account will follow from the beneficial effects of improved competitiveness, which depends on there being no offset to the effects of exchange rate depreciation from higher wage settlements. If rising unit labour costs continue to erode competitiveness, the effect on the balance of payments will be even worse than the £2·5 billion, £1·5 billion and £500 million predicted for 1986, 1987 and 1988 respectively by the Bank's simulations.

Thus, to grasp the opportunity presented by lower oil prices depends on conserving the competitive advantage conferred by lower exchange rate. In that context, it is crucial that wage bargainers recognise that foreign competitors also gain from lower oil prices, which have fallen even further in foreign currencies, and will reduce their pay settlements in line with their falling, if not vanishing, inflation rates.

The Chancellor is clearly prepared to stoke up a consumer boom with real disposable incomes rising by 5 per cent. and consumer spending by 4 per cent. this year. This year demand will be largely fuelled by consumer spending rather than by investment and export. Unit labour costs rose by 5·75 per cent. last year—much faster than those of our competitors. Their unit labour costs rose hardly at all or are falling. It is clear that the Chancellor must seek a bigger decrease in pay settlements than 1 per cent., which is the most that he can expect as bargainers adjust their expectations to falling inflation.

As commodity prices fall and work their way through the economy, wage pressure will start to increase inflation. Much of the credit which the Government have claimed for low rates of inflation and of interest should be put at the door of Sheikh Yamani for his action and of the lower commodity prices throughout the world. The Chancellor will hope to hold the rate of inflation to about 3 per cent. next summer with lower nationalised industry prices and indexation.

The Secretary of State for Employment, after announcing the appalling unemployment figures last month, shared in the general euphoria that Ministers have been expressing by stating that employment had risen by nearly 1 million since 1983. However, the number of full-time equivalent jobs rose by only 16,000 between March 1983 and September 1985. The Secretary of State's figures depend crucially on estimates of the increase in the self-employed — a rise of 440,000 during that period. Growth is welcome, but it depends crucially on that estimate.

Even the growth in the employed labour force to which the Government point is lower than in the previous year. During the next three years we must create an additional 113,000 jobs nationally each year merely to keep pace with the rise in the labour force. On present Government policies, there seems little prospect of our being able to do that and to reduce unemployment levels.

Mr. Butterfill: The hon. Gentleman made an important point about the increase in the labour force. Will he confirm that during the 10 years from 1976 to 1986 the increase in the labour force has been about 2 million people, and that that, rather than the economic policies about which he is complaining, is the major contributor to the present levels of unemployment?

Mr. Wrigglesworth: No, because those people represent an opportunity, not a burden. For every mouth there is a pair of hands. These people can work; they can produce wealth if they have the opportunity. This is why some countries have expanded their population because they want the growth that will come from that. But because of the barmy economic policies that the Government have pursued over this period, we have not had the growth in demand and the growth in opportunities for those people to create the wealth that we would all like to see. The unemployed are not sharing in the consumer boom which the Government are generating, and the Government remain passive and supine in the face of mass unemployment.

The 1p cut in the basic rate of tax will create at most some 30,000 jobs over three years, compared with at least 80,000 through a cut of 10 per cent. in employers' National Insurance contributions, which we advocated. The Government always select the measures which are least effective in creating jobs and which benefit most the relatively better off. It is a macabre achievement of this Government that the direct revenue costs, through benefits and lost direct tax revenue, of the extra unemployment since 1979 amount to £50 billion, almost completely swallowing up the £52 billion that the Exchequer has received in North sea oil revenues during that period. It will be this Government's epitaph that they squandered Britain's golden decade on paying for mass unemployment.

Despite the oil price fall, British industry is still paying a substantial cost in higher interest rates which remain very high and are much higher than is justified by inflation differential with our main competitors. Clearly the Government fear a loss of confidence and a too precipitate fall in the exchange rate. As Roger Bootle, the Lloyds merchant bank economist, has pointed out, the currency markets demand a confidence premium on United Kingdom interest rates to compensate for fears of currency depreciation in the future. As oil price risks should have diminished, the main reason for this must be lack of confidence in the underlying soundness of the economy, or fear of the possibility—and this may be coming in to their reckoning, I suppose—of a Labour Government.

European monetary system entry, openly advocated by the Chancellor and the Foreign Secretary, would in our view help to give more stable and possibly lower interest rates, but there is the danger that the Government might enter at an over-valued and unsustainable rate in order to maintain an anti-inflation discipline. Our view, strongly expressed on a number of occasions over the past months, is that we have had opportunities to go in at a rate that could have been negotiated. The chairman of the Bundesbank has made it clear that he believes that we should negotiate a lower rate in relation to the deutschmark, that we should go into the exchange rate mechanism in order to bring about that stability and indeed to do the things that, as the right hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) pointed out from the Chancellor's Lombard speech, are possible if we go into the exchange rate mechanism.

I want to say a few words about the share ownership proposals in the Finance Bill because we on the alliance

[Mr. Wrigglesworth]

Benches have a long-standing interest in this matter. The personal equity plan, which unfortunately has only the barest ground rules for its establishment in the Finance Bill, has turned out to be a pretty emaciated mouse. The cost of tax relief for the scheme in 1987-88 is estimated at only £25 million, which will do very little to encourage the spread of shareholding. The incentives for individuals are minute. This point has been recognised by Conservative Members as well as by Opposition Members. Those most helped by the scheme will be the better-off taxpayers and those on the higher rates who are already utilising their £6,300 capital gains tax exemption and who will be able to build up a tax-free fund.

The apparent exclusion of investment trusts and certainly of unit trusts from the scheme means that on a relatively small amount it would be hard to achieve the kind of spread of risk which would make the scheme attractive to small shareholders. Those who do not benefit already from the CGT exemption will only benefit from the tax refund on reinvested dividends. Although the objection to including unit trusts is that they do not represent direct shareholding, the PEP scheme is unlikely to appeal to the small saver without them. The Chancellor's proposals are quite inadequate to achieve a wider spread of share ownership.

In addition, the Chancellor spoke in the Budget of the need to give profit sharing a greater role in total remuneration. He said that it might make sense to offer some temporary measure of tax relief to the employees concerned to help to get profit-sharing agreements of the right kind off the ground. He promised a consultative document. We welcome that and look forward to receiving such a document; we shall certainly be very happy to respond to it. We are pleased that the Government are adopting that approach, because the greater the consensus on this issue across industry and across this House, the better for all.

The Chancellor could have used some of the £1·2 billion that he has given away in the basic rate cut to give new encouragement to direct share ownership. The findings of the NOP poll which the Chief Secretary mentioned on share ownership are, if I can be fairly modest in my language, somewhat surprising. Some people have been rather dubious about them. They considerably exceed the stock exchange's estimates: 2·5 million shareholders as opposed to 6 million projected by NOP. That is a very dramatic difference. We want evidence beyond that of the NOP poll to show that 6 million is the true figure, because it is certainly not borne out by much evidence, both subjective and other, that is available.

Mr. Richard Wainwright (Colne Valley): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the wider distribution of shares would be greatly encouraged if the Chancellor, instead of virtually abolishing capital transfer tax in this Bill, had remodelled it in such a way as to encourage wealthy people to make a multitude of relatively small gifts of shares to large numbers of people rather than passing on their inheritance to only one or two members of the family?

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Yes. I hope that we can pursue that point in Committee because it is something that we would like to see. There are other things which we would like to see and which we feel would extend share ownership much more broadly than the Government's measures will.

Whichever of those figures is correct, the fact is that it is well short of the proportion of the population with building society accounts or with bank savings or deposit accounts. Instead of going down the PEP route, the Chancellor should have gone down the route recommended by the stock exchange and provided a modified version of the Loi Monory scheme, a tax incentive-based scheme that has been very successful in France. A tax incentive of £500 in an additional personal allowance, used to buy shares in a qualifying fund, would cost the Treasury about £300 million if 2 million people benefited from the tax concessions. Last year my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) moved a new clause along these lines, and we shall be returning to this issue in Committee.

Mr. Hanley: The hon. Gentleman is clearly in favour of wider share ownership; we all know that. I wonder whether he was in favour of the greatest contribution made to wider share ownership, the privatisation of the past three or four years? How does his party vote on that issue?

Mr. Wrigglesworth: We could support quite a number of the privatisation proposals. The National Freight Corporation has been one of the most successful operations carried out and we have consistently supported it. But the methods by which the Government have privatised some public monopolies and turned them into private monopolies, dominating the market and not giving the consumer real choice or providing real competition, has led us to oppose the most recent privatisation measures.

I do not want to be diverted down this road, but if the Government were prepared to break up the British Gas Corporation into at least four parts and have separate area boards all as private companies, and provide some element of competition where it does not exist under the present proposals, we might support such a move. But all we have is a massive monopoly, with no competition and no consumer choice, being foisted on the public. That is not the way to obtain wider share ownership.

Wider share ownership could be achieved if the Chancellor had also given more direct help to employee share ownership. If he really wants to tackle the adversarial climate which has characterised industrial relations and collective bargaining in Britain for so many decades, he can help to achieve that by giving employees a much more direct stake in the future of their company by giving income tax relief to profit sharing and share ownership schemes or relief from corporation tax in order to encourage them.

Thirdly, if the Chancellor is serious about influencing the current pay round, as opposed to trying to steal our clothes in the consultative document, he should have proposed a payroll incentive of reduced national insurance contributions for companies which concluded longer term pay settlements in line with the expected lower rates of inflation or with productivity improvements. Employees could receive benefits in the form of increased share ownership if they were prepared to negotiate such settlements and could be given substantial tax concessions if they retained their stake in the enterprise.

A reduction of employees' national insurance contributions would help to cut labour costs and to keep firms competitive. We hope that the Government will look again at the PEP and other schemes and be tempted by some of the pressure from their own Members, as well as that to which they are responding from these Benches, as the general election approaches. Nothing concentrates the minds of politicians more than votes. Clearly that is the case with not only the by-elections but the general election approaching. I hope that that will encourage the Government to look more seriously at some of those schemes for really encouraging more people to take a direct stake in their companies and in shares in other companies. We shall want to see something much more effective than the PEP scheme if that is to come about.

Mr. Terence Higgins (Worthing): The House will have listened with interest to the frank confession of the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) that the alliance voted against the Chancellor's proposed reduction in income tax. I am sure that we can look forward with equal expectation in the forthcoming by-elections to that being a major plank in the platform of the alliance candidates.

Mr. Budgen: A very high moral stance.

Mr. Higgins: The Second Reading debate of the Finance Bill is typically a mixture of specific comment on individual proposals on the one hand and commentary on the broad macro-economic consequences of all the measures in the Finance Bill on the other hand. I wish on this occasion to follow that tradition and to begin with the good news in the Budget.

One of the disadvantages of the Budget ritual is that on Budget day and the day afterwards the media is full of publicity for what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor is proposing, but the individual proposals are soon forgotten and the Finance Bill does not receive the same sort of publicity. That is unfortunate. Often, local press and radio do not spell out the specific proposals so that those in the constituencies who are affected by my right hon. Friend's proposals are not fully aware of them and so unable to take advantage of them.

In that context it is important that the specific proposals should receive coverage at a local as well as a national level and I want to single out charities for attention, to which my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary rightly drew attention in his opening remarks. The role of the voluntary sector in our economic affairs is important. It should not be treated as a substitute for Government activity in those areas where the Government can do the job best. For example, I hope that we shall continue to see substantial increases in public expenditure in some areas of the National Health Service.

None the less, the voluntary area is important and deserves to be encouraged. I am glad that the reliefs on some aspects of value added tax have been introduced and, in particular, the two specific proposals on charities which were mentioned—the facility for individuals to make charitable donations with tax relief in individual company schemes and for companies to contribute a sum equal to 3 per cent. of their dividend payments, again with tax relief, to individual charities. That can be important in areas such as my own of West Sussex where companies can, to a considerable extent, make donations to local charities and, in turn, have an important impact on the community's welfare. That having been said, I share the doubts expressed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Jenkin) on clause 29, and I hope that that will receive considerable attention in Committee.

On the macro-economic side, the policy which the Finance Bill implements again brings good news, certainly in the unique combination of reduced inflation and the record rate of sustained economic growth such as we are experiencing. But there are some presentational problems because one of the difficulties of reducing inflation, as we have, from something over 25 per cent. to about 5 per cent., and, I hope in the coming year, to still less, is that we put that forward as a reduction in the cost of living but many of our constituents do not believe that that is the reality. The way in which the cost of living index, or indeed the pensioners' cost of living index, is calculated is not generally understood and that means that people do not believe what is said about inflation.

I hope that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and his Treasury colleagues will go to some lengths to stress the fact that the cost of living index covers an enormous basket of individual items and is calculated on the basis of individual surveys, which take place every month. When inflation was going up at 25 per cent., big increases in particular items, such as electricity and gas, were submerged, so people were not worried about the cost of living figures. With figures for the overall cost of living down in the 5 per cent. range or lower, a sudden large increase in the price of, say, gas, electricity or rates, casts some doubts on the credibility of the Government's claims. It is important that we should spell out that point.

Another important point came out in the evidence taken by the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee from the Governor of the Bank of England, many of whose remarks were extremely helpful. The House will recall that the original intention of the medium-term financial strategy was to alter expectations on pay. The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) was so brave as to produce the original medium-term financial strategy document, which was very much concerned with expectations, in particular on pay claims. The Governor in his evidence on page 67 in answer to question 366 in relation to expectation affecting pay settlements said:

> "I think there is a sound barrier at around 5 per cent. where a lot of people feel it is not too bad: 'Surely we can have an increase of that sort of level.'"

He went on to say that he thought that the point about expectations was now greatly diminished and that, perhaps, is again an important effect of falling inflation.

None the less, the rate of economic growth has been combined with the reduction in inflation and even the TUC, from whom we took evidence, seemed to say that it would be content, if not absolutely delighted, with the 4 per cent. rate of growth. When one looks at the economic forecast one sees that we are on the way to that, but anything much faster than that forecast in the Treasury Red Book might create some real problems in the resurgence of inflation. Let me say a word or two about that.

In particular, I hope that the Select Committee's report, about which several hon. Members have made kind remarks, brings out the way in which policy has changed in relation to the attitude of my right hon. Friend and the Treasury. We have seen a steady progression away from dogmatism in regard to monetarism towards almost complete pragmatism. Indeed, one of the problems that we face at present is the extent to which economic policy has now become opaque. It is very important that we in the House should seek to analyse the difficulties.

In particular, we have moved very much towards what can best be described as an interest exchange rate policy, and I want to say something about that. In his answers to questions 319 and 320, the Governor of the Bank of England agreed that the rate of interest in other countries with which we are competing is something like half the present rate of interest in the United Kingdom. I therefore think it is important to ask why it is that interest rates are as high as they are.

If one looks at the situation from a domestic point of view first, I think that it is worrying. The Governor of the Bank of England, again in a rather graphic phrase—it is remarkable how well the metaphor stood up—described the overhanging glacier of liquidity in the economy which is continuing in its frozen state only because of the very high level of real interest rates. If real interest rates begin to decline, the problem is that that glacier will begin to thaw, which could have disastrous consequences in regard to the resurgence of inflation.

Despite the good performance to which I referred earlier, I personally have considerable concern about whether we shall succeed in maintaining the downward pressure on inflation that we should all like to see, even though it is done against a background of very different trends in commodity prices from those experienced in the early 1970s.

The other reason why from a domestic point of view we have high interest rates is that which the Chancellor himself spelt out. It is because our unit labour costs are rising faster than those in competitor countries. We had some difficulty in the Committee understanding precisely how this mechanism was supposed to operate, although at the end of the day I think there was a slight suspicion that interest rates were high for a rather old-fashioned traditional reason—that, if unit labour costs were rising too fast, then one put up interest rates to exert downward pressure on companies faced with inflation wage settlements. The Chancellor did not seem to go as far as admitting explicitly that that was the problem.

As to the underlying considerations, the way in which it is assumed that the velocity of circulation of currency — however one likes to define the currency — will continue its recent trend is also worrying. This may be a dangerous assumption. It is possible that we could foresee other factors that would alter that situation. If so, the frozen glacier of liquidity again might create serious problems.

Turning to examine why interest rates internationally are high, I think that it is once more the combination of interest rates and exchange rates. There is cause for concern because the danger is that the high interest rates deter investment. On the other hand, if the real interest rates begin to fall, we may find that all those who meanwhile put the liquidity into interest-bearing assets suddenly decide that the thing to do now is to go out and spend the liquidity because the attraction of those interest-bearing assets has declined in real terms. All this is worrying.

Mr. Butterfill: My right hon. Friend expressed concern about investment. Does he not agree that there has been a very satisfactory growth of domestic investment —up 8 per cent. last year—and inward investment from overseas, which is remarkable in the circumstances?

Mr. Higgins: On the second point, I welcome both inward investment and investment overseas by the United Kingdom. I have always been mystified by the way that the Labour party is opposed to its going in either direction.

As to the prospects for investment, my hon. Friend must look at the Red Book, and he will see that much of the increased investment has been due to tax changes introduced in a previous Budget in regard to investment allowances and corporation tax. The investment figure for the end of the period covered by the Red Book is not, I think, a very happy one.

I deal now with the main point that I wish to make in regard to the external situation where clearly interest rates are being affected by exchange rates. We have to look at the difference between the dollar exchange rate and the relationship of the sterling exchange rate to exchange rates elsewhere, in particular in Europe. To the broad extent that it is true that we buy in dollars and sell in deutschmarks, we can welcome the change in differential rates in the last year, which is quite remarkable. Because policy has become so opaque — and M3 that used to be the cornerstone of the whole thing was first discarded completely and then reintroduced for only one year, and it is a very strange thing to have a strategy that lasts only one year—and given that that change has taken place, it seems increasingly to be a policy that turns on the exchange rate.

I think we are in some danger of getting the worst of both worlds. Some people have said recently that the way in which one can best deal with the problem is in effect to pretend that we have joined the exchange rate mechanism of the EMS without actually doing so, thereby getting the best of both worlds. I think there is some danger that we will get the worst of both worlds. Unless the band, range or target for the exchange rate is made explicit, there is considerable uncertainty about what the policy really is. The Chancellor has been reluctant to spell out any such range, indeed, to the extent of constantly repeating that he has no such range in mind.

It seems to me that the arguments for the EMS, the exchange rate mechanism and our joining it have improved in the last six to nine months simply because the relationship with the deutschmark is now much more favourable than it was. I think there is a widespread view, not least in the City, that if we were to join, which would be a clear commitment to stay within that range, there would be a considerable flow of funds into the country, in particular from Germany, because people would think that the uncertainty had been removed and the interest rate differential was still very large. If we had that inflow of funds, in my view it is possible that we would find that we could reduce our interest rates by 1 per cent., 1·5 per cent. or even 2 per cent., thereby narrowing the differential significantly to the great advantage of those who wish to invest in industry.

While there are still doubts, as the hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne mentioned, with regard to the problem of there being a bi-polar system if we joined, since sterling and the deutschmark would be the dominant currencies, I am increasingly of the view that, if we were to join, there would be some advantage. I am not convinced by some of the arguments put forward by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to the effect that it was a good thing that we did not join some time ago. The fact that it is not worth buying something at a high price does not mean that it is not worth buying something at a much lower price. I think that the exchange rate relativities have improved considerably in recent months.

I wish to give a word of caution on some wider issues. This time last year we discussed at length the dangers of a hard landing for the dollar, in the sense that a sudden collapse of the dollar might mean that interests rates would have to be raised which would cause a major recession in the world with the attendant problems for debtor countries, and so on. I am still worried about that, despite the change that has taken place in the dollar exchange rate over the past year.

More particularly, I am worried about the continued budget deficit in the United States, and about the fact that no real progress has been made in reducing it so that the Federal Reserve bank is still inclined to keep interest rates high to fund it. In turn, that produces a high exchange rate for the dollar, which produces a balance of payments problem. That is still overhanging the situation, and the overall effect is difficult for those debtor countries that are adversely affected, despite the fall in the oil price. There is still a real danger of default, which I hope that the Baker initiatives will do something to help.

Finally, I am worried by the effect of the banking system, particularly in the United States, on agriculture. In that context, many people in the United States who went into farming, perhaps not long ago, and borrowed money, now find themselves, in the light of changed circumstances, with assets worth less than the money that they borrowed. They are voting with their feet and are leaving everything standing.

The oil price, the international debt, the agricultural situation, the dangers to the United States banking system, and in turn, the repercussions that it will have on us, give considerable cause for concern. That will be exacerbated if a trade war develops between the EEC and the system of American agricultural support. That is a real danger that should be given close attention by my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench, and in particular those in the Treasury.

Having said all that, the Budget, as the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service reports is broadly on the right lines, given the economic situation, although I have considerable concern as to the future stability of the system. By and large, I welcome the Bill, which has many specific proposals that are likely to be beneficial not only in my constituency, but across the country.

Mr. Michael Cocks (Bristol, South): This is the first time that I have had the temerity to trespass into a debate on the Finance Bill. Although I am a former Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury, the House will know that all that is required in that job is a vestigial knowledge of arithmetic. Perhaps the House will be lenient with this first offering.

The Government have made a great deal of the help that is given to charities. It is a pity that their generosity did not extend to other sectors, and make changes that would not have meant much more expense. The first is VAT on headstones for internments and other parts of the necessary funeral expenses, such as flowers and refreshments. The second is the imposition of VAT on sanitary wear for women—something that has always nonplussed me. It is anomalous, because it is a physiological toss of the coin as to which sex we are, so it is wrong to penalise women. Both those sectors need to be changed.

One of the main features of the Budget for my constituency is the swingeing increase in the tax on cigarettes. I understand the pressures put on the Chancellor to impose an increase, but even if those who are out to destroy the tobacco industry eventually do so, the Chancellor, or whoever is Chancellor in future, must not think that that is the end of the story. There are signs already that the same people, or similarly motivated people, are preparing to launch a heavy attack on the alcohol industry. We are already beginning to get calls for a swingeing increase in duties on alcohol, to minimise the risk of cirrhosis of the liver and other alcohol-related diseases. While there is no increase in alcohol duties on the same scale as on cigarettes, the Government should beware of the pressure that will build up—pressure that may be misjudged.

There is a side effect to what the Government have done that may be of interest, and perhaps the Government will give some consideration to this. I have been contacted by a number of tobacconist-newsagents in my constituency. Following the Budget they had a letter from their proprietor, Kiosks, saying that, because of the size of the increase in the duty on cigarettes, their contracts would be renegotiated to reduce the commission on which they work. The letter says:

"it must be clearly understood that the Company makes no profit whatsoever from this additional duty levied by the Chancellor and under the circumstances it simply cannot absorb the commission element."

A number of petitions against the increase in the tax have been collected by tobacconists, but those collecting the signatures had little thought that their own livelihood would be eroded by the company that owns the chain. Perhaps the Government will give some thought to that. I have written to the company about this. That was over a fortnight ago. I have not yet had the courtesy of a reply, so I feel that I am entitled to raise the matter.

A similar squeeze is being put on the landlords of pubs in Bristol. Courage, the brewer, is seeking to take a bigger share of fruit machine profits. The point about the example is that the Government say that they wish to help small business men. However, the larger companies can get away with much, but the small people who work for them suffer. I ask the Government to show more imagination.

For example, one small measure—adjustments to the luncheon voucher scheme—would help small firms that do not have large subsidised canteens. That scheme was introduced over 40 years ago. The Government recognised the worth of the scheme, and the 3s. a day tax allowance was brought into force. At that time, one could buy a decent feed, particularly in the British Restaurants, for 3s. The equivalent, 15p, which is still the allowance, certainly will not. I think that the tax allowance should be increased so that small business men can give their employees the same benefits as those enjoyed by people who work for large firms, or those who eat in directors' dining rooms.

The Chief Secretary has already mentioned the levy on goods produced by the entertainment industry and sold abroad. Here we detect the clammy hand of the Treasury at work. Only two days ago, I received a letter from the new chairman of HTV, Mr. G. E. McWatters, informing me that the company had been granted the Queen's award for export achievement. He went on:

"It seems somewhat sad that the Treasury has recently seen fit to penalise these export activities by a change in the levy arrangements. We do provide a lot of employment in the West Country and hope to expand still further."

That company is being penalised for exporting.

The Budget seems to be more geared to the 27 million in work than to the 4 million out of work, and it does not tackle the basic problems of the economy. During the debate on the Gracious Speech on 12 November I spoke about the erosion of the British manufacturing base over a long period of time and under successive Governments.

I should like to deal with the Government's over-reliance on income from invisible earnings. Yesterday my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) spoke about the decline of British shipping and the Merchant Navy. In a similar debate a few weeks ago the right hon. Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) said that our invisible earnings had declined by £2,000 million a year because of the decline of the British merchant shipping fleet.

We rely on tourism. The recently circulated magazine of the British Tourist Authority said that last year 3 million Americans came to this country and spent about £1,600 million. This year there has already been a drop in the number of Americans booking visits here because of the change in the dollar-sterling rate and, much more recently, because of the situation between the United States and Libya. It is worth reminding ourselves that millions of Americans came here during the war not as tourists, but to work with us to throw back the tide of Fascism which lapped across Europe. I am pleased to add that to my remarks. I hope that the present feelings in this country about the United States are temporary and are not shared by many of my constituents.

The two areas of invisible earnings are subject to variables which are so liable to change that the Government should not rely on them. They should concentrate much more on building up the British manufacturing base. The long-term decline in our share of world markets has been categorised. The Confederation of British Industry recently produced figures showing that there was a drop of 16 per cent. in the early 1960s, to less than 8 per cent. now. Each percentage drop in our share of world markets represents about 250,000 jobs. If we take with that the growth of import penetration, where each percentage point represents about 75,000 jobs, I think we have an explanation for the tremendous increase in unemployment in recent years.

During the course of my remarks on 12 November, I said that we should concentrate more on a "Buy British" campaign. I gave an example of somebody buying a Metro or a Maestro with 95 per cent. British content as opposed to a foreign car, saving the Exchequer about £1,000 in benefit payments, because it represents two months work for one British worker. Recently, when the Government announced the placing of an order with Cammell Laird they said that the order represented 2,000 jobs over two years. If buying British is analysed in that way, it should be much easier to persuade people to buy British in order to preserve and create British jobs.

We must use our reservoir of equipment, labour and skills to develop a robust manufacturing base and free ourselves from over-reliance on invisible earnings, which are subject to external variables beyond our control. We should give up blaming the work force. We should overhaul our management techniques, learn from other people and become much more competitive.

The Budget does not measure up to the job required. It is not sufficiently drastic. It does not give us the national catharsis that we require. It really only tinkers with the problem. The situation should be taken by the scruff of the neck. It has been done before. It was done in the post-war period by the 1945 Clement Attlee Government. Millions of people were demobilised from the forces without any large scale unemployment. The economy was changed from a war-time to a peace-time footing without disruption. Although our major utilities had been run on a care and maintenance basis, the country was put back on its feet in a remarkably short period. That is the effort of which the British people are capable. That is the sort of effort that we need, but it is not the sort of effort that the Finance Bill will encourage.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): It is always a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member from Bristol, South (Mr. Cocks) especially when he takes the House into the interesting byways of tombstones and tobacco. As somebody who is actively engaged in the campaign against smoking, I believe their there may be some small connection between those two items. But let that pass.

I intend to do something rather unusual in this debate. I shall try to address the burden of my remarks to the Bill. I realise that it is common for the debate to range widely, and I do not criticise that. However, I believe that it is important that my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench should hear at least some views on the substance of the Bill as well as a general tour d'horizon of the economy, national or global. I take it as read that a number of satisfactory points about the economy have been well made by my right hon. and hon. Friends and I shall not repeat them.

I wish to devote the brunt of my remarks to three aspects of the Bill in which I am especially interested and which I think are especially valuable. Clause 15 sets out the income tax rates and main reliefs. that is obviously a welcome part of the Bill in the sense that any cut in the standard rate is a good thing. It is also welcome because it should be seen in the context of a broader move towards a standard rate of perhaps 25p in the pound by the end of this Parliament.

Even if we reach that state of nirvana, which will be difficult to achieve because of the cost, I believe that the more important strategic objective for income tax is to achieve a gentler tax gradient from an entry point of, say, 25p in the pound to a maximum rate of 50p in the pound, instead of the present disincentive pattern of income tax. As the House will know, one enters at 29 per cent. and there is then an incredible 11 per cent. leap to 40 per cent., then 45 per cent., 50 per cent., 55 per cent. and 60 per cent. That means that millions of income taxpayers are faced with the equivalent of an income tax cliff which, coupled with the impact of national insurance contributions on employees, is clearly having harmful effects. If one wants to adduce arguments about the disincentive effects of taxation, one need look no further than that unfortunate profile in our income tax system.

I have made a few inquiries about the cost to the Treasury and the Exchequer of seeking to ameliorate or overcome some of the problems I have identified. I remind the House that on latest estimates it would cost about £1,800 million in income tax yield forgone to abolish all the higher rates of income tax. That would be equivalent to getting rid of only about 5 per cent. of total income tax receipts. I am not saying that should be the policy, but I am putting those facts on record simply to remind hon. Members that we have higher rates of tax, even as they stand now, largely for political, social and redistributive purposes, not really for revenue-raising purposes to any serious extent.

If one wants an even more significant figure, it would cost about £7,000 million in a full year to change from the present profile of income tax — the cliff to which I referred—to a gentler and more sensible gradient which is what I and many of my hon. Friends would prefer. The reason is that so much of this cost comes from the standard rate band which, as the House knows, is where the bulk of the revenue is raised. Therefore, if one were to make the transition which I am advocating, it would be sensible to phase it in over several years. The argument that this is completely beyond the pale no longer stands up when one regards it as a project to be conducted over, say, three years. A sum of £7,000 million taken in three stages over three years does not seem excessive.

Furthermore, the argument that it is administratively too complex to move into a new six-band structure does not hold up because we already have a six-band structure. The only thing wrong with it is that its shape is wrong. By the time those changes were feasible, they would be contemporaneous with the introduction of computers into the Inland Revenue. I would like that change to be made.

I hope that the Whip present will note that it would be a good idea to have a further separate debate on personal tax reform in which the House could discuss all these issues.

Clauses 21 to 25 make improved provision for employee shareholdings. I welcome this latest instalment of the general move which the Government have made in that direction, which was already evident in the Finance Acts of 1978, 1980 and 1984. Now is the time for the Government to go much further with larger tax incentives to give what the Chancellor describes as a bigger kick-start to an excellent development that has been in motion under Governments of both parties.

It has become imperative to take a more radial approach to this area for several reasons. First, wider employee share ownership in all its forms leads to improved corporate performance and there is plenty of evidence from the National Freight Consortium, from the John Lewis Partnership and from the United States to support my contention. Secondly, the schemes can encourage a more sensible attitude towards pay at a time when unit labour costs are still one of the major problems of the economy and are increasing far too fast for the national good.

In that connection, there is a close correlation between the ideas which are being supported in these clauses and the slightly more speculative ideas of Professor Weitzmann on revenue sharing, which the Chancellor intends to discuss in the National Economic Development Council and elsewhere. I wish him well with that consultation process. I hope that it leads to early legislation in the next Session.

The third reason why this is such a good direction of policy is that it is manifestly popular with employees and, therefore, encourages more positive attitudes, which will help to overcome the age-old problems of "them and us", which have been so well identified in a recent Stockton lecture by my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Employment. It is encouraging to see that tax-exempt, all-employee share schemes have increased from a mere 30 in 1979 to more than 1,000 today. I hope that development will be encouraged further.

Finally, the schemes are an excellent development because wider and deeper employee ownership has external benefits for the nation as well as some small risks for the employees, since they must put many of their eggs in one basket. In view of the extra risk for the employees concerned, there is a strong case in natural justice for more generous tax incentives. That strengthens the argument for what the Government are trying to do in these clauses. These tax incentives need not be built permanently into our fiscal system. They could be time-limited for the companies and individuals involved. But once the habits of wider share ownership become established, the process will grow naturally and spontaneously for the benefit of the entire economy.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor should heed the warning set out recently in a leader in The Times that his welcome experiment with the personal equity plan should not be allowed to divert our attention, or indeed available resources, from the need to go further to encourage employee share ownership. There is always a danger of the idea of employee share ownership being seen as a perk for senior management and not much more, so I agree with the Wider Share Ownership Council that tax relief for executive share schemes should be conditional on the company's running a scheme for all its employees. That is the right approach to overcome the possibility of "them and us" problems rearing their head again.

I am very much in favour of clauses 26 to 31 providing an attractive package of encouragement for charities and charitable donations. That was an excellent part of the Budget because it recognised in a way which everyone will appreciate the range of good work done by charities and voluntary organisations. In the longer term, it is also important because if the Chancellor is thinking, however gently, of moving away from the holy grail of fiscal neutrality, which in our tax system seems almost impossible, it opens greater opportunities for donations to higher education. I was struck recently by a letter that was sent to me and, I suspect, to other hon. Members who may sit on the Finance Bill Committee, from Birkbeck college in the university of London stating:

> "There is a precedent for tax relief: membership of professional and learned societies already qualifies. Our suggestion is, therefore, that fees and other costs incurred as a consequence of part-time study should be tax-deductible."

Bearing in mind the Government's strategy on adult training and retraining and on the need to invest in human capital, which is what further and higher education is about, that is a point—albeit a small one—worthy of my right hon. Friend's consideration. If we could supplement a healthy volume of public support for higher education by tapping some of the private support which could be released by such fiscal mechanisms, we should do a service not only to the individuals concerned but to the country.

This has been a prudent Budget, which has produced a sound Finance Bill. It contains some interesting and imaginative components which bode well for the future, provided that they are followed through and not regarded as a one-off exercise. In two areas especially, the Finance Bill should be seen as part of a much longer-term policy. The first is personal tax reform, which we must approach in terms that involve more than playing around with personal tax allowances, important though they are. Personal tax reform should be considered much more widely. We do not get more than one chance in a generation to reform such matters.

The second area is the encouragement of worker capitalism, with much greater extension of the interest and involvement of employees in their firms, which must be to their benefit and, much more importantly in the long run, to the benefit of the economy.

Mr. Sean Hughes (Knowsley, South): My right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) described the Finance Bill as irrelevant. Those of us who represent constituencies blighted by unemployment will bear testimony to that description. I shall address my few remarks to the glaring omission in the Budget and the subsequent Finance Bill of anything which might begin to tackle the massive unemployment problems.

We should judge the Finance Bill in the context of almost seven years of Conservative Government. They have introduced eight Budgets and eight Finance Bills. In view of their 1979 election slogan "Labour isn't working", we have the right to judge the Finance Bill in the light of promises and performance.

I remind the House what the promises were. In June 1979, we had the Government's first Budget. The former Chancellor of the Exchequer declared:

"The Budget is designed to give the British people a greater opportunity than they have had for years to win a higher standard of living—for their country and for their families."—[Official Report, 12 June 1979; Vol. 968, c. 263.]

Twelve months later unemployment had risen to 1,375,600. Still, we must give new Governments a chance. Historically, every Chancellor has found the economy in far worse a state than he believed before the election. So the Government, so concerned with unemployment before they took office, had to be given time to prove they meant what they had promised.

In his second Budget on 26 March 1980, the then Chancellor declared that the strategy of the Government was "the best foundation for higher growth, fuller employment and a return to rising living standards."—[Official Report, 26 March 1980; Vol. 981, c. 1451.]

Twelve months later unemployment had risen to 2,333,500.

Perhaps it was to be third time lucky. In his Budget introduced on 10 March 1981, the then Chancellor stated that the Budget would "help redress the balance of the economy in favour of business and industry."—[Official Report, 10 March 1981; Vol. 1000, c. 783.]

Most of us thought that that would mean jobs. However, 12 months later unemployment had risen to more than 2,800,000.

By the time of the fourth Budget on 9 March 1982, we had all become a little sceptical about Budget claims. However, the then Chancellor made a promise early in his Budget statement that it would be "a budget for industry—and so a Budget for jobs."

Raising himself to unaccustomed heights of oratory, he concluded that the Budget anticipated

"a better prospect of employment opportunities for those who look only for the chance to work."—[Official Report, 9 March 1982; Vol. 19, c. 727-57.]

Twelve months later, unemployment had passed the 3 million mark.

The fifth Budget, introduced on 15 March 1983 turned out to be full of election promise. In what was to be his last Budget statement, the then Chancellor concluded that it was

"a Budget for the family, a Budget for enterprise and, most of all, a Budget for Britain's continuing recovery."—[Official Report, 15 March 1983; Vol. 39, c. 157.]

Twelve months after that the unemployment figures would have reached more than 3,333,000 had the Government not removed unemployed men between the ages of 60 and 64 from the unemployment figures.

The present Chancellor of the Exchequer continued the delusion of recovery in the Government's sixth Budget on 13 March 1984. He claimed that there was an economic recovery

"whose underlying strength is now beyond dispute".—[Official Report, 13 March 1984; Vol. 56, c. 286.]

Twelve months later, even after fiddling the figures, unemployment had still reached 3,267,000.

In the Government's seventh Budget, in 1985, the Chancellor intoned:

"There can be no disputing the strength and durability of the economic upsurge."—[Official Report, 19 March 1985; Vol. 75, c. 784.]

Scaling new heights of lunacy, the Chancellor declared that the Budget was "a Budget for jobs". Twelve months later, the by now notoriously fiddled unemployment figure had reached 3,323,800.

What then are we to make of the Chancellor's remark in the Government's eighth Budget last month? He said that it was a Budget which was "a safeguard for the present and a springboard for the future."—[Official Report, 18 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 184.]

Which chapter of the Finance Bill, which clause, which of its 200 pages, gives any reason to believe that the optimism is justified this time and that the Government mean what they say?

The Finance Bill is perhaps the most important legislation to be considered by Parliament. It must not be allowed to ignore the single most important problem which the economy faces—the problem of massive unemployment. I am not one of those who believe, or indeed would want, the Government to interfere in every aspect of our lives. I do not argue that Governments can be the sole regulator of economic forces. However, I firmly believe that the Government set the tone, and create the atmosphere. The Finance Bill we are discussing tonight certainly does that.

The Finance Bill sets the atmosphere and the tone, for example, with the reduction of stamp duty on share transactions. The Chancellor took great pride in the fact that next year, an adult will be able to invest up to £200 a month in shares. But what relevance does that have to someone living on £30·45 a week unemployment pay, £29·50 a week supplementary benefit, or £38·30 a week old age pension? People on those incomes have as much chance of investing £200 a month as the England cricket team has of scoring 200 runs in the West Indies. The irrelevance which takes most beating is the provision to abolish entirely the tax on lifetime gifts to individuals. That really set things alight in my constituency.

As I listened to the Chancellor outlining the proposals about lifetime gifts, and the subsequent comments today, I was reminded of the reaction to William Harcourt's death duties when they failed to produce the revenue which had been anticipated. People, it was said, were not dying up to expectations.

The unemployed are wondering whether they figure at all in the Government's expectations. As I listened to the Chancellor and to his hon. Friends, I was confirmed in the belief that he and I occupy different worlds. How else could he justify such an appallingly irrelevant Finance Bill? I would like to tell the House of the reality of my world. In my constituency last month 10,292 people were registered as unemployed and there were 167 vacancies at the jobcentre. There were 707 18-year-olds or younger who had never worked since leaving school and three vacancies at the careers office. The insensitivity of the Government Front Bench is no more than we have come to expect. They flaunt their insensitivity; they do not try to hide it; they glory in it. Like the Edwardian publication The Queen, they proclaim:

"It is the fashion today to talk of social duty and the right to live, but nobody has the courage to say that we belong to different worlds."

The Government certainly have the courage to say that, and that forms the very basis of their policy. That is why the Budget and the Finance Bill are so irrelevant to our real problems.

8.8 pm

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): With all the talk of reshuffles, and as a person of modest ambition, I naturally turned my mind recently to the problem of how to get on in the Tory party, and I have taken advice from where it was available. One piece of advice that I received was that one should acquire a nodding acquaintance with the works of the late Mr. Disraeli. Having delved into Mr. Disraeli's novels on the Young England and on the theme of Two Nations, I must admit that I find those novels more entertaining than the exercises in fiction on the same theme by my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine).

When reading the novel "Sybil", I encountered a character who reminded me very much of the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley). Appropriately enough, that character was called Mr. Kremlin, who was "distinguished for his ignorance as he had only one idea and that was wrong." The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook has one idea, which is that the cure for all our ills is higher Government spending. Although the right hon. Gentleman tries to wriggle out and deny the fact, we all know that the Labour party's plans for increased spending, which were costed and appeared in the Official Report on 3 March, amount to £24 billion.

When the right hon. Gentleman is asked how that cost would be financed, like a fish landed on the ground out of water, he flaps, gasps and puffs out his gills, but he cannot come up with a convincing riposte or explanation. He fails to explain how the Labour party would encourage investment by taxing at penal rates. I suppose that the right hon. Gentleman is following the illogicality of the previous Labour Government, who, at a time of rising unemployment, attempted to reduce it by putting a tax on jobs. Of course, the Government have abolished that in the course of the past eight years. That was one of the features of the Government's financial policy to which the hon. Member for Knowsley, South (Mr. Hughes) did not feel it necessary to allude.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook also failed to explain how he would encourage enterprise and attract managerial ability through the Labour party's proposal for the confiscation of earnings. It was clear from his speech that, if the country has the misfortune to return a Labour Government at the next election, we will be back once again to a 98 per cent. marginal rate of income tax.

The right hon. Gentleman defined the rich as the top 5 per cent. of earners and the right hon. Gentleman's proposals would cover everyone with a taxable income of £16,000 or more per annum. I am not sure whether they are people whom ordinary people would consider to be rich. There are people of relatively modest means who come into that category. The right hon. Gentleman completely failed to tell us how the national income will be increased by supporting Luddite trade union policies, be it Scargillism or that which we find in Fleet street or Wapping.

Lastly, the right hon. Gentleman failed to explain how he will reduce unemployment by increasing taxes and interest rates. Inflation would be the inevitable consequence of those policies.

The policies of the right hon. Gentleman are followed, albeit at a distance, by those who sit on the alliance Benches, although quite whom they have followed at the moment I do not know, because none of them are in the Chamber. Recently I have devoted—I admit that it was a somewhat unrewarding pursuit—some attention to the alliance documents on its economic and financial policies, in particular its Budget recommendations for this year. The document is called "Jobs and Competitiveness." I have found a number of interesting points in that document, about which the House and the nation ought to know. It contains a number of false premises. The document says that Britain is becoming a "low growth, low productivity, low skill economy."

I had to look once again at the date of the document, because I thought that it might refer not to 1986 but to 1976 under the Labour Government of which all the leaders of the Social Democratic party, although they would like us to forget it now, were enthusiastic members. The contrast is most instructive.

In his Budget speech my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer pointed to this Government's record. The growth rate is relatively high and productivity is increasing. There have been five years of growth at 3 per cent. per annum. That growth rate was exceeded in 1985. Then the growth rate was 3·5 per cent. per annum. It was the highest growth rate in the EEC, and it was higher even than in the United States.

As for low productivity, compared with the period between 1974 and 1979 when manufacturing productivity rose by less than 1 per cent. per annum and when it was the lowest of all the G5 nations, that has been increased in the last six years to 3·5 per cent. per annum. We are second only to Japan. As for the manufacturing sector, about which there is so much misinformation, in 1985 output increased by 3 per cent., productivity increased by 4 per cent. and exports increased by 6 per cent. That is a creditable achievement. It is the result of seven years of sound financial discipline.

I contrast the alliance Budget representations for this year with what it said in its autumn statement entitled "Facing the jobs challenge." It has two plans to reduce unemployment and increase economic activity. According to its latest document, the alliance proposes to spend an additional £3·5 billion to reduce unemployment by 750,000 over the next three years. Six months ago, it proposed to spend £5 billion to reduce unemployment by 1·5 million over four years. One might ask why the alliance is being so modest and moderate in its demands. According to the latest calculations, why not spend £10 billion to reduce unemployment by 2 million or indeed, £15 billion to reduce unemployment to zero?

One might ask why this inflation in the cost of reducing unemployment has occurred during the last six months. In September 1985 the alliance calculated that it would cost £3,300 per job to reduce unemployment over four years, but in March 1986 it calculated that cost at £4,650 per job over three years. It is a great shame that nobody is sitting on the alliance Benches to explain why this arithmetical invention is as it is.

How would all this be financed? The alliance says that it will not increase taxation and that it will be financed by borrowing. How will the borrowing take place? Will the alliance borrow from the public? That would merely divert resources from other productive uses. All it would do, therefore, is to shuffle unemployment around different sectors of the economy.

Would the alliance borrow from abroad? If so, it is a belated convert to Reaganomics, about which it is so scathing, although that is exactly the policy that has been adopted in recent years by the United States, which sustains the United States' artificially high rate of economic activity at the cost of that of western Europe. That has implications for interest rates and the exchange rate. It also assumes no loss of international confidence, despite the new laxity in borrowing that its policies would entail.

Lastly, would the alliance borrow from the banks? If so, the consequence would be that inflation would be bound to increase. It is evident that the alliance is not satisfied with the levels of debt interest that we are paying at the moment—£19 billion a year out of £170 billion of public expenditure. That now accounts for over half the revenue from income tax, or the whole revenue from value added tax.

There is a word to describe this kind of economics. It is Dunwoodyism: the theory that there is such a thing as a free lunch, that one can eat lunch today and that the bill will never come in at the end of the day. As my hon. Friend the Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Irving) proved in his example and as the International Monetary Fund proved during the life of the last Labour Government, there comes a time when the bills have to be paid. Therefore I counsel the alliance to profit by our experiences since the war under Governments of all political persuasions and to realise that there comes a time when the cash runs out.

In the alliance's autumn statement of last September there seemed to be a number of extraordinary muddles about what it should be doing about a monetary policy. It castigates our Government because of their supposed commitment to a failed monetarist policy, but on the same page it calls for a steady monetary policy. It says:

"An Alliance Government would keep a firm grip on the money supply."

In addition, the alliance would stabilise the exchange rate by joining the European monetary syster.., but it does not say that that would entail even greater reliance upon short-term monetary aggregates and upon interest rates, which supposedly it does not favour.

There is the same confusion about inflation. The right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) said:

"If inflation is held down, unemployment will then begin to fall. Anything less must mean that unemployment will continue to rise."—[Official Report, 29 June 1983; Vol. 44, c. 604.]

However, in this document the alliance postulates a rate of inflation, if its policies are followed, of 7·5 per cent. That means that inflation would be more than double what it is now. Before it starts to lecture my right hon. Friends in the Treasury on economic policy in order to put the country back to work, I suggest that the alliance ought to settle the muddle about the premises upon which its policies are based.

The great panjandrum for the alliance was referred to by the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth): that what will keep all these conflicting objectives in line is an incomes policy. The reason for an incomes policy was provided by the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon), who I understand is now the economic guru of the Liberal party, although he has not been present throughout the entire debate. However, as the Liberal party's economic spokesman he said at its assembly last September that we have to commit ourselves to a pay policy, otherwise all that can be said about the economy becomes fluff in the wind. Homespun economics we might expect from the hon. Gentleman, and fluff in the wind is a good description of the alliance's economic policy.

If we look in detail at its proposed incomes policy, we see how absurd and impossible it is that it could contain the inflationary forces that would be let loose if the alliance's other economic policies were to be implemented. In its Budget representations on page 7, it says that the alliance's incomes policy would cover increases in average earnings that exceeded a predetermined inflation limit. That has to be contrasted with what the alliance says in the same document on a previous page: that it would aim at moderating earnings growth and that it would relate it to growth in productivity.

The alliance has to decide what is to be the basis of its incomes policy. Is it to be productivity or inflation? What happens if productivity is greater than inflation? Are wage increases to be held down below the rate of inflation to those of productivity? One could ask the same question the other way round: what if inflation is greater than productivity? Are inflationary wage increases to be permitted, notwithstanding that they are not covered by increases in production? There is no necessary connection between productivity and profits. We know that if Jeffrey Archer sells more books, Debbie Owen makes more money. It appears to me that the alliance policy on incomes control is flawed from the start.

The alliance says that companies with profit-sharing schemes will be exempt from the policy. That is a contradictory objective, because the more successful those companies are in expanding profit sharing, the more ineffective becomes the inflation tax that the alliance proposes as an incomes policy. There are so many exemptions to the incomes policy that one wonders to whom it applies. In addition to firms with profit-sharing schemes, which cover about 5 per cent. of the working population, firms employing fewer than 100 employees will also be exempt. That represents a further 49 per cent. of the working population. Because there will be an inflationary seepage to workers in small businesses, the rest of British industry will be able to give only lower than average increases and increases lower than the average rate of inflation.

The self-employed will not be covered under the proposed scheme. New firms and people who plan to change jobs will not be covered also. The public sector, which represents 25 per cent. of workers, will be exempt from this inflation tax.

One can see the avoidance techniques that would come about if such a scheme were introduced. Techniques such as replacing cash payments by fringe benefits, new job descriptions, people being promoted artificially and changes in hours and conditions of work would prevent the incomes policy from working effectively.

What about the jobs in which productivity cannot be measured? For example, where would Members of Parliament fall in this scale? What about supply and demand in the real world? That does not feature in the alliance's policy. The alliance fails to realise that profits ultimately reflect not productivity but supply and demand, although productivity naturally feeds into it. The same applies in respect of wages.

The retail prices index, which presumably is the basis upon which the alliance would calculate the inflation limit, is itself an average. Some prices go up more than others. The average is the exception rather than the norm, as is the case with incomes. Not all incomes can or will go up by the average. Therefore, why should others not be able to go up by more than the average? Those are the questions that people faced with these decisions will have to answer, and all that will add to the the cost of the bureaucracy. The alliance has not told us how its inflation tax is to work —whether it will tax 100 per cent. of the excess over the predetermined inflation limit, or whether it will be merely a part of it.

We will return to all the palliatives and quangos that have been set up by previous Governments. Statistical necromancers will study the entrails of chickens to decide what inflation will be like in a year's time to place a predetermined straitjacket on the economy. At the end of the day, we shall get the inevitable bust-up. What happens when the quangos make mistakes, as they did in 1974 when the pay board got the calculation of miners' pay increase wrong? That torpedoed the Heath Government, but for what?

At the end of the day, the basis of the alliance's policy is to mistake the cause of inflation. Every year since the Conservative party has been in office, GDP has risen in real and monetary terms. Unfortunately, unemployment has risen also. We can derive from that that unemployment has not a macro-economic demand-related cause but a micro-economic cause to which the Government have devoted considerable attention and which the Finance Bill plays an important part in eliminating.

Instead of trying to drag us kicking and screaming back into the 1960s, as the alliance would seek to do, the Government are continuing, in an effective way, with their imaginative policies. We must base high economic activity and low unemployment on sound financial and economic policies. That is the best way in which the future prosperity of our people will be guaranteed.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I will not support the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) in his devastating attack on the alliance, which had all the power and effect of being hit around the head with a piece of wet, uncooked tripe. It is interesting that alliance Members responded in their usual tumultuous fashion by total absence, instead of the partial absence that is almost normal for the alliance.

The sad, irrelevant, Finance Bill has a couple of things in common with previous Finance Bills which have been introduced by the Government. Most of the Bills have had vainglorious titles. I remember the Budget for enterprise, which was the prelude to our cataclysmic manufacturing decline which practically turned this country into the world's first undeveloping country. Last year the Government brought down a Budget for jobs. Unemployment continued to rise to levels which this country had never seen. Quite frankly, this year's Budget has been a budget for votes, which is almost certainly a guarantee that the Conservative party will lose the next election.

There is another common pattern. Whatever the vainglorious titles of previous Budgets, each has provided a set of give-aways to wealth — a steady pattern of smuggling more money into the back pockets of wealth and power in this country. However difficult the circumstances, however great the need for sacrifice, however strenuous the ceremonising to the rest of the community, there are always five or six handouts to wealth.

There have been handouts in several forms—a fiddle here, a fudge there, a change there, a cut in the rates, an adjustment, a little trimming, some fiddle on the capital transfer tax or a rebasing of the capital gains tax. Behind the deluge of public relations words backing the Budget —the vainglorious rubbish talked about the Budget—a steady dribble of money has been given to the wealthy in the community. On our calculations, this year £3·5 billion has been provided to the top 5 per cent. or so of the wealthy. The Child Poverty Action Group has stated that the richest 7 per cent. will benefit to the tune of £2·6 billion this year as a result of direct tax cuts in the Government's Budgets. The common pattern has been vainglorious titles and a steady dribble of concessions to wealth.

The Finance Bill represents a wasted opportunity. It is the product of mountains which have laboured. It produces an interesting insight into the Chancellor's psychology, because it is the product of somebody with a tricky mind and rather nasty instincts when it comes to considering the people of this country. The Budget and the Finance Bill provided an opportunity to generate growth. We need growth.

[Mr. Austin Mitchell]

The figures cited by the hon. Member for Tatton and the Government about the Government's achievements and the growth they have secured are figures which have been supplied since 1982. It is as if the world suddenly began in 1982. The enormous disaster that the country was dragged into between 1979 and 1981 has been totally ignored. The Government achieve growth by conjuring up the figures from 1982. In fact, every year since the Government have been in power the average growth rate has been 1·2 per cent., which is pathetic. The rate is lower than the average growth rate for the previous Labour Government, which the hon. Member for Tatton castigated. That is the record of the Government. There is a desperate need for growth.

Since the Government have been in office, there has been a catyclismic rise in unemployment. The Government had enormous success in getting down the unemployment figures. The tragedy is that unemployment has continued to rise. The figures have been fiddled to indicate that the Government have got unemployment down. Since the Government have been in office, 15 adjustments have been made to the unemployment figures. Each adjustment has been an adjustment downwards. We need growth to reduce unemployment and to expand the economy.

We need the kind of expansion that President Reagan has provided in the United States, but not in the manner that the hon. Member for Tatton indicated. President Reagan's approach to the economy is to implement Keynesianism without understanding it. His answer is deficit financing. Eight million new jobs have been generated in the three years that he has undertaken deficit financing.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, South (Mr. Hughes) put it, this country had an opportunity, in the golden years, the opportunity years, to expand. Oil revenues provided that opportunity. The benefits of channelling North sea oil towards industry would allow growth, provided the pound was kept down. The Government, in the past seven years, have thrown away that opportunity. However, Sheikh Yamani has graciously condescended to provide us with another opportunity. This is Sheikh Yamani's Budget and Finance Bill. He has provided us with an opportunity through the stimulus that the fall in oil prices brings to the economy of Britain and the world. The world economy is expanding. The world faces a benign prospect. We had a chance to seize that opportunity. To do so, we needed to expand and stimulate our economy, especially with lower interest rates and by putting cheap money at the service of the people, not of the financial community—the City and the banks.

Why are Britain's interest rates practically double those of our major industrial competitors? Why are interest rates in Britain so high? The Government have had one consistent element in their policy—high interest rates. There has been a series of excuses, but there has been a pattern of high interest rates. There has been a constant series of rumours that interest rates would decrease, that there would be a drop in the mortgage rate, that the climate was favourable and that the money supply figures provided an opportunity. But interest rates have never fallen as much as we were told, because the reductions have been in terms of half a per cent. here, half a per cent. there, while the increases have been 2 per cent. or more. There has been constant pressure to keep interest rates high.

The so-called success in bringing interest rates down has been the heralding of an expected decrease, which has never quite come. It has been reduction by rumour, not in reality. Britain's interest rates have been consistently higher than necessary. Interest rates have been crucifying borrowers, home owners, people with overdrafts, local government, industry and investment. They have imposed a burden on the whole economy.

The banks, which have been the biggest barrier to enterprise, are always eager to lend to South America—indeed, to anyone overseas—and to rush into the newly industrialising countries. They irresponsibly expose themselves. It is like a flashing filigree in a flimsy farce. The banks are eager to expose themselves in an economically and commercially undersirable way. They lend reluctantly to industry, demanding an instant return — in months rather than years — while not being prepared to finance the long-term investment that Britain needs. They thrust umbrellas at people when it is sunny, but snatch them back immediately a hint of rain is seen on the horizon. The banks' record is counter-productive. They, not the nation, have been made rich by this interest rates policy.

It is interesting, as can be seen from the report of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service, that the biggest stimulus to the economy was an increase in capital spending. The parliamentary unit of the university of Warwick went through all the possible stimuli to the economy according to the London Business School model. Public spending was so important because it had the greatest and most immediate effect in reducing unemployment and stimulating growth. The second biggest stimulus was a 1 per cent. cut in interest rates. It had a greater effect than a 5 per cent. cut in income tax, a 10 per cent. increase in allowances or a 10 per cent. cut in VAT or in employers' national insurance contributions. A cut in interest rates has a greater effect in reducing unemployment than any of the other expedients.

The Government's excuses for their high interest rates have varied from time to time. When the Conservative party was elected, it told us that, until the money supply was brought under control, interest rates had to be high. That led almost immediately to the folly of 17 per cent. interest rates and the pound being worth, I believe, $2·40. That excuse was withdrawn and the public sector borrowing requirement was blamed. We were told that interest rates would remain high until the PSBR was reduced. Britain's public sector deficit is lower than that of most other countries, but interest rates have remained high. However, the excuse underpinning them has been knocked down.

For a time we were told that, because American interest rates were high, Britain's rates had to be high to follow them, but that excuse has now gone. The Government now have a new excuse: Britain's interest rates are high because we pay ourselves too much because our labour costs are increasing. The report of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service states that one of the rare points of unity between the evidence of the CBI and the TUC is that that excuse for high interest rates is wrong. The CBI stated that interest rates would be high even if labour unit costs were falling—an interesting reflection on its faith in the Government. The Select Committee concluded:

"We ourselves have difficulty in following the mechanism by which high interest rates will produce lower wage increases. Part of the confusion arises because government statements do not always distinguish clearly between cost-push inflation and demand-pull inflation."

That is just another excuse in a long series of exploded excuses. The reality is that interest rates are high and the Government's excuses for that reality have changed. Interest rates are high to keep the value of the pound high. A high-value pound is the Government's only effective weapon against inflation. Indeed, it is their only weapon. They say that they will keep inflation down by keeping the cost of imported manufactured goods as low as they can through an overvalued pound. In other words, they say that they will let industry, which must compete with those imports, carry the consequences of the Government's inflationary strategy. That is an inflationary strategy of placing a pistol directly at the head of industry.

High interest rates are a double blow to industry. They cut investment and channel industry's money and profit into the frenzy of takeover and speculation that is occurring in London and all over Britain. It is similar to the last days of the Roman empire. The Government are not doing anything for the long term. Firms are merely going in for tribal cannibalism on an enormous scale. That is the first burden of high interest rates. The second burden is an overvalued exchange rate, which effectively subsidises imports and penalises exports. Our exchange rate is substantially overvalued. That is the only justification one can see for high interest rates, or that is what the Government think.

The Government have no strategy on inflation, except for sermons. It is no use preaching at industry to keep its labour costs down and to stop wage increases, because an industry that is competing with overseas firms has to pay to attract skills, to keep its labour force and to keep that labour force working. Sermons are of no use in the face of such pressure. Companies awash with cash can pay without those difficulties, because they set the market rate.

When directors and top management lavish so much money on themselves, as we have seen in the recent massive pay increases, it is indecent and obscene for them to demand that the rest of the people should hold their salaries at their present rate or accept cuts. They cannot preach with one voice and accept more money in the back pocket, as they have done, with any semblance of morality. There is also the hypocrisy of the Chancellor. Demand is predicated in the forecasts on consumption—consumption sustained by the wage increases that the Chancellor condemns with his other voice.

Costs in the United Kingdom are increasing faster than those in competing countries. Inflation in Britain is higher than in competing countries. I gather that Germany and Japan have enjoyed negative inflation. We should be seizing the opportunity provided by low oil prices, not limping behind the rest of the world and getting less benefit from the growth that is to come. We are limping behind because we are penalising ourselves with high interest rates and an overvalued currency. We are a limping, lame bulldog. We do not even have a licence to bite now, and we are lagging behind the advanced world. The Finance Bill fails to take advantage of the opportunity to escape from that. The Bill is also irrelevant to that need and to the purposes of a better society. The Finance Bill, in this difficult time, insists on handing out more and more to those who have more of it.

The Government are in a trap. We shall try to restore the social justice which has been missing from the Finance Bill. The Chancellor discussed the costs of the inflationary pressure of expansion, but he must bear in mind the cost of running the economy for discipline. We should never forget the damage which has been done by that discipline, nor the horrendous cost in terms of high unemployment and keeping people out of work. The present state of affairs is that Government spending is being cut because of the huge burden of unemployment. That is the result of the economic policies of the Chancellor and his predecessor. The infrastructure is crumbling. It should provide work for the unemployed, but we cannot afford to employ the unemployed to do the work which obviously exists because of the cost of keeping them unemployed.

It is the economics of bedlam and lunancy. The Budget is a wasted opportunity. It does not take up the challenge of expansion or seize the opportunities which lie ahead. It does nothing to ease the position of those who have been forced into unemployment, forced on to supplementary benefit or forced into poverty by the failure of the Chancellor's economic policies. The Government are not fiddling while Britain burns, but fiddling the figures while Britain sinks.

Mr. John Watts (Slough): The hon. Members for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) and for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) have in common an attachment to old-fashioned Keynesian economics plus a less attractive national characteristic, an unlimited capacity for national self-denigration. Their choice of statistics presented the performance of the British economy in the worst possible light. They utterly refused to recognise the realities of the achievements of the medium-term financial strategy—low inflation, sustained growth, rising living standards and a rise in employment.

The alliance conducts this orgy of denigration from a position of smug and cosy affluence. That is the epitome of the alliance person—those who have forsaken wife-swapping for fiscal flagellation with their masochistic opposition to reductions in income tax.

The Budget and the Finance Bill show that mixture of ingenuity and imagination which we have come to expect from my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. That is especially true of the package of measures which relate to small business and charities. I shall concentrate my remarks on those two aspects.

I welcome the decision to make the business expansion scheme permanent. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary set out, in his opening speech, the success of that scheme. That success is clearly recorded in the report prepared by Peat Marwick Mitchell. It has enabled small companies to raise risk capital. Amounts of less that £50,000 were raised by over half of the companies which took advantage of the scheme. The decision to make that scheme permanent underlines our determination to maintain a framework in which small companies can be formed and grow.

The extension of the loan guarantee scheme for a further three years provides loan capital for further expansion and that is welcome. In the past there has been a criticism of the level of premium charged and I am especially pleased to see a cut in the premium from 5 to 2·5 per cent. I hope that in a future Budget it will be announced that this scheme is also to become a permanent part of the armoury of measures to assist small and medium-sized companies. The reduction in the small companies' rate of corporation tax to 29 per cent.—my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary reminded us that it was 42 per cent. under the Labour Government—is a further measure that will assist the small company to continue to grow in profitability.

Therefore we have provided for the four ages of the small company — conceived by the entrepreneur, nurtured with risk capital under the business expansion scheme, funded through its adolescence by loan capital under the loan guarantee scheme and arriving at profitable maturity where not too much of its profit—certainly not as much as previously—will be taken away in taxation. There will be more retained profit to fund further growth.

The fifth age of the small business and, especially the family business, posed the greatest problems. There are an array of measures to help small businesses to become established and grow. However, family businesses, in their maturity, faced a severe dilemma because of the pernicious impact of the capital transfer tax. This tax made it difficult, if not impossible, for the business to be passed on to the next generation of owners and managers.

The abolition of capital transfer tax on lifetime gifts will be of great assistance to facilitate the orderly handover of ownership of a family business from one generation to another. The performance of family businesses, both in their investment record and in their return on capital, illustrates the desirability of finding the means by which they may remain in family control and not be forced by fiscal reasons to be floated or taken over by a conglomerate.

The measures contained in the Finance Bill provide a well-structured fiscal and financial framework to promote small businesses and their growth. However there remains a serious gap in the strategy. Many of the small and medium-sized businesses in my constituency do not look to the Government for handouts of taxpayers' money to support their growth. However, they are looking for more access to greater markets. The Government's expenditure on the purchase of goods and services for the current year will total £34·1 billion. Potentially that is a large market and one to which small and medium-sized businesses must have greater access.

To ascertain the extent to which Government procurement was providing contracts for small businesses I tabled a series of questions to the major Departments of State. I was disturbed to discover that the Ministry of Defence alone was able to give an adequate answer to a fairly simple question: "What is the value and what proportion of your expenditure on the purchase of goods and services provide contracts for small businesses?" With the exception of the Ministry of Defence the Departments replied that they did not keep records in a form which would enable them to answer the question.

The Department of Health and Social Security has £8·8 billion to spend, the Department of Transport has £2·4 billion to spend, the Department for Education and Science £2·3 billion. The Department of Education and Science did say that it intended, from next year, to maintain records which would enable it to identify its contribution to small businesses. Even the Department of Employment, with its responsibility for the small business sector, was unable to do any better than provide the estimate that perhaps 10 per cent. of its purchasing was directed to small businesses.

This inability to identify the extent to which contracts are placed with small businesses suggests a lack of awareness of the need to take account of the needs of small businesses when determining Government purchasing policy. Until this deficiency is remedied a major gap will remain in our strategy for encouraging the development of small and medium-sized businesses.

The scathing and dismissive tone of the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) concerning the impressive and imaginative measures to assist charities came ill from someone who was a member of a Government who did nothing to aid charities. Far from being a package designed in a desperate attempt to find something popular for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor to do—both the Bill and the Budget contained many other popular measures—it is but a continuation of the steady progress made in improving the tax environment for charities. First, there was the shortening of the term for covenants to four years. Then there was the restoration of higher rate tax relief within limits that will be abolished by this Bill. The sweeping reforms in the Bill place charities in the best position ever to obtain financial support from individuals and companies.

Like my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) I believe that the payroll deduction scheme and the new arrangements for one-off gifts by non-close companies will prove to be especially valuable in providing opportunities for local charities to get support from local companies and their employees. Shortly I will be meeting the chairman of the Slough council for voluntary service to discuss how we can get together to ensure that charities in my constituency benefit to the maximum from this very generous reform of tax law for charities. Because of the imaginative and beneficial measures to which I have referred, and the others which time prevents me from referring to now, it will give me great pleasure and satisfaction to support the Second Reading of the Bill in the Lobby.

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West): It is disappointing that the Finance Bill does not deal with a fairly major reform of the income tax system. I suspect that the Government also find that disappointing, as it seems that it will take longer to bring that to fruition than might have been hoped.

We have had a Green Paper on personal taxation. It is very interesting, but it basically contains only one idea. It is also in danger of pre-empting the debate on tax reform. Perhaps that is what it was intended to do. Major reforms of the income tax system, probably come only once every 30 or 40 years. They thus warrant a very wide-ranging debate on the different possibilities for reform. I shall outline some of the major problems. First, income tax starts at far too high a rate. People pay no tax and then face a 29 per cent. cliff. In that respect, we are out of line with our EEC partners, where the starting rate for tax ranges from between 7 and 22 per cent.

It is also argued that people in Britian start paying tax too soon and at too low a point on the income scale. In that respect, we are not out of line with the EEC, but we are above average. In any event, it is a subjective judgment. However, it seems to have had great influence on Government policy, which has been substantially directed towards raising tax thresholds, on the argument that that takes people out of tax and helps with the poverty trap. The argument that it takes people out of tax is difficult to sustain. I suspect that when the threshold is raised, they go out of tax, but when they receive a pay rise, they are taxed again. Moreover, those helped are seldom families with one relatively low earner, yet that is where poverty tends to occur. It is difficult to argue that raising tax thresholds helps with the poverty trap. If that trap is to be solved by tax thresholds, the threshold for a married man must be raised to about £5,000. That would obviously be expensive.

The proposals in the Green Paper would achieve that aim by raising the combined threshold to about £6,000. I should be interested in the response of the Minister, but the argument that one can take people out of the poverty trap by raising thresholds is surely overtaken by the proposed reforms to social security. If housing and family credit are to be based on after-tax income, no amount of fiddling with the tax threshold or with tax rates will make much difference. A person's family credit or housing benefit will simply be adjusted in terms of his after-tax income. Raising thresholds after the social security reforms have been brought into operation will have no effect at all on the poverty trap.

It is true that tax is relevant to the unemployment trap, but it is the average rather than the marginal rate that is relevant. One can deal with average rates just as well by dealing with the basic rate of tax as by raising thresholds. The basic and fundamental problem with our income tax system is that, while we have very high marginal rates for almost everyone, ranging from 29 to 60 per cent., we have relatively low average rates of tax. The percentage of income that a person on three quarters of average earnings would pay in income tax is only 15 per cent., but they face a marginal rate of 29 per cent. Someone on average earnings of £10,000 a year would pay an average of 18 per cent., but would face a marginal rate of 29 per cent.

That is built into the system because there are so many deductions. It has bad consequences. It is bad for incentives higher up the scale. It is bad because it promotes the black economy and a general indulgence in too much tax avoidance and tax evasion. It has a serious impact on the present structure of the poverty trap, and has serious repercussions on pay bargaining, because it costs an employer about £1·80 to put £1 net in his employee's pocket.

The reason for very high marginal rates as against low average rates is that about half of personal income is not taxed. The majority of the part that is not taxed is made up of personal allowances. The Green Paper attempts to deal with some of these problems. It deals with the poverty trap in its present form, but after the social security reforms have been made, in those cases where the benefits are based on after-tax income, raising the tax thresholds will have little if any effect on the poverty trap. The Green Paper largely deals with the unemployment trap, but that could be dealt with just as well by reducing the basic rate as by raising the thresholds. The other major reasons given in the Green Paper are the enhancement or promotion of privacy and independence in the case of married women dealing with their tax affairs, and the need for help for the low paid, particularly when a woman ceases work to have her first child.

Those are laudable objectives, and the idea is attractive. However, it would cost £5·5 billion to raise the single transferable allowance to nearly £3,000. I should have thought that if we had £5·5 billion to play with—if that is the right word—in the tax reform game, many other reliefs and privileges could be bought with the money.

We could solve the problem of the separate taxation of husband and wife relatively cheaply. We could help low-paid couples relatively cheaply, perhaps through social security benefits. There would still be a lot left over to help with other tax reforms. The problem at the lower end of the tax scale is that people are left with too little money in their pockets, because they have paid too much tax, or do not receive enough social security benefits. But higher up the tax scale the problem is the marginal rate and its disincentive effect. Raising thresholds does not meet both those objectives. The best way of helping the low-paid is to deal with that problem through employees' national insurance contributions. That would focus the money on the low-paid, giving them the relief without having to give it to everybody else.

If my calculations are right, we could abolish the 5 per cent. band on employees' contributions at a cost of only £130 million. That would be a cheap way of focusing help on the low-paid without having to give that relief to everyone else. Once one has dealt with that, there are considerable attractions in an alternative approach to tax reform. Paradoxically, we could abolish personal allowances and tax every pound of someone's income form first to last. Although total personal income in the United Kingdom in 1984 was £200 billion, the revenue from income tax was only £35 billion, or 17·5 per cent. Most people would think that that percentage was much higher. It demonstrates the problem of the high marginal rates and the low average rates.

If we took £5·5 billion off the total that could be raised in income tax, which is the amount that we would have to spend on implementing the Green Paper's proposals, we would have to raise only £30 billion. On my calculations, one could do that with a basic rate of 10 per cent. payable up to average earnings, and 20 per cent. payable up to twice average earnings, with a maximum rate of 30 per cent. thereafter. Obviously, there would be no personal allowances reducing the amount of income that is taxed.

I should have thought that it would have a dramatic effect on incentives higher up the income scale, on the black economy, and tax avoidance and evasion, if people faced only a 10 or 20 per cent. tax rate rather than a 30 or 40 per cent. rate. It would also have a very dramatic effect on the poverty trap, and a far more dramatic effect than most of the tax threshold-raising that we have been able to afford. I suspect that it would make tax far cheaper to collect. There would, of course, be problems with mortgage relief and pension contributions, but I do not wish to enter what has proved to be a political minefield for all political parties. However, those could either be left in as deductions or rectified by some compensation.

Some working wives would lose if such a proposal were adopted. The biggest problem is that the low-paid would be left worse off in such a system. The break-even point is about £6,000 a year, which is considerably below average manual earnings, and the maximum loss is just over £4 a week. We could make up that loss to the people affected through the social security system by way of housing benefit or family income supplement, that would enable us to introduce a tax system with much lower marginal rates. That is an attractive option and I am sorry that the Government seem almost entirely hung up on a threshold approach to tax. We had that for several years in a row and I thought that this year when the basic rate was reduced and the thresholds were not over-indexed we had got away from that approach. However, the Green Paper suddenly takes us back to it.

I am anxious to see that we do not enter into major reforms of the income tax system with only one idea in the bag. The debate should be much wider and should examine all the alternatives, of which I have outlined just one. My right hon. Friend and the Government, and all of us on the Government side, ought to find the proposition for a tax system with a basic rate of 10 per cent. and a maximum rate of 30 per cent. attractive to taxpayers and beneficial to the economy.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): Time is pressing, so I shall endeavour to be brief. I listened to the description by Opposition spokesmen of the British economy and I find it difficult to recognise it from that description. It is not the same economy as that which is seen by independent observers like OECD and certainly it is not the economy that I recognised when I was recently in the United States and heard the way we were considered by investors there.

The dramatic improvements in the British economy in the last few years are due almost entirely to the imaginative approach to budgetary matters taken by my right hon. Friend and the other members of the Treasury team. The business expansion scheme is one of the most creative measures that any Government have ever introduced and will continue to provide enormous help to young and emerging industries.

I am worried about one of the proposals in the Finance Bill. Hon. Members will be aware of my interest in tourism and leisure, and the Finance Bill contains a proposal to limit or to exclude from the business expansion scheme companies whose net asset backing exceeds 50 per cent. I admit that there have been considerable abuses of the scheme by certain property companies and by companies of that type with high asset backing.

However, in dealing with covered sports centres or leisure centres a problem arises. At the moment the rules lay down that anything that is added to the land, and would normally be thought to be annexed to the land, should be included in the computation. There is no doubt that the provision of such a facility carries a high risk. I hope that it will be possible for my right hon. Friend to consider some amendment in Committee.

I welcome the considerable benefits that clauses 26 to 30 confer on charities. Those benefits have already been dealt with by other hon. Members so I will not go into them in detail. However, it would be churlish to ignore the other changes about charities made in the Budget, especially the VAT changes. These give enormous benefit to charities that provide for the blind and provide medical services.

I should like to quote from a letter sent to me by a charity with which I have been closely associated for some years. It is the People's Dispensary for Sick Animals, which wrote to me immediately after the Budget. The general secretary said:

> "What about the Budget then! As far as we can see, our prayers have been answered and we shall henceforth no longer pay VAT on our drugs . . . Thank you approximately 150,000 times — that's the amount of VAT which we shall save annually on drugs alone!"

The Government have not received in the press and elsewhere all the credit they deserve for that particular measure.

Small firms will be particularly grateful for the changes in the rules for capital transfer tax, now to be known as inheritance tax. However, there remains a serious obstacle in capital taxes — capital gains tax. Although it is possible to transfer from one generation to another without incurring capital transfer tax, that transfer will still trigger capital gains tax, which in itself imposes a considerable obstacle to the continuation of small family businesses. The problem with CGT is that it is not so much a tax on true gains as a tax on inflation. That seems to be fundamentally wrong. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer moved some way in that direction by providing indexation from a base a few years ago. In future, I hope that he may feel able to go further and to remove altogether the purely notional gain that arises from the effect of inflation.

Finally, I congratulate my right hon. Friend because if one thing always makes his Budgets stand out, it is his imaginative approach to problems. We have seen from the success that we have had in housing and the sale of council houses how the growth of home ownership has changed the perspective of great sections of our community. To attempt now through the personal equity plan to extend that to stocks and shares is creditable. A number of hon. Members have pointed out that the scheme as conceived may not be perfect. Indeed, it may be capable of improvement. I hope that I shall be asked to serve on the Standing Committee, and that we shall attempt constructively to improve the scheme. At the same time let us give it enormous credit as being an imaginative measure which may possibly transform the face of British society.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): We have had an interesting debate about a most uninteresting Bill. The gap between the Conservative party and the Labour party in our discussion and analysis of the economy, our approach to economic policy, and even our identification of the most important economic issues has shone through the debate.

I listened to all the speeches from Conservative Members, and two points struck me. First, not even the Government's most fervent, loyal supporters, including the right hon. Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins), could bring themselves to suggest that the Bill was anything other than an exercise in marking time. It is an exercise in waiting to see which way the price of oil will move, which way the exchange rate will move, what will happen to the balance of payments and, above all, in waiting for next year, for an election Budget and an election Finance Bill through which Conservative Back-Bench Members hope to save their seats.

Secondly, the Bill marks the end of the Chancellor's pretensions to be a reforming Chancellor of the Exchequer. Two years ago the right hon. Gentleman was cast as the Rambo of the Exchequer, machine-gunning his way through the jungles of taxation to rescue working people. Of course, it was never true. His role was really that of a latter-day Neville Chamberlain, the man who personified non-intervention, because that is what fiscal neutrality is and always was. It means that working people are left at the mercy of market forces in an economic jungle which the Chancellor's friends in the City of London exploit to their own advantage.

Now all those pretensions of two years ago have been exposed: 1984 was a one-off Bill from a one-Budget Chancellor. Two years later what we have is a mish-mash of odds and ends. In short, this year's Finance Bill is a boring Bill and hardly worth a day in the life of the House of Commons.

It is also an irrelevant Bill because it does almost nothing about the biggest economic and social problem of our time, unemployment and the poverty associated with unemployment, retirement and looking after children.

At no time in his speech did the Chief Secretary mention poverty. It took him more than half an hour to get round to unemployment. However, that was better than most of his hon. Friends, who made no reference whatsoever to unemployment or to the plight of the unemployed.

I can only deduce that all the Conservative Members who have taken part in the debate recognise that, as the Chief Secretary put it in his reference to home owners, the unemployed have no direct interest in this Bill. The Chief Secretary frowns, but that was the phrase that he used. He said that home owners had no direct interest in the Finance Bill, unlike all those bodies listed by him—the stock exchange, the other financial institutions, the businesses, large and small, which have, to the surprise of no one, not even the Chief Secretary, welcomed the Budget.

Of course they have welcomed it. The Budget was their Budget and the Finance Bill is their Bill. It is not a Bill for the unemployed. That was shown most vividly this afternoon when the Chief Secretary eventually spoke about unemployment. As Hansard will show tomorrow, he was ruled out of order because there is nothing in the Finance Bill, in the opinion of the Chair, to reduce unemployment.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): What?

Mr. Davis: The Chancellor of the Exchequer must have been absent at the time and missed the speech of his right hon. Friend. When he looks at Hansard tomorrow, he will see that his colleague was ruled out of order.

The Chief Secretary, like other Government spokesmen, prefers to talk about the figures for employment rather than those for unemployment.

Mr. Forman: The hon. Gentleman has mentioned the connection in his mind between unemployment and the Budget. Since the Finance Bill is, as he knows, the legislative consequence of the Budget, and since the Budget, in its prudence and general approach, was one of the preconditions for the subsequent two points fall in standard interest rates, is that not one of the most important contributions to solving unemployment in this economy?

Mr. Davis: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that a reduction in interest rates will have a beneficial effect on both employment and unemployment. Where we may differ is in our attribution of that fall entirely to the Budget. There were other reasons. Interest rates were going to come down before the Budget. They are at the moment being held artificially high, if we are to believe the press, by the Bank of England, and I assume that the bank talks these days, post-Johnson Matthey, with the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The Chief Secretary preferred to talk about the figures for employment rather than those for unemployment. I can understand that emphasis. Government spokesmen always want to tell us that more people are employed today than were employed a year ago and that more people are employed today than were employed in 1983. Today was no exception. The Chief Secretary gave us a new figure. He claimed that 1 million new jobs had been created since 1983. I am not sure how that figure has been calculated. It does not seem to have been included in any statistics published by the Department of Employment.

The most recent statistics published a fortnight ago do not justify the claim of 1 million new jobs since the general election. I realise that Lord Young issued a press release on the same day that the figures were published and claimed that an increase of 276,000 jobs in 1985 meant that the increase since March 1983 — not since the general election — was almost 1 million. If the Government want to make such claims, they should first publish the detailed figures. Otherwise, they will be treated with suspicion in the House and elsewhere.

But there are more important points to be made about the Government's claim of an increase in employment. There are four things that Government spokesmen do not tell us, four things that the Chief Secretary did not mention this afternoon. The first is that when the Government refer to the number of people in employment, they often include people who are involved in Government employment schemes and training schemes. They include people on the youth training scheme and the community programme. I do not necessarily object to that approach because the Labour party believes in job creation measures, but it really is a bit thick for Government spokesmen to give the impression that those new jobs have been created by the economy rather than the Government.

We want to see more jobs created by the Government, and we take pleasure in the fact that some 350,000 people are counted — when it suits the Government — as employed as a result of job creation measures. But what was their position in 1979? Then the Prime Minister referred to real jobs, and she was not including those jobs covered by Government schemes.

Secondly, much of the increase in employment in the past two or three years has taken place in part-time jobs for women, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) reminded the House this afternoon. Again, the Labour party does not object to an increase in part-time jobs for women, but let us be clear about why the number of those part-time jobs is increasing. It is increasing, has increased and will continue to increase as a direct result of the high rate of unemployment. More and more married women are having to seek employment in order to support their families, and the only jobs that are available to them are part-time jobs.

In fact, the increase in the labour force mentioned by the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) is also due, in part at least, to the increase in unemployment. The Government's supporters talk about the increase in the labour force as if it were the same thing as an increase in the population or the working population. That is not true. The increase in the labour force is measured as an increase in the number of people who are looking for work. If more married women are having to go out to work to support their families, they are counted as an increase in the labour force. That is where the statistic comes from.

The third point which is ignored by the Chief Secretary and other Government spokesmen in the House and elsewhere is that the figures published by the Department of Employment a fortnight ago show that the increase in employment is slowing down and has slowed down for the past year, despite the so-called "Budget for jobs". Indeed, the increase in jobs last year was down by one quarter compared with the increase in the previous year. There was an especially marked reduction in the number of new self-employed jobs—jobs which the Prime Minister has always boasted about—but the important point is that the total is going down; the rate of increase is declining.

Incidentally, the figures also show that not only is unemployment rising but that it has risen more quickly in recent months than a year ago. The rate is now twice that of a year ago. The Department of Employment's published figures show that during the past six months the increase in unemployment has averaged 12,000 people a month and a year ago, over a period of six months, the increase was an average of only 5,000 people a month.

There is a fourth point which the Government often omit or blur over. We now have the preliminary results of a labour force survey of one year ago.

Mr. Higgins: As the hon. Gentleman was arguing 10 minutes ago that it was out of order to discuss employment, why has he spoken about nothing else since?

Mr. Davis: I am responding to the claim made by the Chief Secretary, which was found to be in order, of the increase in employment in the last three years, and I am commenting quite properly on what the Chief Secretary said. It is, I think, at the discretion of the Speaker whether I am in order. It was not my decision that the Chief Secretary was out of order but the Chair's decision, because, in the judgment of the Chair, there was nothing in the Bill to help the unemployed.

To revert to the labour force survey and the preliminary results published one week ago, the figures show that in this country there are 755,000 people with second jobs. Although those second jobs are excluded from the statistics published in the survey, they are not always excluded from statistics published in the Department of Employment Gazette, as I understand it.

I ask the Chief Secretary to tell the House how many of the 1 million new jobs created since 1983 are second jobs—that is, jobs being done by people who already have a job. To what extent are the so-called new jobs represented by people who are working in the evening or at weekends in public houses? To what extent are they married women who go to work in a local shop on a Saturday? To what extent are they made up, for example, of people such as the man who works in the factory and goes to help in the local bookmaker's on a Saturday afternoon and is classed as having a second job? That is not an increase in employment to be put against the increase in unemployment that we have witnessed for the past seven years.

To be more specific, when the Department of Employment calculates an increase of 276,000 in the number of people in employment in 1985, does the Department include the estimated increase of some 80,000 second jobs a year? Those second jobs do not represent any increase in the real number in employment by any yardstick applied in the real world.

The Government have made so many changes in the way that the employment and unemployment figures are calculated that hardly anybody trusts the statistics any more. A more suspicious man would suggest that the Government change the figure so often to prevent any accurate analysis of their record. But what they cannot deny is that more people are unemployed today than were unemployed when they came to office in 1979. They cannot deny that more people are unemployed today than when we reached the so-called bottom of the recession in 1981. They cannot deny that more people are unemployed today than when they were re-elected in 1983. They cannot deny that more people are unemployed today than when the House debated the Finance Bill one year ago —a Bill which represented a Budget for jobs.

It is a fact that unemployment was too high when the Government took office in 1979, but it was coming down and it had come down for several months in succession. Since 1979, it has not only increased but trebled, and shows no sign whatsoever of coming down. And on the basis of evidence along the lines of the dog that did not bark, it is clear that the Government do not expect any significant reduction in unemployment this year. Treasury Ministers have been asked time and again, but on each occasion they refuse to give the figures. They can give forecasts for inflation, for capital investment, for domestic demand and gross domestic product; they can forecast exports and imports and the balance of payments; but they cannot forecast employment or unemployment.

Why are the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his colleagues so coy? They must have produced a forecast; they must have it in the Treasury. Are they really pretending that civil servants do not have the time to do this calculation, civil servants who, each Monday morning, are given a clutch of press cuttings by the Chancellor and his Chief Secretary to estimate and calculate figures to show the cost of my hon. Friends' commitments, hopes, ideas, suggestions and long-term aims? The Chancellor of the Exchequer smiles. We know what his weekend reading is. He reads Tribune. Each week he takes cuttings from Tribune, gives them to the civil servants on the Monday and asks them to work out what it would cost to implement Labour's plans. I suggest that he uses some of the civil servants' time to forecast unemployment and the cost of the Budget and the Finance Bill. If the Treasury forecast showed any reduction in unemployment, the Government would not be so coy. That is proof enough that the Finance Bill will not reduce unemployment.

Perhaps it is worth reminding ourselves that it is not only the waste of resources in paying men and women to sit at home instead of paying them to provide goods and services — particularly services — that the rest of the community needs, but the sheer poverty associated with being unemployed that concerns Labour Members. Of course, the best answer to that poverty is to get people back to work, and that is why the Labour party has set itself a target of creating 1 million new jobs during the first two years of the next Labour Government.

However, that is not the complete answer, because 1 million new jobs will still leave thousands of people unemployed and living in poverty. We shall therefore pay the long-term rate of supplementary benefit to the long-term unemployed, because the long-term unemployed are one of the three groups to whom we shall give the greatest priority in our campaign against poverty: the long-term unemployed, the pensioners and parents—single parents and married couples, working parents and unemployed parents. These are the people to whom we shall give priority, not because other people are not living in poverty but because they are living in the greatest poverty and must therefore come first.

What is the response of the Chancellor and the Government to the scourge of poverty? After a careful examination of the Bill, I can find only one section that, by any stretch of the imagination, could be described as alleviating poverty. That section consists of the clause relating to charities. As my right hon. Friend for Sparkbrook explained, we welcome the provisions in so far as they benefit real charities, but look at how much the Chancellor proposes to devote to this much-vaunted scheme. On the most generous calculation, in his Red Book, the Chancellor is giving £55 million a year in tax relief on gifts to charities, adding the provision for gifts by employees and companies together.

Mr. Lawson: What did the Labour Government do for charities?

Mr. Davis: We did not abolish the capital transfer tax, and it just happens that £55 million is also the cost of abolishing the capital transfer tax on gifts from the rich to the already wealthy. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) pointed out, that is one of the most objectionable provisions of the Bill.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, South (Mr. Cocks) and my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, South (Mr. Hughes) summed up the Bill. My right hon. Friend described it as a Bill that does not measure up to what is required. My hon. Friend described it as irrelevant, and he was right. Compared with the scale of the problems of unemployment and poverty, the Bill is irrelevant and inadequate—as irrelevant and inadequate as the Government. It is a defeatist Bill from a defeated Government—defeated not in the Lobbies but in the country—defeated by the problem of unemployment, and a Government who will be defeated in an election that not even this Government can avoid for ever.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John Moore): I start by making it clear to those hon. Members who have not been here throughout our proceedings, and who may have been out enjoying themselves, what precisely the Chair did not rule today. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary was rightly discussing aspects of the Finance Bill and of the Budget in relation to unemployment. In its wisdom—the Chair is always right—the Chair ruled that the specific budgetary measures on unemployment that are not in the Finance Bill should not be addressed, and my right hon. Friend immediately responded to that.

I go beyond that to the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West (Mr. Grylls). He was supported by all the Opposition parties on an issue which unites both sides of the House—unitary tax. He asked some important questions on this all-party issue. I shall reiterate the Government's position. The timing has not changed. The Government would have wished for greater progress by now, there is no doubt about that. He asked what Ministers would and could do to assist progress in this matter. Ministers have and will continue to take every opportunity to raise the matter of unitary tax with the United States. He commented on the role of the unitary tax group. I join him in paying tribute, on behalf of both sides of the House, to the activities of the Unitary Tax Group, to the Confederation of British Industry and to Peter Welch for mobilising British industry. As my hon. Friend rightly said, the Government have fought against unitary tax in every way possible.

Those of us who were privileged to hear the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell) regarded it as lucid and fascinating. I listened with great care, as I am sure all right hon. and hon. Members did — [Interruption.] I listened as I have throughout the debate, unlike those who have not been present throughout but seek only to interrupt from a sedentary position. I listened, not only because of my right hon. Friend's former role as Secretary of State for Energy but because he was in advance of most of the world in predicting recent changes. Therefore, we are obviously conscious of his remarks. He went on to discuss other matters, including monetary policy. As my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary said, the Government will respond to the Treasury and Civil Service Committee recommendation which many of my hon. Friends have commented on.

The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon), the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, made a wide-ranging and interesting speech. I listened with considerable care to his remarks about privatisation. He well knows that we beg to disagree. This is probably not the occasion on which to debate that particular issue except to say, with respect, that I think that he confuses ownership with regulatory needs.

The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne also raised the issue of capital transfer tax. It has been raised by other hon. Members during the debate. I can assure him, provided the House agrees, that there will be an opportunity to debate that in detail in a Committee of the whole House, without, as he rightly says, being trapped in the rigours of the Finance Bill Standing Committee. We welcome his comments, as well as those of my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, North-West (Mr. Grylls) and my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill), who expressed a contrary view and said that that part of the Finance Bill was one of the critical features of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's Budget.

I was sorry to miss the contribution of my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins) when I disappeared from the Chamber for a few moments. I would be doing the House a service if I drew to the attention of those hon. Members who were not here the question that my right hon. Friend legitimately put to the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth), who made pious comments on the nature of the supposed courage of the alliance in voting against the reduction in income tax to 29 per cent. My right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing legitimately asked whether that vote would be a prime plank in their by-election programme at Ryedale and West Derbyshire. I trust that the limited presence of the alliance will not restrict it from ensuring that all the people involved in the by-elections will be well aware of the nature of that vote.

[Mr. John Moore]

The alliance parties are again sadly without representation, except for the hon. Member for Stockton, South who was unable to be with us for the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton). He gave a devastating analysis of the conflicting nature of the alliance's programme. [Interruption.] The alliance should carefully consider my hon. Friend's points, as some alliance Members were not present to hear his speech.

I welcomed the emphasis which my right hon. Friend the Member for Guildford placed on the Treasury and Civil Service Committee's verdict which came out categorically in favour of the Budget.

The right hon. Member for Bristol, South (Mr. Cocks) legitimately raised, in the special way to which we have all become used over many years, the interests of his constituents, especially in relation to tobacco. I am sure that if we have the privilege of his company in Committee, we shall look forward to his individualistic comments, which will help our deliberations. The right hon. Gentleman will in no way mind the compliments which I have paid him, and which I meant, for the way in which he has consistently argued for the interests of his constituents throughout his long and distinguished career in the Palace.

The remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman) were especially welcome. As always, he made a wise and balanced contribution. I was especially interested in his remarks on wider share ownership for employees—[Interruption.] I have listened to the debate and am now trying to respond to the specific points that were raised. Those hon. Members who, unfortunately, have not had the pleasure of being present will have no knowledge of what occurred during the debate.

I accept the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington about employee share ownership, although I do not agree with him that our other activities in the area of direct share ownership would divert us from our stated aims in the Budget.

I was especially unhappy—as was my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Mr. Watts), who robustly criticised it—with that section of the speech of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook which related to charities. The right hon. Gentleman welcomed part of our charity package. However, he made a relatively miserable response when he sought to suggest that our proposals on charities were simply an alternative to what in his judgment was a disappointing Budget.

The right hon. Gentleman's remarks were interesting. Should there come the benighted time when a Labour Government are in office, those outside the House will wish to examine carefully the extraordinary statement which the right hon. Gentleman made across the Dispatch Box. He said that the Labour Government would redefine the word "charity"—in those lovely Socialist words—to establish who is genuinely deserving. The analysis of that statement, after generations of charity law, will be interesting to consider.

The right hon. Gentleman asked a specific question about pension scheme surpluses, and I was delighted at the thrust of his first remarks. He said that he welcomed the thrust of the proposals and thought that they were correct. He will understand why we could not consult the actuarial profession generally on the details before the Budget. Therefore, on the advice of the Government Actuary, we adopted a careful and prudent approach.

The right hon. Gentleman specifically asked about the 5 per cent. level. The approach advised by the Government Actuary has three related elements. The first is the secure funding method, which is known among actuaries as "projected accrued benefit", and associated with that is a series of prudent actuarial assumptions on which the liabilities are assessed. Secondly, the contingency margin of 5 per cent. which has been allowed was advised on the basis of the secure funding method and the prudent actuarial assumptions that that would safeguard the benefits given to scheme members.

Thirdly, and related to that, are the three options for the funds to reduce the surpluses: contribution holidays or reductions for up to five years, improvements in benefits, and a refund to employers. The right hon. Gentleman focused on the 5 per cent., but one cannot look in isolation only at one element. We are consulting the actuarial profession. We shall also listen carefully not only to what the right hon. Gentleman said, but to views from outside Parliament.

I return to the right hon. Gentleman's fundamental point, referred to by other hon. Members, in particular by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) and by my hon. Friends the Members for Tatton and for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples). They went to the heart of the Finance Bill and to the Opposition's attitude to the taxation of both capital and income.

A great deal of the debate both inside and outside Parliament has been about the Opposition's suggestion that the Government's programme will benefit only the rich and that most of the Government's measures can be corrected by changing the pattern of taxation. I shall deal tonight with the analysis introduced into the debate by the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook. I do not intend to deal with the Opposition's expenditure programme. I shall concern myself only with the suggestion of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook that they will implement a minimal programme.

On the Jimmy Young programme on 20 March the right hon. Gentleman referred to a £3·6 billion anti-poverty progamme. My hon. Friends have asked me tonight, who are the rich, and how will they pay for this programme? The answers then become rather vague and indistinct. I shall remind the House of the nature of the questions. The right hon. Gentleman seeks to suggest that the financing of the Labour party's minimal programme will be simple and easy, and this was a fundamental part of our debate. Jimmy Young said:

"When you say rich, Roy, you mean, who's rich? I mean, what income are you talking about?"

The right hon. Gentleman said:

"It's people earning more than £25,000 a year."

Jimmy Young then said:

"Now I've got four figures there."

I am told on the Jimmy Young programme by the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook that in fact it is very hard to analyse because the Treasury will not provide all the details. Therefore I shall help the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook and will give him all the details relating to his programme. He asked a second question that I shall also seek to answer. It related not only to the rich but to how they will pay. Jimmy Young said:

"When you say tax them properly, what sort of level would they be paying tax then?"

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This is not a question of the Jimmy Young show but of "Desert Island Discs." We have already heard this speech from the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Gentleman is making his speech in his own way.

Mr. Moore: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Truth is always difficult to take.

The second leg of the question that is critical in this area is how the rich will pay. In this instance, the tax level will not change very much, we are told by the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook, because it will all be collected in the form of capital taxes. Let us look at the implications of this proposal before I remind the right hon. Gentleman and the House of how this Finance Bill will continue the process of making everybody, at all levels of income, better off than if we still had to face the hazards and the tragedy of a Labour Government.

As for capital taxes, with which we are dealing in this Finance Bill, let me examine arithmetically what would happen if we had to return to the 1979 position. There are three features of this Finance Bill and of previous Finance Bills to which the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook objects: abolition of investment income surcharge and reductions in capital gains tax and capital transfer tax. If reinstated, what would they produce annually? Investment income surcharge would produce £825 million a year and changes in capital gains tax and capital transfer tax would produce £835 million a year. That is a total not of £3·6 billion but of £1·6 billion.

As the Finance Bill deals with matters such as CTT, it is worth making some points on the effects of the arithmetic. If investment income surcharge were reinstated, it would penalise many who are on the basic rate. More than 60 per cent. of taxpayers who would be affected are those on the basic rate, and 45 per cent. of those affected are elderly. The approach which I hear outside is: "the bloody rich." Because of the reductions in the absurd rate of capital taxes, it is worth drawing attention to the effect of this arithmetic. Our much-improved investment planning has produced a yield of 20 per cent. more, in real terms, from capital taxes since 1979, as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor said in the House on Monday 24 March.

If we returned to the rates that applied in 1979, it is questionable whether they would produce what the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook wants—a yield of £1·6 billion. Let us accept, for a moment, his arithmetic and consider the reality of income tax and the implications at which he laughed earlier. The reality of income tax, in addition to restoring IIS, CTT and CGT reductions, is slightly more complicated. I understand the right hon. Gentleman's difficulty when he appeared on the Jimmy Young show regarding the different allowances and the problem whether one is referring to a single person, a one-earner married couple or a two-earner married couple.

The public want to know the implications of this and previous Finance Bills and the policy of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook as adduced at the Dispatch Box today. Let me tell the country what his policies would mean. To finance this minimal policy, there would be a jump in the income tax rate of single people to 70 per cent. on taxable income above £18,600, or 70 per cent. on all gross income above £20,935. That is the first definition. The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook is getting very uncomfortable, because this is the first time we have analysed his definition of "rich singles".

What about the one-earner married couple? Again, there would be a jump to 70 per cent. tax on all taxable income above £18,600, or such a couple would pay 70 per cent. on a gross income above £22,255. I remind the outside world of the right hon. Gentleman's definition of rich. According to him, a rich one-earner couple is a couple earning £22,255. Let us remember those figures.

I turn to the critical, final figure—that relating to two-earner couples. There are over 5 million two-earner couples. All two-earner couples would jump to a tax rate of 70 per cent. on a taxable income of £18,600, or would pay 70 per cent. on all gross income above £24,590. The right hon. Gentleman's definition of a two-earner couple would be a husband and wife, each earning about £12,500. That is his definition of the rich.

I have explained who these rich people are. I have explained how they will pay. They are not even in the top 5 per cent. of salary earners. For the benefit of the right hon. Gentleman, when he next appears on the Jimmy Young programme, those people are the top 3·5 per cent. of tax-paying units—not the top 5 per cent.

From the Alice in Wonderland of "Hatteromics", I turn to what the present Finance Bill and other Finance Bills have done since 1979 for the other side of the challenge, as opposed to that absurd pretence that the programme can be financed out of thin air. The other side of the issue concerns what we have done about the burden of tax and the well-being of people at all levels of tax. We had to get control of borrowing. We had to pay the terrifying burden of debts before we reduced the burden of taxes.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook was right—some taxes have been increased. North sea taxes have increased. About 40 per cent. of the increase in the tax burden has come from North sea taxes. Equally, VAT has contributed to the increase since 1979 by a little more than 40 per cent. The remaining 10 per cent. plus has come from national insurance charges, which have increased benefits associated with them, and from rates.

In this pattern of Finance Bills, which culminate in this legislation, the fact that many critical taxes have decreased has not been discussed. I refer especially to the taxes on employment. When the Conservative party came to office, the burden of taxation borne by employers was 14 per cent. Primarily because of the abolition of the Labour tax on jobs, that burden has been reduced from 14 per cent. to 9 per cent. Income taxes have fallen. In 1978-79, income taxes were approximately 32·7 per cent. of total taxation. They have now fallen to 26·9 per cent.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook specifically asked me what that has meant to taxpayers generally. What has the pattern, which has continued in the Finance Bill, meant? [Interruption.] To help the right hon. Gentleman's supporters, I shall compare the income tax and national insurance contributions paid by a married man under the Conservative Government, with his position if Labour were still in office. [Interruption.] I know that, to some people, that is a terrifyingly long and happy way in the past, but I remind the House of the precise figures. Under our present tax regime, a married man on a third of average earnings pays 7·4 per cent. of his income in income tax and NIC. Under the 1978-79 regime, under Labour and including the benefits of Labour's 6·5 per cent. NIC, such a person would pay 10·6 per cent. in income tax and NIC—higher than the 7·4 per cent. paid under the present tax regime.

For a married man earning half average earnings, the figures are precisely the same—18·9 per cent. at present versus 18·9 per cent. under a 1978-79 regime. For a married man earning three quarters of average earnings, the figures are 25·3 per cent. under our Government and 25·8 per cent. under Labour's 1978-79 regime with its lower NIC rates. The position today in terms of the combination of income tax and NIC is better than under a 1978-79 regime.

A married man on average earnings pays 28·5 per cent. in income tax and NIC but would have paid 29·2 per cent. under the Labour's regime—again a higher figure. A married man earning one and a half times average earnings pays 30·6 per cent. under this Government but would have paid 31·1 per cent. under a Labour regime. I could continue, because obviously the figures become even better. In every instance, the figures are better or the same. That therefore disproves the constant suggestion of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook that in income tax and national insurance terms, people are worse off than if Labour had remained in office.

I have said repeatedly at the Dispatch Box that we should be concerned, as the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook said, not simply with the proportion taken in tax but with how well off people are, because that is obviously affected by the pattern of their earnings increases as well as the pattern of taxation changes. I shall take the categories I mentioned and the percentage change in real take-home pay. After all, that is what, theoretically, we are all concerned about when we talk about our constituents.

Let me remind the House of the figures on the percentage change in real take-home pay. Under the category of those on half average earnings I can quote any group—single, married with children, married with no children. Under the category of those married with no children, there was a 2·4 per cent. improvement in a couple's real take-home pay after five years of Socialism, but after seven years of Conservatism there was a 14·8 per cent. improvement. [Interruption.] The debate is about whether people in work are better off, and I am simply trying to remind the House of the data.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington) rose——

Mr. Moore: I will give way only to those who have participated throughout the debate.

The figures continue, and they get better. [Interruption.] The Opposition do not like these figures. For a married man on average earnings, with no children, during Labour's five years of office, the percentage change in the real take-home pay went down by 0·9 per cent. What happened in the relevant past seven years? There was an increase of 17·7 per cent. What a contrast — between a person's take-home pay on average earnings going up in real terms by 17·7 per cent. and going down by 0·9 per cent.

What about a couple on twice average earnings? Their take-home pay went down during Labour's period of office by 2·4 per cent. against an increase of 19·7 per cent. during the Conservative period of office.

I have endeavoured to show how the Finance Bill takes account of people on average, below or above-average earnings and how Conservative taxation policies have benefited those in all categories.

I was asked by my right hon. Friends the Members for Guildford and for Worthing and by the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne for the Government's position on the exchange rate mechanism. I can reiterate the precise position. The time is not ripe and, as has been said many times from the Dispatch Box, the matter is being kept under constant review. We will not enter the exchange rate mechanism unless there is a clear balance of advantage in favour of us doing so. The Government's views were stated clearly by my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary during a debate on 29 January.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tatton made an important contribution. He asked us to consider what is happening in manufacturing. That was raised by three or four other hon. Members. I would remind the House that manufacturing profitability in 1984 was at 6·5 per cent., which was the best since 1973. Manufacturing exports went up by 6 per cent. in 1985 and are expected to rise by a further 6 per cent. in 1986. Manufacturing industry is expected to be a major beneficiary of the fall in oil prices. [Interruption.] Hon. Members ought to listen to the extent to which these are all positive aspects of Government policy on manufacturing enterprises.

In no other recent five-year period has manufacturing been so successful in holding its market share and keeping pace with world output. The Finance Bill offers for incentives a cut in the basic rate, which is of course the marginal rate for 95 per cent. of taxpayers. It offers for business and enterprise a package of measures, including an indefinite extension of the business expansion scheme in recognition of its great success, effective action to prevent family businesses from being broken up for tax reasons, a unique opportunity for individual share ownership through personal equity plans and widely welcomed new reliefs for charitable giving. All that is in the context of a sound economic strategy which has given us, in 1985, the third successive year of both steady growth and low inflation, and an outlook for 1986 which is the best for a generation.

I commend the Bill to the House.

10 pm

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): I listened with the utmost interest to the Financial Secretary's speech — [Interruption.]—but he did not address himself to several points that formed the basis of his own argument. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the very high—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has the Floor.

Mr. Bell: The Minister referred to the point that people were better off taxation-wise in relation to earnings, but he did not relate that to the fact that earnings have increased over a period of time. [Interruption.] He did not refer to what those earnings were. It is a pity for the House that he did not do so.

The Minister also failed to meet the point that the Budget had been predicated on the price of oil being $15 a barrel, whereas it is now $12. Those are all important factors in relation to the Finance Bill—[Interruption.] The House is entitled to know what the Government think of those issues, which are very important for the economy. Indeed, the people of this country are entitled to know what the Treasury team's view is, but the Financial Secretary has not told us.

The Minister had half an hour in which to speak, and it is a pity that he did not spend that time on the issues relating to Government policy. Instead, he produced a series of spurious calculations that involved a sleight of hand to show what a Labour Government might do, some seven years after the Labour Government were last in office.

It is a pity that the Financial Secretary refused to spend any time saying what this Government would do, and instead concentrated on what the Labour party would do if it was in government — [Interruption.] From the country's point of view, it is a pity that those points were not clarified. How can the Government put forward a Budget that is based on oil costing $15 a barrel, when the price has fallen to $12? The Opposition want to know how the Chancellor can predicate his Budget on the price of oil when he has lost a further £3,000 million in Government revenue since the Budget statement—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is absolutely in order to be speaking now, and he should be heard.

Mr. Bell: Having had the attention of the House for the past few minutes, I invite the Financial Secretary to respond to those points in the interests not only of the Opposition, but of the country as a whole.

FINANCE BILL (COMMITTAL)

Ordered,

That Clauses Nos. 2, 15, 26 and 80 be committed to a Committee of the whole House;

That the remainder of the Bill be committed to a Standing Committee;

That, when the provisions of the Bill considered, respectively, by the Committee of the whole House and by the Standing Committee have been reported to the House, the Bill be proceeded with as if the Bill had been reported as a whole to the House from the Standing Committee.—[Mr. Moore.]

Committee tomorrow.

Employment Subsidies

10.16 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Ian Lang): I beg to move,

That this House authorises the Secretary of State to set up, in accordance with section 1(1) of the Employment Subsidies Act 1978, a scheme, the cost of which is expected to exceed £10 million for the year ending 31st March 1987, for making payments to employers to enable them to take on as new employees young people with earnings below the limits specified in the statement laid before the House on 22nd April 1986.

The motion authorises the Secretary of State to set up the new workers scheme, announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in his Budget statement on 18 March. The Employment Subsidies Act 1978, to which it refers, as renewed by order in 1985, empowers the Secretary of State to set up schemes to give financial assistance to employers, to enable them to take on new employees and to maintain or enlarge their labour force. This is the aim of the new workers scheme.

The Act states that a resolution of the House is necessary if the scheme is expected to cost more than £10 million. The Chancellor announced that this scheme is expected to cost about £26 million between 1 April 1986 and 31 March 1987, and it is, therefore, necessary to pass the motion that we are debating. A similar scheme will be run in Northern Ireland.

The other requirements of the Act — that the Secretary of State should consult such organisations as are considered appropriate, which in this case have included the TUC and CBI, and lay a statement before the House explaining the proposals—have been fulfilled.

Tonight's debate is about jobs for young people. That is our goal in proposing the new workers scheme. It will be an important strand in the comprehensive package of measures that we have developed to support enterprise and employment. The scheme will encourage employers to provide more job opportunities for young people — primarily those who have completed training on the youth training scheme — at realistic wages which sensibly reflect their age and their inexperience of the world of work. It thus delivers help where it is needed and where it can work. It forms part of the most imaginative and comprehensive approach ever devised to give young people a proper preparation for work and a start in a job.

Sixteen-year-old school leavers will now be able to receive two years' training and 17-year-old leavers one year under YTS, leading to a recognised qualification. Already about 60 per cent. of YTS leavers go into a job afterwards and more into further training. The new workers scheme will help to maintain or even raise that proportion by giving employers an extra incentive to take them on. It will contribute to the increasing awareness of economic reality—that wages which are too high and do not bear a close enough relationship to the contribution people are able to make to a business—lead only to fewer job opportunities. Young people do not naturally expect to earn a high proportion of their parents' salary as soon as they start work. That leaves them nothing to aim for and work towards. In the early 1970s, their expectations about wages were inflated and then dashed because young people had been priced out of jobs.

We have made a lot of progress since then. We have introduced YTS, to give young people proper training; we have successfully run the young workers scheme; we have reduced the national insurance costs of employing someone; we have introduced proposals about wages councils and young people and our enterprise, training and employment policies have borne fruit. There have been around a million extra jobs in the past three years. Now we have two year YTS, and to complement it, the new workers scheme.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): In listing those measures of which the Government are unjustly proud, is the Minister aware of two facts? First, school leavers' wages, relative to adults' wages, have dropped over the past six years by 12 per cent. for boys and 13 per cent. for girls at a time when youth unemployment has trebled? There is no relationship between cutting youth wages and increasing youth jobs, except more poorly paid youth.

Secondly, the young workers scheme, which the Minister has just appraised, was analysed in research paper No. 42 by Mr. W. Wells of the Department of Employment, which showed that eight out of 10 jobs created by the young workers scheme were at the expense of adult workers. It may well create a few jobs for young workers but that is at the expense of putting workers in their 40s and 50s on the dole queue.

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. The figure was not eight out of 10 but eight out of 100—8 per cent. of adult substitution—a much lower figure. As for the trend of youth wages in relation to employment, most of the fall in youth wages has taken place in the past three years, and that is at a time when youth unemployment has been falling, as I shall illustrate shortly.

I should like to describe briefly the way in which the scheme will work. Its aim is to encourage employers to take on more young people into full-time, permanent jobs, at rates of pay which realistically reflect their age and relative inexperience. To achieve that, a payment of £15 a week will be made to the employer, for up to 52 weeks, in respect of each young person involved. The scheme will be open to all employers except those in the public services or private households. Young people must be paid £55, or less for employees aged 19 or younger on the date they start in the job, or £65, or less for those aged 20 on the day they start in the job. As for the young people themselves, they must be under 21, in their first year of employment, no longer eligible for YTS or unable to find a YTS continuation place.

The resolution seeks the approval of the House for making payments to employers on that basis. Clearly we cannot be precise about the number of applications employers will make under the new workers scheme in the coming year, but our estimate is that some 100,000 successful applications will be made before 31 March next year, on which date there should be, perhaps, 63,000 young people in jobs supported by the scheme. In that case, the estimated expenditure would, as I have said, be some £26 million.

The scheme will be administered by Department of Employment staff in our employment measures office in six regional centres. Staff in jobcentres and careers offices will of course give every assistance to employers who wish to take advantage of the scheme.

We are determined to make the procedures as unbureacratic and straightforward as possible, as it is employers, many no doubt in small businesses, whom we shall be encouraging to offer extra opportunities to young people and who need to feel confident that they will not be caught up in delays and red tape.

We shall be taking steps to make sure that information about the scheme is made available to employers and businesses and we have already included an outline of the new scheme—making clear that it remains subject to the approval of the House—in our new "Action for Jobs" booklet. The new workers scheme is a significant part of our policy for providing the opportunities—or, rather the means for others to provide the opportunities—for employment.

That, then, is an outline of the proposed scheme and I should like to go on to describe the context in which it is set and the way in which it fits into our policies. The House will recognise that the new workers scheme is not dissimilar to the young workers scheme, which as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced in his budget a year ago, closed on 31 March this year. By that time, 435,000 applications will have been approved under the young workers scheme and, in view of some of the points made in this House when we sought authority for that scheme, and its similarity to the new workers scheme, I think it is worthwhile reminding the House about its success. I am glad to say a full evaluation of the young workers scheme will be published in an article in next month's Employment Gazette. I commend this to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott).

The evaluation over the four years of YWS suggests that the scheme has been creating more and more jobs per unit of expenditure over time. We think that this has been due both to more employers, and particularly smaller employers, learning about the scheme and creating new jobs for young people under it, and to the fact that more, better trained young people have been available as they left the old youth opportunities programme and, now, YTS. In fact, about two thirds of young people in jobs supported by YWS have previously been on YTS, and the proportion of jobs supported which were created directly as a result of the young workers scheme has risen to its current level of some 27 per cent.

As the percentage has steadily increased since the scheme began, we now estimate that some 90,000 jobs for young people have been created directly by the scheme. These were not jobs that would have existed anyway, not jobs in which young workers on YWS are substituted for other workers at the same firm, not jobs which perhaps displace workers in other businesses, but new, additional jobs.

There are always difficulties with any sort of scheme involving payments to employers for employees they might have recruited anyway. We believe that the careful design and administration of YWS and its direct link to YTS meant that is provided valuable, cost-effective help. It is exactly what we are aiming to achieve for a slightly older, more mature age group with the new workers scheme, which should build on our experience and that of employers in using the scheme, and which will, in its turn, complement the new, developed YTS.

Another important aim of the young workers scheme was to affect the rates of pay of young people so as to achieve a more realistic relativity with adult wages. There is a large and growing consensus of academic studies which shows that the high cost of youth labour relative to adults has adversely affected the job opportunities of young people. In other words, as one would expect, in a labour market in which the demand for young labour had fallen from previously high levels, young people's relatively high wages were increasingly handicapping their search for work. Some success seems to have been gained in this area. Since 1982, when YWS was introduced, relative earnings of under-18s have fallen and so has unemployment. Of course, several factors will have influenced both youth earnings and unemployment, including the introduction of YTS and demographic movements. But no doubt the young workers scheme will also have been influential, as we expect the new workers scheme to be.

YWS was successful because, in the vast majority of cases, young workers supported by the scheme continued in the same post or with the same employer at the end of the period of support—a survey of employers told us that this was their intention in 90 per cent. of cases. That is an impressive result, I think the House will agree.

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): Did they do that?

Mr. Lang: The vast majority, as far as we are aware, did just that.

Some hon. Members expressed concern that training would not be given under YWS. Again, there is evidence from surveys that employers have provided a significant amount of training for those young workers for whom they were claiming support.

Now the new two-year youth training scheme is with us, it offers two years' training for 16-year-old school leavers and one year for 17-year-old leavers—training in greater depth and in the occupational skills which industry and business need. There are around 360,000 entrants each year and up to 500,000 in training at any one time. The new workers scheme will boost the employment prospects of those leaving YTS or who are too old for it by giving employers a positive incentive to recruit them.

The age group we are catering for with the new scheme is thus the 18 to 20-year-olds. They, the post-YTS age group, will have prepared for the world of work, acquired a recognised qualification and now need the opportunity to prove their worth to an employer. For them, NWS will thus be, as I have said, part of a highly imaginative and comprehensive package of measures towards a start in work with the prospect of two years of high quality training followed by a year's supported employment at sensible wages.

Young people need a sensible start in which they can find their feet, learn skills, prove their value to themselves, their workmates and their employer. What they do not need are expectations of being able to leave school without a skill or the qualities employers are looking for and being able to walk into a job earning the same as an experienced adult. Those expectations are false and too often frustrated.

YTS and the new workers scheme together offer a sensible progression in earnings from the first year's YTS allowance of £27·30, the second year's allowance of £35, and then a wage of up to £55 in a new workers scheme job for an 18- or 19-year-old recruit, or up to £65 for a 20-year-old new worker. That is a sensible progression, in reasonable stages. Crucially, NWS gives a young person the opportunity to earn more, as their contribution to an enterprise increases and their skills and experience develop.

Just as the new workers scheme complements YTS, so too it fits directly into our wider policies to support employment and enterprise opportunities. We have introduced to the House our proposals for removing from the scope of wages councils young people below the age of 21, so as to increase their employment prospects. If those proposals receive the approval of the House, as I am confident that they will, there will be all the more opportunity for employers to create more vacancies for young people new on to the labour market without the concern that they would have little chance of contributing as much to the enterprise as they are required to be paid.

Moreover, it is precisely at levels of earnings similar to those which will apply under the new workers scheme that the positive effects of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's changes to the rates of national insurance contributions will work most effectively, increasing the attractiveness of young people to employers.

Taken together with the effects of our other policies for employment and enterprise, the new workers scheme will provide a significant extra boost to the prospects of young people entering work. It follows on from a successful and proven scheme, the young workers scheme, which complemented YTS and provided job opportunities for 435,000 16 and 17-year-olds.

Now we have gone on to develop and introduce an even more effective and relevant preparation and training provision in the two-year YTS, which the new workers scheme will tie into exactly, by encouraging employers to take on young people leaving YTS or no longer eligible for it. It is right in line with the changes that we are proposing for wages councils and young people. It is supported by changes in national insurance rates.

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North): The Minister has been extolling the virtues of the scheme at some length. He will recall that at the outset of his remarks he said that he was called upon to consult both the employers' organisations and the TUC. He has spoken at length about the attitude of the employers. Will he explain that the TUC, the body responsible for organising over 11 million workers, completely rejects the scheme?

Mr. Lang: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity to do that soon. We consulted both the CBI and the TUC. The CBI supported the scheme, and the TUC opposed it. He will be able to enlarge on the reasons that the TUC gave, and I shall be happy to reply to them.

Mr. Geoff Lawler (Bradford, North): In one draft of the statement that I have seen, it says that applicants should normally have exhausted eligibility for YTS. Will my hon. Friend confirm that they must have done so, to prevent employers poaching people half way through the YTS, much to the detriment of the skill training?

Mr. Lang: The object is that a YTS leaver should go into a new workers scheme. In the first year of that scheme, there will be those leaving the one-year YTS who are unable to get continuation places on the YTS, and will want to move to the new workers scheme, which will make specific provisions for that. The object of the exercise is that the one scheme will lead on to the other, thus helping young people to a graduated progression into employment. It will be cost-effective and carefully administered, so as to deliver positive financial encouragement where it can do most good, with the minimum of fuss.

I believe that the new workers scheme to be a sound and useful addition to the Government's comprehensive series of measures in the interests of jobs for young people, and I commend the motion to the House.

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North): In any debate about employment or employment creation schemes, which we are discussing tonight, it is important for the participants to keep three sets of figures very much in mind.

The first figure to keep at the forefront of our minds is the 3,323,776 registered claimants receiving benefits in the United Kingdom now. Of course, "registered claimants" is the Government's definition of the unemployed. The second figure or set of statistics to keep at the forefront of our minds is of about 200,000 men and women currently employed on the Government's community programme. It is one of the Government's major job creation schemes. An important fact to bear in mind is that no fewer than 1,500,000 unemployed people are eligible for a place on that programme.

The third figure is probably the most important in the context of the debate. It relates to the level of unemployment amongst the under-25s. It is obviously germane to the introduction of a scheme that affects young workers. Unfortunately, there are not any unemployment figures for the under-21s, so I must make do with unemployment statistics for the under-25s. There are no fewer than 1,246,892 of them: that is, 36·6 per cent. of the total unemployed people are under 25 years of age. By any standard that can be described only as a crisis. It is even more of a crisis when we appreciate that hundreds of thousands of those youngsters have never had a job since they left school.

All of the figures that I have given were used by the Minister on Tuesday 22 April during employment Question Time. His answers can be found at columns 99, 100 and 104 of the Official Report for 22 April.

The other figure that we must think about is the missing figure, that is, the difference between registered claimants the Government's favoured definition and all those who are unemployed, who would gladly accept work if there was any available for them. This is a grey area. The Government have consistently fiddled the unemployment figures for the past six years.

My estimate — of course, anyone can join in this game—is that more than 1 million unemployed are not being measured by the statistics. They would accept employment if it was available to them.

We must bear in mind that each of those figures represents a human being. Many of them are young people. Their efforts and abilities are being wasted. They are probably the greatest wasted resource in our country today.

A further factor to bear in mind in our debates about employment and job creation schemes is the curious contradiction of the Prime Minister and other Ministers that is evident whenever the Tory party gets round to discussing one of the schemes. They claim that the Government cannot create jobs. Yet here are tonight discussing a scheme that the Government tell us is a job creation scheme. I believe that the Prime Minister is cynical about all these schemes. That contradiction is the reason that the Government's job creation schemes are in a mess. They are cosmetic exercises. Often they are designed more to depress wages than for any other reason. That is certainly true of the young workers scheme and the scheme we are discussing tonight.

A consistent feature about the schemes is a desire to do something — anything — about the unemployment statistics rather than tackle the real causes of unemployment. I am sure that the House would appreciate the comments that were made last week during employment Question Time when Tory Back Bencher after Tory Back Bencher suggested to the Minister various methods and means of having another fiddle of the unemployment figures.

Mr. Robert Atkins (South Ribble): Fiddle?

Mr. Evans: Yes, another fiddle of the unemployment figures. They suggested ways to reduce the total of unemployed claimants. This new wheeze — the new workers scheme — reflects that philosophy perfectly, because all the evidence of the past few years shows that it will not increase employment and will do nothing to benefit young workers. I put it on the record immediately that the next Labour Government will scrap this scheme, just as we would have scrapped the young workers scheme which it replaces.

The Employment Subsidies Act 1978, under which the Government must come to the House for approval for the new measure, provides explicitly in section 1(1):

> "The Secretary of State may . . . set up schemes for making payments to employers which will enable them to retain persons in employment who would or might otherwise become unemployed, to take on new employees, and generally to maintain or enlarge their labour force."

The new scheme, as with its predecessor, will not maintain and will certainly not enlarge the labour force.

Many trade unions will provide proof that, in many cases, youngsters employed under the YWS merely replaced older employees on higher wages. The incentive to do that is great. By replacing an 18-year-old on the average wage with a subsidised YWS employee, the employer stood to save more than 40 per cent. on labour costs. Even when creating a new job through the scheme, such an employer stood to save more than 25 per cent. Under the new scheme, with the protection of the wages councils removed from under 21-year-olds — as the Government plan to do — an employer taking on an NWS candidate will benefit from a saving of about 60 per cent. on labour costs if he sacks someone else, and of about 25 per cent. if he creates a completely new job.

Mr. George Park (Coventry, North-East): Is my hon. Friend aware that, in Coventry, 24 young people are chasing every job vacancy? The only way in which new jobs can be provided is for employers to sack other workers and take on what amounts to cheap labour.

Mr. Evans: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that important point. I am sure that almost all of my hon. Friends from all parts of the United Kingdom could make similar points about their constituencies.

The argument that the scheme will benefit the economy simply does not hold water. There is no evidence that merely by depressing wages we can reduce unemployment. The net effect on job creation—supposedly the rationale for the scheme—will be almost nil. In 1984, a study conducted by Sussex university estimated that the young workers scheme subsidised jobs that would have existed in 94 per cent. of cases anyway. Even the Government — in a Department of Employment commentary for the Select Committee on Employment entitled "Young Workers Scheme: Survey 1985" — estimated the figure to be 73 per cent. That estimate was taken from a tiny sample of 960 workers interviewed, of whom only 754 were young people.

I recall reading an article in the Financial Times in 1982, when the YWS was at its peak, stating that the scheme created only one job in 10 of those that it subsidised. I remember the article vividly because of its punch line. It arrived at the conclusion that the YWS would make our young people the most expensive shelf stackers in the history of British business. My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) and I have often been attacked by Right-wing commentators for making similar points, but we believe that the new scheme will make matters even worse.

For the youngsters who are taken on by employers under the new workers scheme, there is no guarantee of a full-time job and no guarantee of training. The youngster who, through no fault of his own, cannot find a job—the simple fact is that in many areas no jobs are available —will be rewarded for his willingness to be employed on the scheme at less than standard wages with a job that offers no training, no prospects for the future and only the scrap heap once again when his year is finished. I have a son who spent one year on YTS and a considerable time on the young workers scheme. I can therefore speak with some family knowledge of the position of the young people concerned.

The scheme is an open invitation for employers to practise job substitution. I fear that the scheme will become an adult workers substitution scheme, especially among adult female workers who earn between £70 and £100 a week. None of those female workers is likely to be on the employment register or able to claim benefit and they will often be substituted by a young female who will be on the register earning about £55 a week. The employer will therefore save money by employing the younger woman and, as far as the Government are concerned, the employment statistics will decline.

I should like to ask the Minister a question about the earnings ceiling which, according to paragraph 3 of the glossy document, is determined by the age at entry. As I read the document, young workers who are aged 19 years and 11 months will qualify for a wage of £55 a week or less. As I understand the scheme, they will not be entitled to a rise on their 20th birthday. The Minister nods in agreement, showing that my understanding of the position is correct. Therefore, the obvious time to recruit a young worker would be just prior to his 20th birthday. That means that for 11 months on the scheme, they will be earning £10 less than even the miserable maximum that the Government prescribed of £65. That is grossly unfair.

I reiterate that the scheme will not create new jobs, at least not enough to warrant the substantial expenditure that the Government are committing to it. The real intention of the scheme, which the Government have not even bothered to hide, is to depress wages in the hope that that will allow employers to afford to take on more employees.

That fantasy—I hesitate to credit the Government with a legitimate policy — is as discredited as the economic guru, Mr. Alan Walters, who dreamt up the original YWS. The fact that the Government have spent more than £190 million over the past four years simply to allow unscrupulous employers to force down the wages of young people is, I suggest, an obscene waste of taxpayers' money.

The entire concept of high wages creating high unemployment is defunct. Among young people, wages have fallen by 11 per cent. relative to adult wages over the past six years. In the meantime, youth unemployment has increased much faster than the rise experienced among other age groups. While 18 to 20-year-olds in employment earn on average two thirds of the equivalent adult wage or less, they experience unemployment rates of more than 24 per cent. It is noticeable that the NWS will not apply to the public sector and is targeted at the low paid, unorganised sector of the economy. It will have no effect on the organised highly skilled sector of the work force where youth wages have risen in line with adult wages. The Government's plans under this scheme will lead to the creation — if it does not already exist — of an institutionalised low pay sector, resistant to wage increases and to changes in wages structures.

That raises another question relating to paragraphs 20 and 25 of the glossy booklet about the way in which gross weekly earnings are calculated. The heading in the booklet is "How are earnings calculated?" According to my understanding of those paragraphs, if any young worker employed under the scheme receives overtime, shift payments, commission, bonuses, productivity payments, paid travel time or London or large town allowances, merit or skill payments, and these additional payments take the young worker's earnings over the maximum amount prescribed, no payment will be made to the employer. The Minister nods, so I presume that again I am correct. The young employee will not be permitted to refuse to work overtime or to demand night shift payment, piece work or any of the other matters that I have outlined, because there will be plenty more employees where they came from if the employer chooses to sack them because they refuse his request. They will have to do the work and they will not be paid for it.

When the coverage of the young workers scheme fell from its peak of 137,000 in 1982 to its present level of 55,000, the Government decided to merge the scheme with the youth training scheme in a two-year programme. I thought that the Government had learnt their lesson. However, with the introduction of this scheme—similar but, in my view, more damaging and less effective—I wonder how long it will be before the Government learn the biggest lesson of all: that real jobs will be created only if the Government invest in industry and expand the economy. The charity Youth Aid, commenting on the new workers scheme, said:

"The Government is not offering a solution for the young, but a further incentive to unscrupulous adults to exploit and cheat them."

That is a bitter comment, but in my view it is a fully justified complaint.

In conjunction with the plan to revitalise the economy and to invest in the infrastructure, such a scheme would be more acceptable if it were open to unemployed workers of all ages and if it were not pegged to a specific maximum earnings level. That would be genuine job creation.

There should also be a condition, which there is not in this scheme, that an additional job will be created each time an employee is taken on and that employees will be guaranteed at least a year's employment, with an element of training to be incorporated in the job. If the criterion of an additional job were met, it would kill the scandal of adult substitution which is far, far higher than the figure given by the Minister. If training were incorporated as a condition to be imposed upon employers, it could lead to what my right hon. and hon. Friends and I would support — a Government-sponsored and financed three-year apprenticeship based upon acquired standards: two years of YTS and one year of training and work.

Most craft unions are increasingly prepared to accept apprenticeships that are based upon training to standards rather than upon a time-based apprenticeship. One of the leaders of my trade union, the Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers, Gerry Russell, was reported in the Financial Times of 22 April 1986 as having said:

"Leaders of the Amalgamated Union of Engineering Workers, Britain's largest craft union, believe that its policy of including a time-based element in apprentice training should be abandoned. Mr. Gerry Russell made this clear in his chairman's address to the AUEW's policy-making national committee, which opened in Eastbourne yesterday."

I stress that that will not happen under the proposed new workers scheme. No training conditions are laid down in the scheme.

There is the additional difficulty of this anti-trade union Government being unable to obtain any co-operation from the British trade union movement, particularly since it has made it clear that it will reject root and branch the scheme that has been put before the House by the Minister.

The scheme, as it will operate if the Government have their way, does not have the backing either of the trade union movement as a whole or of the trade unions that are involved in the industries that are concerned with the scheme. As I have already said, it is targeted at those areas of the economy where union representation is minimal. It should be an additional condition of the scheme that applications will be accepted only where rates of pay, standards of safety and employee protection are high enough to be acceptable to the recognised and appropriate union and where its acceptance is given. However, as there is very little union participation, one has to ask, in view of the abolition of wages council protection for those under 21 years of age, why paragraph 10 of the explanatory booklet was printed. What does paragraph 10 mean when it says:

"It is the employer's responsibility to ensure that these obligations are met and approval of an application or payment of a claim does not imply acceptance by the Department that they are being met."

Surely it is the Department's duty to ensure that any employer who is receiving a subsidy from the taxpayer is meeting any legal requirements that the Department has laid down.

There is one further vital question that the Under-Secretary of State must answer. On Friday 24 April, the Minister for Social Security, slipped out a written answer, the effect of which was to increase disqualification from six to 13 weeks for anyone who "voluntarily leaves employment without just cause; refuses or fails, without good cause, to apply for a suitable job".—[Official Report, 25 April 1986; Vol. 96, c. 241.]

Does that apply to the new workers scheme? If so, the scheme will rapidly become known as the forced labour scheme, especially if young workers are directed to employment outside their own area—for instance, from impoverished areas in the north, where it is doubtful that there are enough employers to take on unemployed people, to the more prosperous south. Young workers will be denied the right to leave low-paid employment which is either mind-bendingly boring and repetitive — for example, shelf-stacking—or injurious to health. I am sure that the Minister will appreciate that many Labour Members could give him plenty of examples of jobs which are injurious to health.

Surely even this tyrannical Government will not deprive our young people of every liberty. Surely our young people will not have to be subject to 13 weeks' loss of benefit if they refuse low-paid employment, or if they find that they cannot live with certain conditions. I hope that the Minister will clarify that point.

That is the Tory part of the story. The good news for young people is that a Labour Government would scrap the scheme as it presently stands and incorporate it into a strategy for the general reflation of demand and output in the economy. Employment and training measures will back up this growth in a co-ordinated way, to create jobs where they are most needed, and make up the present deficiency in skills. A package of job creation measures under a Labour Government would ensure proper training for the future, adequate conditions of employment and wages which do not exploit the work force, in a realistic bid to benefit those who require jobs and the country as a whole.

Plainly, the scheme as presently constituted does not meet any of those criteria. It is a mean and contemptible scheme. It is damaging to Britain's young work force. I urge the House to reject it.

Mr. Geoff Lawler (Bradford, North): Any scheme that increases opportunities for young people must be welcomed. I believe that the new workers scheme will be welcomed. It is not short term but seeks to alter long-term entrenched attitudes which have depressed employment opportunities for youth in the past few decades. During the 1970s, the level of youth employment fell. Over the past 30 years or so, youth wages have risen consistently. It is no surprise that, in 1972 under 18-year-olds received an average wage which was 32 per cent. of an adult's wage. In 1979, they received 40 per cent. of the adult rate. That illustrates the problem for young people.

Since 1981, relative youth wages have been static. Again, it is no surprise that, in the under 20 age group, unemployment has declined in the past two years. In January 1984, the proportion of those unemployed in the 18 to 19-year-old age group was 27·4 per cent. In January this year, the figure was 25 per cent. The level of youth unemployment is going down. The figures are more dramatic for those under 18. The link is clear. It is common sense to anyone involved in industry that, if young people demand high wages, employers cannot afford to take them on. They must be paid a realistic wage.

Youth unemployment is not totally related to wage levels. Other factors govern why youth unemployment increases proportionately more than adult employment. The first thing an employer does when he enters a recession is stop recruitment. The second thing he does is lay off the people recruited most recently. For those reasons, youth tends to suffer disproportionately during a recession.

It is tragic that 153,948 people under 19 have not had a job since leaving school. Of course, there is scope for further initiatives. The immediate scope can be seen in current average earnings. An 18-year-old man commands a wage of £89·50 a week on average. That cannot reflect the true value of youth labour, given their inexperience and lack of skills and given that people are receiving training and investment. The wage rate is totally unrealistic in general for a large number of young people.

The problem is not so much the attitudes of young people. I sincerely believe that they are prepared to accept their true worth to society. Anyone who doubts that need only look at the success of YTS. About 84 per cent. of those on the scheme have said that they are happy with it. The problem lies with the unions and employers, who too readily agreed high wage levels for young people and cobbled together agreements which, over the years, excluded increasing numbers of young people from the opportunity of employment.

The problem lies also with parents. They, perhaps more often than not, influence their children and instil unrealistically high expectations. Over the past 30 years, those parents have consistently bid up the price of labour. They have placed us in our present position where youth labour in many industries is priced unrealistically high. It is priced far higher in Britain than in many of our competitor countries which have much lower youth unemployment rates.

The scheme will be of maximum benefit in three respects. First, it will be of benefit in those industries where unrealistically high wages still predominate. They are generally the most heavily unionised and have come to terms with employers and fixed high youth wages relative to adult wages. If the scheme is adopted in those industries, I hope that there will be a change of attitude and that the unions and employers will get together and use the scheme positively and constructively.

Secondly, the scheme will help those people leaving YTS with a qualification that is not particularly good. They will be at the end of the queue. The scheme will be especially helpful in encouraging those who are least well qualified to get work after YTS. It will ensure that a far higher proportion of YTS leavers find employment. It is not a coincidence that nearly half those people who have not obtained a job since leaving school have no qualifications.

Thirdly, the scheme will encourage more trade associations, employer associations and individual industries to put together three-year training schemes. The first two years will comprise YTS and the third will be the continuation year leading to apprenticeships and skill qualification. That has already happened with great success with the electrical contractors. They have increased threefold the number of young people taken into their industry—a real measure of the extent to which restructuring wage rates to more sensible levels can be of great assistance and create jobs. The construction industry is now doing the same thing. I hope that the scheme will be widely adopted by more employer groups and industries.

Of course it is of concern if any wage subsidy scheme produces an element of substitution, a certain part of which is bound to be unnecessary payment. The Government must monitor this scheme to ensure that the money goes where it is most needed. If necessary, the Government should introduce extra conditions and make the scheme more selective. That would ensure that the scheme achieves its objects and that the money is well spent.

This scheme offers many young people the first step on the employment ladder. If young people remain unemployed they have no chance. When young people get the first step on the employment ladder it does not matter what their wage is. The important thing is that they have a job and a chance to prove themselves. They can work up the ladder and achieve good wages.

11.5 pm

Mr. Michael Hancock (Portsmouth, South): On 23 April this year the Paymaster General answered a question concerning the net possible gain in jobs from this scheme. He said that there would be a gain of about 27 per cent. That begs the question of what happened to the other 73 per cent. The answer is that the Government were massaging the employment figures.

The Comptroller and Auditor General carried out a survey on the special employment measures which were administered by the Department of Employment which helps to answer the question I have posed. The report stated:

"Thus, the pay of young people is insignificant in terms of the economy as a whole. The DE suggested that whilst wider differentials must in theory help to transfer some jobs from older to younger workers, there was a risk that this might be at the expense of other vulnerable groups such as ethnic minorities, women and disabled workers. If borne out in practice, this could have significant consequences for the cost of Young Workers' Scheme: substitution of older workers by under-18s would be likely to mean increased benefit payments since older workers can be expected to have on average a higher level of benefit entitlement."

The Comptroller and Auditor General recognised that these schemes do nothing more than massage the situation and that the net gain is extremely small.

Earlier in the debate we heard of the horrific figure of 1·25 million people under 25 who are out of work and we must all be conscious that anything that looks like an opportunity for young people to have a chance of a job should be considered carefully. Experience has taught most people that these schemes hold little hope for the ambitions which, I hope, all young people have when they embark on a career.

The hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist), who intervened in the Minister's speech, spoke of the ratio of 25:1 of young people who are out of work in Coventry. In Portsmouth, that ratio is 20:1, and in the travel-to-work area it is 15:1. In an area on the south coast, a place which does not spring to mind when people discuss unemployment black spots, there are legions of young people lining up to fill any vacancy. The problem is repeated time after time throughout the country.

This proposed scheme will not hold any hope or salvation for those who so desperately look to the Government and the House to offer them the chance to fulfil their ambitions harboured over the years. A scheme such as this can have three effects on youth unemployment. The subsidy may be claimed simply because it is there and not specifically for the purpose of creating additional jobs. Some employers will look to recoup what they can in the form of the subsidy.

There can also be a displacement effect which was made clear by the hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans). The Minister has admitted that the displacement effect has an overwhelming effect on people in work. People are pushed out by the schemes.

Mr. Evans: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the likely displacement effect of the new scheme will be far worse than under the young workers scheme? It related only to 17-year-olds, but this one includes youngsters of 19 and 20 right up to their 21st birthday.

Mr. Hancock: The hon. Gentleman is right to be so pessimistic about the future. Experience must lead all hon. Members who have followed the matter carefully to see that the higher the age, the greater the effect of displacement on those in work. All hon. Members must accept the displacement argument.

My third point relates to job creation and the ability of the schemes to provide training. This measure will not expand the job market, create jobs or give people an incentive. I have read and reread the statement in the hope that I would find something that would lead me to believe that the Government were committed to investing in training. Surely, if we are ever to get to grips with the problem of 1·5 million under 25, hundreds of thousands of whom have never had a job to call their own, we must get to the nub of the problem.

I am sick to death of hearing chambers of commerce say that they do not get the right sort of people coming for jobs, that school leavers are semi-literate, and that people leave technical colleges with no skills. That is the problem. It is no use trying to bribe employers to keep down unemployment figures. The problem is that we are not providing people with the skills and ability to make them a worthwhile prospect for employment. The answer is not to bribe employers to take people off the dole queue. That will only add to and deepen the despair of many youngsters.

We shall not get out of the trough through solutions such as the one before us tonight. It is too deep for that. Until the Government recognise that significant point, unfortunately, night after night and day after day, our young people will feel frustrated, our streets will overflow with resentment and the Government will suffer from a backlash from our youth for the way in which they have been sold short. The Government can expect nothing else from people whom they have betrayed.

The hon. Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Lawler) spoke of ambitions being raised by the parents of these youngsters. Does he suggest that it is wrong to want to better oneself, to gain more for one's sweated labour and endeavours, or to try to get a bigger slice of the cake? During the 1960s and 1970s, when I was working as an engineer, my employer did not say to me, "We shall take a smaller cut in profit so that our product will be more competitive". That did not happen. But as a trade unionist, fighting for better conditions in factories, I was repeatedly told by the men, "If management can make more, surely we are entitled to a bit ourselves." Unfortunately, the hon. Gentleman is living in that rarefied atmosphere that Ministers must occupy because he seems to miss the point completely.

Is it not right for people to grow up with the ambition to have a job, and to earn a wage which will allow them at 18 to support a family and a home? Many of my constituents now aged 20 have never had a job but are still married and having children.

Mr. Lawler: My point was that many parents say to their children, "Don't take a job unless you are paid £80 or £90 a week for it." That means that one is not destroying ambition; one is destroying opportunity, because many of them will not get jobs if they expect to get £80 or £90 a week at the age of 17 or 18.

Mr. Hancock: That sounds even more absurd the second time. The hon. Member has not just missed the point; he was never in a position to grasp it if he genuinely believes that to be the case.

The debate is about the failure of the Government to create a more prosperous economy. Instead of throwing more money into a scheme that only temporarily postpones unemployment, we should surely seek to train our young people for the future. We would do far better by investing the £26 million in training that would give people the skills that employers will want to use.

The Minister spoke about his concern for the unemployed. Perhaps at the end of the day, if there is real conviction in what the Government are saying, they will be prepared to put their money where their mouth is and provide training in skills that young people need to get out of the Catch 22 situation. Employers might then not have any option but to take on people in real jobs created for the purpose of giving us a prosperous economy.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): The idea in this statement is not a new initiative: it is a re-hash of the old and discredited young workers scheme that was recently stopped because it catered for the under-18-olds who are now covered by the two-year YTS. This scheme will pay employers £15 per week for a year—provided they restrict pay to no more than £55 per week if the employee is under 20 and £65 if he is 20. It is a bribe, an inducement, to employers to pay low wages. Its sole purpose is to exert a downward leverage on pay. Together with the exclusion of young people from the orbit of wages councils, it is part of a comprehensive strategy for reducing the incomes and the standard of living of the whole of the young generation from the age of 16 to the age of 21.

Young people leaving school will be expected to go on an under-funded youth training scheme and then to go on to the low-paid new workers scheme until the age of 21. Both these schemes are brought together as a continuous whole. We now have a picture of the Government's intention and policy for youth, covering permanently the expectations of a whole generation.

Let no one delude himself that the new workers scheme will solve youth unemployment. It will produce no new jobs. It will only redistribute exising jobs. I spoke about the young workers scheme, of which this is merely an update, as discredited. It was discredited by expert ananlysis by the Public Accounts Committee and by the Institute of Manpower Studies, which said that 85 per cent. of the take-up of the scheme was "deadweight"—that is to say, that the subsidy was being claimed for jobs that existed anyway. In addition, there is the substitution effect —the subsidy causing cheaper young workers to be used at the expense of adult workers who would be displaced as a result of this deadweight because it created so few new jobs.

The Public Accounts Committee said that in 1983 the net cost of each person taken off the unemployment register by the YWS was £5,355—by far the highest net cost of any special employment measures because of the negligible employment effect. When the YWS was abolished we thought this had been recognised, but it had not; it was abolished because it clashed with two-year youth training scheme. It has now been revamped to take over after YTS and to continue low-paid employment.

There would be something to be said for an employment subsidy if it were paid for those workers who it could be demonstrated were additional, and, most importantly, if it were not attached to a particular and very low level of wages—in other words, if the subsidy were not part of a concerted policy of reducing the pay of the lowest paid, not part of the misguided nonsense of pricing people into jobs. But that is what it is; this is what we have to consider. The Government are deluded. Their sole policy for tackling unemployment is reducing wages. That is the only idea they have in their head, and it is a fatally flawed one, as all experience shows. This is why they abolished the fair wages resolution which said that workers on Government contracts should have fair wages. It is why they abolished schedule 11 to the Employment Protection Act. It is why they are attacking wages councils and excluding young people from their jurisdiction.

What has been the practical effect of all this? Despite these measures, unemployment has continually increased. It has trebled since the Conservatives came to office. They can think only of more of the same. They believe that the only way to get people off the dole is to move them into sweat shops. Working people are being told that they are the cause of unemployment and that unless they take lower wages, to price themselves into jobs, unemployment will continue to rise.

That is the central plank of Government policy, strategy based on a flawed theory which is causing widespread poverty and hardship, for only the poorer people are having their wages reduced. The latest earnings survey showed that in 1985, the bottom 10 per cent. had pay increases of less than the rate of inflation, while the top 10 per cent. had increases of well above that. It is no accident that the rich are getting richer and the poor poorer. It is happening because of Government policies such as the measure we are debating tonight.

Nor do the Government's polices lead to more jobs. For example, the Contract Cleaning and Maintenance Association said in May 1984 in its submission to the Select Committee about the effect of abolishing the fair wages resolution:

"A directive from the Treasury shortly before the recession pointed out that the Resolution would no longer apply to public sector contracts, and provided guidance. In some cases, individual contracts were actually renegotiated (rather than waiting for the existing contract to expire) with two results: (a) an increase in productivity and a reduction in number of cleaning staff employed; and (b) reductions of wages and of other terms and conditions of employment for cleaning staff. These results were the inevitable consequence of the requirement imposed on the cleaning contractors concerned to reduce contract prices. With regard to the renegotiation of contracts, either at the end of the contract or before, the Association believes that there is a very real possibility that the employment of staff at lower rates of pay than those currently obtaining could, through a parallel reduction in the quality or motivation of staff, lead to a lower standard of service."

Thus, the effect of abolishing the fair wages, resolution has been threefold. The first has been a reduction in wages; the second, a reduction in the numbers employed; and the third, a lower standard of service. What an appalling collection of results.

Has the House noticed what is happening at the driver and vehicle licensing centre, Swansea? A report appeared in The Guardian on March 3—a similar story appeared in The Daily Telegraph—saying:

"Women cleaners at the Government's Driver and Vehicle Licensing Centre in Swansea are protesting to their MPs about the new employment deal which will mean more work for less pay. The private contractors who employ them are proposing to reduce the workforce from 130 to 102. The women, who earn £27 a week, will also have to take a pay cut of 30p an hour, lose their holiday money and carry out their nightly work in two and a half hours instead of three. The firm, Exclusive Cleaners of Bristol, is out to save £132,000 on a new contract with the Department of Transport beginning on March 24. The firm has told the women that the employment deal is not for negotiation."

The result of cutting these already pitiful wages is the employment of not more but fewer workers. Nor does it matter by how much wages are cut in our great public services, because the Government are setting out to rein back the numbers employed in the public sector and are limiting local authority expenditure in areas such as construction.

This measure, to reduce young people's pay, has no intellctual credibility. It is based not on evidence but on prejudice, dogma and the ideological spite of the hard Right. I was told in a parliamentary reply on January 16 last that between April 1979 and April 1984, the average gross earnings of males over 21 had increased by 79 per cent., that those of 18 to 20-year-olds had increased by only 63 per cent. and that those of the under-18s had increased by only 57 per cent. In other words, male youth wages fell by 23 per cent. compared with those of male adults, and young women's pay fell by 30 per cent. We have had the equivalent of a laboratory experiment in cutting youth wages. Did it work? Were more employed? We all know the answer. Youth unemployment has actually trebled and gone up disproportionately. So the argument is completely bogus, and there is no reputable basis for this spiteful measure.

In considering whether lower pay is the way to higher employment, we may note that this was not the approach taken recently with the higher-paid civil servants, the judges or the top brass in the armed forces. We may also note that unemployment in Britain is higher where wages are lowest, and vice versa.

The last piece of evidence that I want to consider is the working of the Equal Pay Act in the 1970s. In that decade its aim was to achieve equal pay for the same work over a five-year period. Had it been brought forward now, a decade later, I am sure that the Government would, under their present dogma, have claimed that lifting women's pay would damage their employment prospects. Although the law had loopholes, there was a sharp rise in the relative pay of women; but this did not stop the trend of increasing female participation in the labour force. Women's pay rose faster than men's and so did women's employment, thus denying and disproving the pricing-out theory about jobs.

The phoney pricing-out theory is used by the Government to attack the young and the low-paid, and to excuse and shift the blame from the failures of their economic policy. The new workers scheme, a low-paid scheme for young workers, is not the route to job creation; it merely impedes discussion of how to tackle unemployment. While others are enriched, it is an attempt to put the whole of the younger generation up to the age of 21 in a straitjacket of low pay. This will show young people who their enemies are and mobilise them for a change of Government as soon as possible, and hence a more hopeful future.

Mr. Lang: When we started our debate tonight, I said that it was about jobs for young people. Various points have been made by right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House—I shall take them up in a moment—but I remain convinced that this is an issue on which there is no real division, on party or any other lines, about our objectives. We all want to see young people properly equipped for working life, with the right preparation and grounding and with their own particular aspirations and ambitions.

The hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) referred to the unemployment levels for young people, and asked about some of the figures for the lower age range. He may like to know that in January 1979, when his party was in power, those under 20 represented 17·3 per cent. of total unemployed; in January of this year those under 20 represented 15·5 per cent. In the case of the under-18s—my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Lawler) also introduced some interesting figures—where unemployment was more than twice as high as the overall national rate in January 1979, when the last Labour Government was in power, it was down to less than 50 per cent. more by January 1986.

The hon. Gentleman referred to a report by Sussex university which I believe was undertaken in 1982, rather than 1984, and so was done at the very outset of the young workers scheme, when the figures and the impact were very unclear. It said that the net effect on job creation, he tells us, was nil — but, of course, the subsequent research carried out more recently has shown that the figure of new job creation has been steadily rising and is now estimated at about 27 per cent. Some 90,000 new jobs have been created.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will believe that, if the Government did not think that there was merit in this scheme, we would not be contemplating putting taxpayers' money into a successor scheme, based largely on the outline of the original scheme.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the fact that there was no training, as he claimed, on the young workers scheme. I draw his attention to the fact that 22 per cent. of the members of the young workers scheme were on formal apprenticeships, 50 per cent. had some induction training and 72 per cent. had some informal, on-the-job training. As to gross weekly earnings, and the hon. Gentleman's anxiety about overtime, we have certainly set the earnings for the different age groups at specific levels, but if an employee rose above those limits he would leave the scheme; he would remain in the employment of the employer but the employer would no longer claim the £15 subsidy. Alternatively, instead of giving him increased overtime, the employer could take on another new worker and thus create another job.

Mr. Evans: As many youngsters will be expected by their employers to work overtime, if a youngster works overtime, let us say, on a Saturday or a Sunday and is given overtime payment, and that takes his payment above the qualifying level, does that mean that the job subsidy will stop? If that is the case, the youngster will be expected to work overtime, and the employer simply will not pay him.

Mr. Lang: The limit of £55 for 18 and 19-year-olds and £65 for 20-year-olds is an upper limit which must include such things as overtime or other additional payments.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the benefit position, but there is no change in the way that benefit sanctions are applied. The possible disqualification period is simply extended from six to 13 weeks. As for young people being forced into the young workers scheme, so far some 435,000 applications have been voluntarily made by the employers, and there has been no problem in finding 435,000 young workers to go on to those schemes.

Mr. Nellist: I am sure that the Minister will appreciate this correction. When he opened the debate, I challenged him on job substitution, on an analysis made by the Department of Employment of the previous young workers scheme, predicting the same result for this scheme. Does he remember that his Department commissioned the Institute of Manpower Studies to analyse the young workers scheme and it showed that 94 per cent. Of the jobs in that scheme already existed and only 6 per cent. were created? His Department's evidence to the Public Accounts Committee on 28 February 1984 showed that 77 per cent. of the jobs on the young workers scheme were old jobs. Finally, research paper No. 42, commissioned by the Department of Employment and written by Mr. Bill Wells, shows on page 70 that for reduction of young workers' wages some 68 per cent. to 86 per cent.—not 8 per cent.—of any jobs created would be substitution. The scheme is elastoplast politics playing with the ages of the unemployed, shifting around the unemployment problem, not creating new jobs for workers.

Mr. Lang: It is a pity that the hon. Gentleman did not remain for the debate to make his speech instead of intervening in my opening speech and then returning to intervene when I reply.

Mr. Nellist: I went to the Library to get the figures.

Mr. Lang: Several other points have been made by other hon. Members about substitution, but at present I am dealing with the point raised by the hon. Member for St. Helens, North. Young people whose wages were forced up by trade unions during the late 1970s in order to demonstrate their muscle, were exploited in the sense that, when reality set in and the demand for their labour began to decline, it was the young workers who were the first to lose their jobs because they were over-priced in the market.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North made a number of sensible points. He was right to emphasise the commonsense aspect of having a scheme which allows young workers to move into the world of employment at an appropriate wage rate, related to their experience and ability to deliver. I was interested in his proposal about a three-year training scheme and I can assure him that we shall be monitoring the new scheme carefully.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) complained about the net cost to the Exchequer, and quoted a figure of £5,553. That figure is completely out of date. The figures published in the public expenditure White Paper show a net cost to the Exchequer in 1984-85 of £2,400 and in 1985-86 of £1,400 for the young workers scheme per person removed from unemployment and in a job. That figure takes account of the deadweight and the substitution to which hon. Members have referred and which they have exaggerated. Those figures compare interestingly with the £7,000 net cost to the Exchequer mentioned in the Select Committee's recent subsidy scheme.

As for our estimate for the new workers scheme, that would be even lower than the £1,400 and might be in the range of £1,300. The generation of new jobs by the young workers scheme has been increasingly successful. Perhaps the Opposition cannot believe the growing success of our schemes because their schemes in the 1970s—the youth and adult employment subsidies—had such poor results.

The hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) referred to the 27 per cent. new jobs created and seemed completely to dismiss them, although they amount to some 90,000 new jobs. He referred to the 63 per cent. or 64 per cent. deadweight like a pessimist who prefers to say that a whisky bottle is half-empty when an optimist would say it was half-full. I am bound to say that I find his whole approach profoundly depressing. As for the reference to displacement being overwhelming, I made no such reference. The displacement or substitution is around 10 per cent. As I pointed out to the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) the adult substitution is around 8 per cent., not the 80 per cent. figure that the hon. Gentleman tried to suggest to the House.

The rest of the speech of the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South was a mixture of woolly emotional nonsense, completely lacking in any constructive policy proposals, entirely out of touch with the trend of young unemployment, which is now down, and addressing itself to no specific details of our policies. It might have been more interesting for the House if he had offered one constructive policy of his own.

It is important to realise that we are introducing the new workers scheme into a situation in which, while we are deeply concerned about the scale of youth unemployment, nevertheless there are positive signs of progress. Taking the three years to January of this year, unemployment has fallen by 35,000—16 per cent.—among under 18-year-olds, by 28,000—7·5 per cent.—among 18 and 19-year-olds and by 63,000—11 per cent.—for all those under 20. Three years ago, those under 20 represented over 18 per cent. of the total unemployed. Now, that figure is around 15·5 per cent. of the total.

The position for young people, therefore, has improved in absolute numbers and vis-à-vis other groups. There are a number of reasons. Of course, the introduction of YTS has had an effect. So have demographic changes, as well as the general level of demand, which reflects the success of our wider employment and enterprise policies, generating 1 million extra jobs in the same period.

Mr. Evans: Will the Minister concede that there are still 1 million fewer in employment now than there were in 1979 when the Tory Government took office?

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman should look at the figures. Of course jobs were lost in 1980 and 1981 in large numbers when we picked up the tab for five years of Socialism and inherited an economy in which industrial relations were in chaos, inflation was rife, overmanning was rampant and jobs were waiting to be blown away at the first gust of the recessionary wind. Since 1981, we have been able to pick up the pieces and gradually generate new jobs. Year by year, we have had success in creating new jobs in increasingly large numbers. We now see not only over 1 million new jobs created since 1983 but youth unemployment, according to the figures that I have just given, steadily falling.

We have also seen, particularly since 1982——

Mr. Nellist: Will the Minister accept that, of the new jobs that the Government claim to have created, some 574,000 are women's jobs? According to a written answer by his Department this week, 99 per cent. of those 574,000 new women's jobs are part-time jobs of less, or far less, than 30 hours. If one were to count the number of new jobs on a full-time equivalent basis, the 1 million figure would be seen for the chimera that it is.

Mr. Lang: I am not sure what is wrong with women's jobs. Many women have decided to return to the labour market. That, in addition to the increasing number of school leavers coming into the jobs market as against pensioners retiring from it, has meant that we have had to move still faster to stand still. I do not see what is wrong with part-time jobs. Over 500,000 part-time women's jobs have been created in the last few years. These are jobs that people want—employers and women want them—jobs that create extra flexibility in the economy. I do not see any justification for the hon. Gentleman describing them in so derogatory away.

What we have also seen, particularly since 1982, is some movement towards a widening of the dangerously narrow gap between the pay rates of young people and adults. I am careful not to ascribe the happy effects of falling youth unemployment solely to this decline in relative pay. There are, as I have said, other factors, but the turning of the tide on young people's pay relativities has not come a moment too soon.

Less than 20 years ago, a school leaver joining a factory at 15, would expect to take up to six years to reach the adult rate, at 21. Since then, that six-year period has been compressed, in many cases, into a two-year period between 16 years of age and 18, with serious consequences for youth unemployment levels. We have had to work hard to try to get the message across that pay rates for young people that are too high are a handicap to them in convincing employers to take them on rather than other groups of workers.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Does my hon. Friend agree that the German system of not paying school leavers any more when they leave at 16 than a young worker starting on a training period is a good one?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend makes an extremely sensible point. The German approach is realistic and sensible and may to some extent, account for the strength of the German economy.

We still have a long way to go. For example, engineering wage relativities are generally about 20 percentage points higher now than they were 20 years ago. The importance of the new workers scheme is that, like the YWS which it succeeds, it encourages employers and young people to be sensible about young people's pay, to offer jobs to more of them rather than unrealistically high wages to just a few. The young workers scheme was successful and had some effect. Relative pay rates for young people have declined since 1982. We also believe that the new workers scheme is the sort of help wanted by employers, many of them small businesses.

Mr. Lawler: Does my hon. Friend accept that, of the 1 million or so jobs created over the past three years, some 450,000 have gone to self-employment? Does that not offer great hope for future employment growth?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is right, and I am glad that he recognises, as do all my right hon. and hon. Friends, the great importance of self-employment—that it has created new jobs. We now have the highest proportion of self-employed in the economy since 1921, and that bodes well for the future. It is also of interest that the vast majority of jobs on the young workers scheme went to small firms; that will be reflected in the development of the scheme.

Of course, the scheme will direct some jobs towards young people rather than older workers. That is our aim in singling out this age group for special help. It is, like the Government's other employment measures, carefully designed and cost-effective. It also fits into our broader strategies. It complements the two-year YTS, the national insurance changes and the wages council proposals. Young people know that our measures work—over 1 million through YTS — and a quarter of enterprise allowance businesses are run by under-25s. That bodes well for the continuing development of enterprise.

If only the number of new company starts under the 1974-79 Labour Government had equalled the level of company starts now, we would be facing a far more encouraging prospect for jobs. Over 435,000 jobs have been supported by the young workers scheme. The new workers scheme, too, offers practical help, where it is needed, for young people entering the labour market, and their employers. I commend the motion to the House.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): This measure is the latest example of class politics. It has nowt to do with creating jobs for young or old workers, but everything to do with the Government's essential philosophy of driving down workers' wages to allow the employers more profit. Every shred of evidence that has been examined, whether from the Midland Bank review, the Institute of Manpower Studies or the Department of Employment's research, shows that reductions in young workers' wages have not solved the problem of youth unemployment.

This measure carries all the hallmarks of the anti-youth, anti-working class measure that the YTS was. The real reason for the scheme should be written into the Official Report. It is designed to create a generation of youth on a conveyor belt. It is coming out of school used to £27 quid a week on the YTS. These workers would be on £44 a week if that allowance had risen with the general level of earnings since the scheme's inception in 1978. There has been a £17 a week cut in the training allowance given to young people. The general level of school leavers' wages has fallen by 12 per cent. for boys and 13 per cent. for girls since 1979, yet youth unemployment has trebled.

[Mr. Dave Nellist]

As Nye Bevan used to say in this place, "Why look in the crystal ball when you can read the book?" The Government's record shows that all they are interested in doing is driving down the wages of young people. Job creation will happen at the expense of older workers.

This is a cheap and nasty measure that ought to be thrown out by the House.

Tellers for the Noes:

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House authorises the Secretary of State to set up, in accordance with section 1(1) of the Employment Subsidies Act 1978, a scheme, the cost of which is expected to exceed £10 million for the year ending 31st March 1987, for making payments to employers to enable them to take on as new employees young people with earnings below the limits specified in the statement laid before the House on 22nd April 1986.

Redundant Miners (Coal Allowances)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Maude.]

11.56 pm

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): This debate is about the forgotten miners. These men were mostly made redundant during the large scale pit closures of the 1960s. Despite the fact that many of these men had worked down the mines from the age of 14, despite the fact that they worked under far worse conditions than pertain in the industry today and despite the fact that they received only a pittance in redundancy pay, these men, who were made redundant by the Wilson Government in the 1960s, did not qualify for concessionary coal if they were under 60 when they were made redundant. That was in spite of the fact that most of these men contributed to coal pools to make provision for retired miners under the old system.

These men missed out in a great many ways. They missed out when in 1973 the Heath Government reduced the qualifying age for concessionary coal to 55 but back-dated that only to 1969. They also missed out when, under this Government, the age was reduced to 50 in 1983 with no back-dating. Above all, they missed out when, in the 1960s, they were so ungratefully taken for granted by politicians who for too long had taken their votes for granted.

I would not claim that all of the benefits for the mining industry have stemmed from Conservative Governments, but many, if not most, have, especially when it comes to concessionary coal. We have a proud record, which is all the more reason to go a little further and complete the picture. The Coal Board figures show that the cost of extending the concessionary coal benefit to the forgotten miners would be about £3 million. That is a tiny fraction of the total cost of concessionary coal and is just over one tenth of 1 per cent. of the total taxpayers' subsidy, both direct and indirect, to the coal industry.

I accept that this matter greatly affects my constituency. In fact, about 10,000 men were made redundant as a result of the wide-scale pit closures in the area during the 1960s. That figure represents almost half of the total proposed redundancies which in 1983 and 1984 caused the miners' strike. However, in the 1960s, when a Labour Government were in power, it did not cause a cheep. In addition to being a matter of concern to my constituency, it is also a matter of great concern to many other right hon. and hon. Members, as witnessed by the fact that nearly 100 Members of Parliament signed early-day motions on the subject.

I do not necessarily expect my hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, West (Mr. Hunt), the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy, to give an affirmative answer tonight, but I ask him to go away and consider, with his colleagues, the fact that the case and the cause of these forgotten miners is just. The cost is not great, but the injustice most certainly is great. I hope that he will consult his colleagues and do his utmost to ensure that these forgotten miners are not forgotten for very much longer.

I am pleased to see that the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) is now in the Chamber. I am sure that he will be straining at the leash to make a contribution to this debate. I am aware that other hon. Members have raised this matter on previous occasions. I welcome very much their support, including that of the hon. Member for Bolsover, for this campaign. However, I have to put the hon. Member straight on a few points.

During our debate in March on concessionary coal the hon. Member for Bolsover tried to make out that he had been tirelessly pushing this cause for years, but he was well wide of the mark. During that debate the hon. Member claimed to have raised the matter during previous debates on concessionary coal. I remember that the hon. Member refused to accept interventions during his speech in that debate. I understand why very well. I checked his contribution to the 1985 debate and found that although during his speech, which lasted for more than 30 minutes, he waxed very lyrical upon a number of subjects, including the miners' strike and that although, with his well-known charm, he scattered insults at several Conservative Members who attended that debate, so great were his oratorical efforts that he did not manage to say one word in support of the forgotten miners.

Despite the hon. Member's record of having raised the matter during the early days of this Government, he seemed oddly unwilling to push the case in Parliament during the period in office of the last Labour Government, when one might have thought that he might have exerted some influence. But perhaps I underestimate the Treasury Bench of that time.

I know that the hon. Member likes to think of himself as a relentless pursuer of truth, as a true parliamentarian and as the man who speaks for Joe Average. Considering, therefore, his much-vaunted fearlessness, I find it astonishing that he should not have given way once during the last debate on concessionary coal, so that his misapprehensions might be put right. None the less, I am sure that he now welcomes the fact that the record is being put straight. It would be churlish of me not to accept the hon. Member for Bolsover's support of those Conservative Members who are fighting this cause. If he can do his utmost to couch that support in sensible and sane terms, it will be valuable and welcome.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): I am pleased to be able to take part in the debate and put the record straight. It is well known by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy and by my hon. Friend the Member for Leigh (Mr. Cunliffe) that I and many other Opposition Members have raised this matter on many previous occasions. I have checked the record.

On 22 March 1983 there was a debate similar to that which was held in March 1986. The Financial Secretary to the Treasury was then the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy. At column 820 of that debate I made another intervention. It was the fifth or the sixth on the subject since I have been a Member of Parliament. I called upon the then Under-Secretary of State for Energy to take into account the deprived miners and their widows in the southern end of my constituency, and others in Lancashire, who are unable to get coal. It will be seen that at that time the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy said that he would take the matter on board. He referred to the matter twice in reply, and said that although he could not guarantee anything, he would look at it.

As for not raising the matter when my right hon. and hon. Friends were in office, I can assure the hon. Gentleman that it did not matter to me which Government were in power. Quite frankly, I think that those few thousand people have had a raw deal from both Governments. When the redundancy payments and concessionary coal legislation was passed in the House of Commons, it should have been back dated to include those pre-1968 cases. It is scandalous that those people have been deprived of coal. Many of those miners worked in the industry for more than 40 years, and some are survived by widows.

I am pleased to be able to put the matter on the record for the umpteenth time. I ask the Minister to look at it further. That is the reason why I have written. During the past few weeks I have written——

Mr. David Ashby (Leicestershire, North-West) rose——

Mr. Skinner: I am not allowed to give way in such a debate. I am sorry, but those are the rules. I wrote to the Secretary of State for Energy some weeks ago. The reply I received was unhelpful to the constituents concerned. Therefore, I wrote to the Prime Minister recently, asking her to reconsider the views of the right hon. Gentleman so that she might intervene and the people concerned could receive the coal that they richly deserve. I have put the matter straight. Hansard is a document that anyone can read. What I have said is absolutely correct. If hon. Gentlemen wish to read the Hansard record of the position of previous Governments, they will find many references made by myself, by my hon. Friends and members of the mining group. It is high time that the Minister did something on behalf of the miners concerned and provided them with five loads of coal a year. That has been provided to many people who have not worked in the industry for 40 years. These miners are unable to receive that concession.

I am told that the cost of providing this necessary benefit to those who have given their all to the industry will be about £3 million per annum.

12.2 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. David Hunt): My hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim) is to be congratulated on securing this important opportunity to raise an issue which, as he has reminded us, is of great concern to many of his constituents and to many former miners. I believe that my hon. Friend has already lobbied extensively on their behalf and has established an excellent reputation as a good constituency Member of Parliament. He made a strong and clearly heartfelt plea in support of ex-miners in his constituency. I recognise the strength of feeling on this issue in many mining communities. My hon. Friends the Members for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby), for Elmet (Mr. Batiste), for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart), for Nottingham, North (Mr. Ottaway) and for Warwickshire, North (Mr. Maude) are present in the Chamber, along with the hon. Members for Leigh (Mr. Cunliffe) and for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner). I fully understand the disappointment that is felt by those who contributed to coal pools when they were working but who, under the rules of the schemes to which they contributed, have no entitlement to concessionary coal following redundancy.

I have listened carefully to the points raised, but I would not be honest if I did not make it clear that I cannot see any possibility, after all these years, of introducing new measures to benefit this small group. I know that the hon. Member for Bolsover said that those people have had a raw deal. He put forward some compelling arguments. I think that he was the first hon. Member, during this short debate, to point out that the cost of providing the coal is £3 million. One of the reasons why it is not possible to benefit this small group is the cost involved. My hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley cited the figure of £3 million. The cost of covering this situation could be expected to amount to many millions of pounds over the years.

Equally important is the impossibility of achieving the end desired by my hon. Friend without creating new difficulties. Just as concessionary coal to serving workers is part of their remuneration, concessionary coal to redundant mineworkers is part of their redundancy package. Redundancy terms for mineworkers, including the provision of concessionary coal, have been improved on numerous occasions over the years and there is no possibility of retrospectively awarding to those who left in earlier years the generous terms now available. Any attempt now to apply to those who left under one set of terms part of a system of benefits introduced later would produce grievances at least as strong as those which it was intended to satisfy.

Hon. Members will know the history of concessionary coal. It is one of progressive improvement. The practice of supplying free or cheap coal to mineworkers finds its derivation in the necessity for domestic heating of water for daily baths. Because of the absence of pithead baths, those baths had to be taken at home. As time went by, concessionary coal came to be looked upon by the men and, to some extent, by the coal owners as part of wages. As a result, although the need for bathing at home was progressively eliminated with the general provision of pithead baths, the concession continued, although in some cases at a reduced rate.

Concessions on coal became one of the matters to be negotiated as part of the wage bargaining system. The concessions came to benefit not only serving workers but retired workers, widows and sick and injured workers. The coal became, and still is, much prized amongst all those groups.

Since nationalisation, the National Coal Board has done a great deal to negotiate new agreements designed to remove anomalies and standardise entitlements. Initially, this involved the negotiation of agreements covering whole wages districts. Where these extended the supply of coal to categories of beneficiaries not previously entitled, this was done at the expense of serving workers, who accepted a reduction in their entitlement or agreed to contribute a proportion of them to a pool to be used for the benefit of retired, sick or injured men and widows. These still complex arrangements were further complicated by the advent of clean air legislation and the need to make special arrangements for concessionaires living in smokeless zones. In 1961, a national agreement was negotiated with the unions providing for the supply of smokeless fuel in these zones on standard terms and conditions.

In 1962 the NCB agreed that redundant men over 60 at the date of redundancy should be treated as retired men for concessionary coal purposes. However, where coal was provided under pooling schemes it was left to the local committee of management to agree to an increased level of contributions for serving workers to provide coal for the redundant men. Not all committees of management agreed, and in the 1960s there were still many anomalies in the supply of concessionary coal.

The rundown in numbers of serving workers in the industry, as my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley pointed out, had a significant impact on the relative proportions of serving workers to beneficiaries, and hence on coal pooling schemes. To keep the schemes in balance, each serving worker's contribution to the pool needed to be increased, or each beneficiary's entitlement reduced, or both. In practice, that did not happen to a significant extent and the pools ran up substantial deficits and ceased to be viable. In the Coal Industry Act 1965 powers were given to the Government to reimburse to the NCB part of the costs of maintaining arrangements for benefits in kind in areas where the number of persons employed by the board had fallen since the end of March 1965 as a consequence of the closure of collieries. This power has been kept in being through later legislation, and presently derives from section 6 of the Coal Industry Act 1977. Last year, using that power to make substantial contributions to help the board finance the maintenance of concessionary coal arrangements, the Government contributed £18 million.

Following the introduction of the first redundant mineworkers payments scheme in 1968, which provided benefits for men aged 55 or over on redundancy who otherwise satisfied the requirements of the scheme, there was pressure to enhance the terms available to enable such men to receive concessionary coal as though they had reached normal retirement age. The Government responded to this pressure in the Coal Industry Act 1973, amending the power to make schemes benefiting redundant mineworkers in the 1967 Act. In that same year the first concessionary coal payments scheme was introduced by order. This provided for reimbursement to the National Coal Board of the full cost of concessionary coal to men aged 55 to 59 who qualified for benefits under the redundant mineworkers payments scheme from 14 December 1969, and half the cost of providing concessionary coal to such men age 60 to 65.

Benefits under the redundant mineworkers payments scheme were successively improved over the years, and in 1983 weekly benefits under the scheme were introduced for those aged 50 to 54 on redundancy. The concessionary coal payments scheme was extended to cover this group at the same time. Last year the Government paid the National Coal Board under the concessionary coal payments scheme £13 million in addition to the £18 million I mentioned earlier.

Throughout this period negotiations between the board and the NUM on the provision of concessionary coal continued, and in October 1983 the present national concessionary fuels agreement finally came into operation. This provides for uniform direct entitlement of retired miners and widows to coal. It generally increased coal allowances, but restricted the availability of cash in lieu save in cases of genuine medical difficulty.

I hope that hon. Members who are familiar with the history of concessionary coal will forgive me for having briefly outlined some of its more important features.

Mr. Skinner rose——

Mr. Hunt: After I have dealt with the intervention of the hon. Member for Bolsover, there are two aspects to which I wish to draw attention.

Mr. Skinner: The thing which rankles with the people who are not receiving coal—I do not think the Minister has touched upon it—is that all those who do not receive coal but who ought to made a contribution to the local pool schemes, some for 40 years. In Derbyshire the people used to contribute 30 cwt. of their total annual entitlement. This is like someone paying into an unemployment scheme or a social security scheme for 40 years and not getting his entitlement at the end. That is the injustice, and that is why they believe that they have a case.

The previous Tory Government introduced a scheme to give retirement pensions to those aged 80 years, even though some of those people had not contributed. That was a sensible thing to do. It is not as though the Government are being asked to do something which previous Tory Governments have not done in other areas.

Mr. Hunt: The hon. Member will surely recollect that I dealt with that point in my opening sentences. I said that I fully understood the disappointment which is felt by those who contributed to coal pools when they were working but who, under the rules of the schemes to which they contributed, had no entitlement to concessionary coal following redundancy. That was the rule of the scheme to which they contributed and it made no provision for them to have that benefit.

The two other aspects to which I wish to draw attention are, first, the progress which has been made over the years in improving the arrangements under which concessionary coal is provided to beneficiaries and those who have left the industry on redundancy; and, secondly, the extent to which this Government have contributed financially to make this possible.

It is against this background that I must say that any change now will create anomalies and injustices at least as severe as any it might remove. For example, if it were decided that henceforth the Government should meet the cost of providing concessionary coal to anyone who qualified under the first redundant mineworkers payments scheme but was made redundant before the effective date of the concessionary coal payments scheme in December 1969, this would merely add to the grievance of those whose redundancy fell before 17 July 1967, and who, therefore, never had the advantage of benefits under the redundant mineworkers payments scheme in the first place. If, however, the relevant date is taken back to before 17 July 1967, the men cannot meet the requirement under concessionary coal payments scheme legislation to have satisfied the conditions for receipt of redundant mineworkers payments scheme benefits, and it is now impossible to know who, but for the fact that the RMPS had not been introduced, would have satisfied equivalent conditions. So this requirement would have to be waived. But that would inevitably create a sense of grievance among those who became redundant later, but who failed to satisfy the conditions which have subsequently been removed for men who left earlier.

Furthermore, what about those who would be covered by any new concession but for the fact that they have no ability to use concessionary coal? I am thinking of those who have perhaps moved into houses where they do not have the ability to burn coal, or who, since we are now talking about quite elderly people, might have gone into homes or warden-assisted accommodation. Are we to give them cash in lieu, even where under the terms of the present national concessionary fuel agreement they would not be entitled to it? If we are to give cash in lieu, we are no longer talking about the provision of concessionary coal; we are talking about a further state cash benefit to some of those who received redundancy benefits from the coal industry in the 1960s. Alternatively, are we to let such people sell their concessionary coal, even where this would lead to loss of entitlement to anyone receiving coal under the present national concessionary fuel agreement?

My hon. Friend has made a compelling case. I appreciate the regard in which concessionary coal is held in mining areas, and can understand the disappointment of those who contributed to coal pools when they were working, left the industry on redundancy in the 1960s, but under the rules of the schemes to which they contributed have no entitlement to concessionary coal. But there is no magic wand which can be waved to satisfy this group without creating anomalies and injustices at least as acute as those which it was designed to cure. Nor can the money for a further concession by conjured up from nowhere.

The history of the provision of concessionary coal to redundant miners, retired miners, sick and injured miners and widows is one of progress. Successive Governments have provided generous financial support to help make that progress possible, but I can hold out no prospect of the further concession which in tonight's debate my hon. Friend has so ably argued should be made.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

SCOTLAND

British Leyland Bathgate

1. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what financial assistance he is making available to the area of employment covered by British Leyland, Bathgate.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Alan Stewart): The Bathgate travel-to-work area is a development area, and assistance to industry there is at the highest available levels. Good progress is being made in giving effect to the special programme of measures recommended in 1984 by the Bathgate working party.

Mr. Dalyell: How is good progress defined? What new money and new initiatives are available?

Mr. Stewart: The Scottish Development Agency has recently committed £7 million to the Bathgate area. That involves environmental improvements, business development and better communications through the new passenger rail link between Bathgate and Edinburgh, which was opened by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State on 24 March. That is a sign of our commitment to the area.

Mr. Ewing: We saw the Secretary of State with his green flag waving the train away from Bathgate, just as during the past six years we have seen the Conservative Government wave away industry and employment from the Bathgate area. Does the Under-Secretary understand that the best thing that could happen to Bathgate, the entire Lothian region, Central region, Fife, Strathclyde and all the regions would be for the people of Scotland to vote in large numbers for Labour candidates next Thursday and get rid of every last vestige of Conservative administration, which has done so much damage to Bathgate and the Scottish economy?

Mr. Stewart: My hon. Friends and I were wearily aware that we would hear that speech at some time during this week. A feature of the past six years is that the Labour party has waved away reality, the ability to face the facts and the ability to recognise the industrial successes that are increasingly obvious throughout Scotland.

AIDS

2. Mr. McKelvey asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is being done in Scotland to control the spread of acquired immune deficiency syndrome.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. John MacKay): In the blood transfusion service we are screening all blood donations and are heat treating blood products needed by haemophiliacs. We are supporting epidemiological research, providing testing facilities, promoting a press publication campaign to advise people about the disease and what can be done to avoid infection.

Mr. McKelvey: Nevertheless, the Minister must be seriously worried about the spread of the AIDS virus among heroin addicts, especially in Edinburgh, and more recently, in Dundee. The habit of intravenous injections is creating the problem. Will the Minister seriously consider making brand new needles more readily available in the rest of Scotland so that we may stem the flow of AIDS?

Mr. MacKay: I am afraid that there is no guarantee that making needles available to drug abusers would prevent drug misusers from sharing the needles in an even wider circle. There is evidence from some drug misusers that they would do that. My Department's chief medical officer has appointed a committee of experts to advise on this aspect and on other methods of controlling the spread of infection among drug misusers. However, the message is simple and clear: do not misuse drugs.

Mr. Henderson: Does my hon. Friend agree that the best way to control drugs and the spread of AIDS would be to encourage more self-discipline and higher moral standards among the population at large? Is he surprised that he has not heard more from the Churches on this subject?

Mr. MacKay: My hon. Friend has hit the nail on the head. AIDS is a totally self-inflicted illness, and it is so much more morally reprehensible when it is inflicted on children. It is wrong that some people are inflicting AIDS on their unborn children—[Interruption.] I agree with hon. Members that this is serious. It is a moral question, which comes down to people reviewing their living habits.

Mr. Maxton: That is a most remarkable statement and a major condemnation of large numbers of people who just happen to have a life style different from that of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State. Will he ensure that the committee of investigation reconsiders the use of clean needles by drug users? If the Minister is so sure, will he say today that he will provide the Greater Glasgow health board with sufficient funds to ensure that there is no threat whatever to the Ruchill laboratory, which does the testing for the disease?

Mr. MacKay: I made it quite clear in my initial answer that the committee of experts is considering the matter. I shall take advice from it. I find it quite amazing that the hon. Member has just condemned me for condemning certain life styles. Does that mean that he condones drug abuse?

Strathclyde (Manufacturing Industry)

3. Mr. James Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will next meet Strathclyde regional council to discuss the prospects for manufacturing industry.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. and learned Friend has no immediate plans to meet Strathclyde regional council specifically to discuss this issue.

Mr. Hamilton: Is the Minister aware — everybody else is — that there has been a drastic decline in manufacturing industry since the Government took office in 1979? Is he also aware that 57,000 people in Strathclyde region have been unemployed for two years or more and that there is 27 per cent. unemployment in the region? Will he do something drastic to get people back to work and give them what they are entitled to—the right to work and the right to live?

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Gentleman must realise that manufacturing output in Scotland rose by 5·75 per cent. to the third quarter of 1985. Those are the most recent figures available. Opposition Members should recognise that manufacturing productivity in Scotland rose by more than 8 per cent. in 1984 and 6·8 per cent. to the third quarter of 1985. Both those figures are higher than the United Kingdom average. It is on the basis of such achievement that we can look forward to competitive and successful manufacturing industry in Scotland.

Mr. Fletcher: As low-cost energy is vital to manufacturing industry, will my hon. Friend take this opportunity to congratulate the South of Scotland Electricity Board on its excellent safety record at AGR power stations in Strathclyde and on completing the AGR at Torness on time and on budget?

Mr. Stewart: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. All hon. Members will recognise the outstanding safety record of the nuclear energy industry in Scotland. It is therefore astonishing that the Scottish Labour party is committed to closing Hunterston and refusing to open Torness. I notice that the Scottish Trades Union Congress, at least, had rather more sense than that at its recent congress.

Dr. Bray: Is the Minister aware that the implications of the figures that he gave my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, North (Mr. Hamilton) is that, despite, and perhaps because of, the increase in productivity, the Government have taken out the benefits for themselves rather than allow them to help employment in Scotland? Is he aware that the implication of his figures is a further reduction in employment in manufacturing? Does he not intend to do anything about unemployment?

Mr. Stewart: The implication of the figures that I gave is that Scottish manufacturing industry is becoming more productive and therefore more competitive. That is the only basis on which a secure future can be built. I must emphasise that the total number of jobs in Scotland has been rising steadily. It is true that in Scotland, as throughout the industrial world, most of those jobs are coming in expanding service industries.

Mr. Henderson: As many of the hon. Members who represent Strathclyde are Labour Members, was my hon. Friend not surprised that none of them came forward when the Ministry of Defence announced the Harland and Wolff order, one third of the value of which is to be spent in Strathclyde? Is that not an excellent example of how employment in that area is being helped?

Mr. Stewart: I certainly agree with my hon. Friend that that order was a tribute to the design excellence of the Yarrow yard, which was involved with Harland and Wolff in that contract.

Mr. Ewing: I would have thought that the Minister would be more concerned about Tory party policy, which will cost his councillors dearly at the elections next Thursday and will cost him dearly at the general election. When it comes to the nuclear industry, does the Minister not understand that there is debate in the country about the safety and future of nuclear energy? He seems to be the only person who is deaf to that debate. The best thing that he can do, without listening to his right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State to prompt him in his reply, is to open his ears and listen to the debate on people's concern about the future of the nuclear industry.

Mr. Stewart: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that there is an absurd debate taking place within the Labour party on that issue. I suggest that he is doing nobody any good by failing to dissociate himself from the totally absurd statements that have been made about the real role of the nuclear energy industry in Scotland. It is estimated that Labour party policy towards that industry in Scotland would result in an increase of around 25 per cent. in electricity prices.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It would be helpful to all concerned if we stuck to the question.

Unemployment (West of Scotland)

4. Mr. MacKenzie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has for reducing the number of people unemployed in the west of Scotland.

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): The Government's strategy is keeping inflation down, stimulating enterprise and restoring competitiveness to industry. This is the best means of improving employment prospects in the west of Scotland. In addition, the full range of the Manpower Services Commission's special employment and training measures is available in the west of Scotland as elsewhere.

Mr. MacKenzie: Is the Secretary of State aware that we have been hearing that answer for the past seven years? If he cannot change his policy, will he ask somebody in the office to change the words in the answer? We keep hearing from the Prime Minister and others about the number of new jobs being created throughout the country. All that we want to know is whether we in the Glasgow travel-to-work-area may have a wee shot at getting some of them too.

Mr. Rifkind: Over the past two and a half years there has been a net increase of 27,00 in the number of people employed in Scotland. Therefore, it would be right for the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues to acknowledge that the total number of those employed in Scotland over the past couple of years has been rising, not falling.

Sir Hector Monro: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that in some non-assisted areas in the west of Scotland there are pockets of high male unemployment?

Will he give an assurance that in such towns as Annan the Scottish Development Agency has the initiative to build advance factories and has enough resources to promote development in those circumstances?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend raises a fair point. Clearly, although significant parts of Scotland benefit from regional assistance, there are other localities, such as the kind to which my hon. Friend referred, which do not come within those regions. It is part of the responsibility of the Scottish Development Agency to take account of the needs, not just of those areas with regional status, but of any part of Scotland which can benefit from the facilities that it provides.

Sir Russell Johnston: Does the Secretary of State agree that if the Highlands and Islands Development Board had more money it could create more long-term jobs at a lower cost than keeping people on the dole? Will he speak to his reactionary accountant friends in the Treasury about that.

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman should realise that the Highlands and Islands Development Board already receives substantial resources, which are available for the benefit of the Highlands. The suggestion that one can somehow cure unemployment simply by pumping more resources into public expenditure may be a view held by the hon Gentleman, but it is not a view which even his party believes can solve the problem of unemployment in Scotland.

Mr. Hirst: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that he worst thing that Scots can do is to continue to talk down their country? Will he take this opportunity of reminding the Opposition of the recent optimistic business survey and of the hundreds of jobs which have come to my constituency so far this year, thanks to the Government's encouragement? Does he further agree that if the Labour party had its way and got rid of the nuclear deterrent, thousands of jobs in the west of Scotland would be destroyed?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is absolutely correct in saying that defence-related employment provides jobs for many tens of thousands of people in Scotland. Undoubtedly those jobs would be jeopardised if ever Labour policy were to be implemented. Indeed, whenever one is in a locality where there are either defence or nuclear-related employment prospects, one finds that sometimes that has an educational effect even on the local Labour party. One has only to look at the views of the Caithness Labour party on nuclear energy to see proof of that point.

Mr. Norman Hogg: Is the Secretary of State aware that British Oxygen recently announced 100 new jobs in my constituency? Is he further aware that in the town centre of Cumbernauld, 4,000 people queued to apply for those jobs? Does he understand that that was a queue of real people, not just a creation of Saatchi and Saatchi? What positive steps will he take to provide employment in Cumbernauld, which is faced with such a situation, where 4,000 people queue for 100 jobs?

Mr. Rifkind: I think that the hon. Gentleman would be the first to admit that Cumbernauld has been the recipient of several announcements bringing new jobs there over the past few months. For example, Isola will bring between 100 and 200 jobs to Cumbernauld. The hon. Gentleman should acknowledge that it is the work of the Government, both directly and through the Scottish Development Agency, which has helped to persuade such companies either to put new investment in Cumbernauld or to increase investment that they already have there.

Mr. Ron Brown: Is the Secretary of State aware that if Edinburgh's multicultural centre closes, thanks to the maladministration of the Scottish Office, the employees will be forced to go to the west, thereby forcing up——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I was hoping that the hon. Gentleman would say something about the west of Scotland.

Mr. Foulkes: I shall say something about the west of Scotland, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Douglas.

Mr. Douglas: While addressing the issue of the west of Scotland, the Secretary of State gave statistics for Scotland as a whole for the increase in the numbers employed. How many of those jobs are in oil-related activities? Does he expect that level of activity to persist in the west of Scotland and in Scotland as a whole, in view of the decline in the oil price?

Mr. Rifkind: In Scotland as a whole, about 60,000 jobs have been provided as a result of oil-related activities. It is impossible to predict with any certainty what the effect will be of the recent fall in oil prices. One knows that certain oil companies are reconsidering their investment decisions. I hope that, in coming to a view on those matters, they will take into account the likely development in the oil price, not over the next six or 12 months, but over the next 10, 15 or 20 years. That is the likely length of any investment that they may contemplate. If they use that sensible time scale, there is a powerful case for substantial investment in future.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Foulkes.

Mr. Foulkes: I am grateful to you for calling me, Mr. Speaker.

Does the Secretary of State recall that I wrote to him pointing out that unemployment in Cumnock and Doon Valley is the second highest in the country, not just in the west of Scotland, and that it is due principally to the loss of 3,000 jobs in the mining industry which, in Cumnock and Doon Valley, is the equivalent of the closure of Ravenscraig in Lanarkshire? Will the Secretary of State say exactly what the Government will do about that? In particular, will he support the proposals in the Coopers and Lybrand report and make the necessary resources available?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman is aware that we are considering various ideas and proposals. Naturally, one is concerned about the high unemployment in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. He will be aware that regional assistance is available, given the nature of the unemployment level. We shall also be prepared to look at any other sensible and constructive ways in which those problems can be ameliorated. However, I cannot suggest, nor do I think that the hon. Gentleman would wish me to suggest, that somehow there is a magic formula that will solve the problem in the way which, theoretically, we would all like to see.

Maternity Services (Greater Glasgow)

6. Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the provision of maternity services in the Greater Glasgow health board area.

Mr. John MacKay: Glasgow health board is currently reviewing its future plans for maternity services, including its earlier proposal to close the maternity unit at the Stobhill general hospital. Any such proposal would require the approval of my right hon. and learned Friend.

Mr. Hirst: While I accept that in Glasgow there is over-provision of maternity beds, may I remind my hon. Friend of the concern among my constituents about the future of maternity services in their area, although they are greatly encouraged by talk of a new maternity unit for the north and north-east of Glasgow? Is my hon. Friend aware that there is an excellent green field site at Stobhill hospital where such a new unit could be sited? Can he hold out any prospect that that unit may come to Stobhill?

Mr. MacKay: As my hon. Friend knows, the board has considered a number of responses received as a result of the consultative exercise, including his comments and observations. A final decision must be set in the context of the review of maternity services for the whole of the Greater Glasgow area, which is being undertaken by the board's general manager. One of the options may well be to build a new unit on a green field site at Stobhill, but that matter is principally for the board. If it decides to opt for closure, it will then have to come to me and my right hon. and learned Friend.

Mr. Maxton: Why does the Minister not admit that the reason why the Greater Glasgow health board, is threatening Stobhill or any other hospital in Glasgow is simply that he has failed to provide proper financing for the Greater Glasgow health board, as this year he has left it with a minimum £6 million deficit which it must find? Will he come clean and give the Greater Glasgow health board the finance that it needs?

Mr. MacKay: The Greater Glasgow health board is the best funded health board in Scotland. If it were to receive more resources, it would be at the expense of other Scottish health boards. Moreover, the simple fact is that there are more available staffed maternity beds in Greater Glasgow than are needed, even on the busiest day. It must make sense, even to the hon. Gentleman, that the Greater Glasgow health board should make the best use of its resources, and that does not mean keeping staffed beds which it knows will never be used.

Construction Industry

7. Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will take steps to increase employment in the Scottish construction industry.

Mr. Rifkind: I am confident that the best prospects for increasing employment in the construction industry lie in the continuation of this Government's policies of reducing inflation and creating real economic growth. In addition, public expenditure which will benefit the construction industry in Scotland will be higher this year than in previous years.

Mr. Maclennan: Is the Secretary of State aware that since his Government took office there has been a drop in employment in the construction industry of 26·2 per cent. year on year, and that the number inexorably falls? Is he further aware that local authorities, especially regional councils, are having to watch our fundament and roads declining and becoming inadequate to support the industry that we seek to promote because of the stringent curbs on their capital expenditure? What will the Government do about that? The measure lies in their hands.

Mr. Rifkind: It is difficult to believe that the hon. Gentleman is a Member for a Highland constituency when he implies that during the past few years contruction on road development has been poor or inadequate. He need only travel on the A9 and compare his journey with a similar one a few years ago to find out how absurd that allegation is. He will also be aware of the proposal to build a bridge across the Dornoch firth in his constituency, and he might have taken that into account before making those rather silly remarks.

Mr. McQuarrie: Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that there would be a great deal more work for the construction industry if many local authorities, especially Labour ones, would release more of their land banks to developers for houses and buildings? In that way many people would be employed directly in the construction industry.

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is absolutely correct. Certain authorities have tended to hold on to land within their locality unnecessarily, and clearly that can be a needless curb on useful development for the construction industry.

Unemployment (Greenock and Port Glasgow)

8. Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what initiatives he proposes to take to deal with the social problems arising from unemployment in the Greenock and Port Glasgow parliamentary constituency.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The Government's policies are to build a strong competitive economy to tackle directly the root causes of unemployment. The hon. Gentleman's constituents will benefit from the expansion of the special employment measures announced in the Budget and from the Inverclyde initiative funded by the Government through the Scottish Development Agency. Indeed, £4 million has already been committed to an initial programme, with more to follow as suitable projects come forward.

Dr. Godman: Does the Minister agree that unemployment will worsen, especially in Port Glasgow, if Ferguson-Ailsa is not awarded the contract for the fisheries protection vessel to replace the Norna? Will the hon. Gentleman bear in mind the recommendation of the Scottish Affairs Committee, which is contained in its report on the fisheries protection service, to the effect that that vessel should be built in Scotland? Will he give an assurance that the order will go to a Scottish yard, and more particularly, to Ferguson-Ailsa?

Mr. Stewart: I am fully aware of the importance of orders for Ferguson-Ailsa. The hon. Gentleman mentioned that during the debate on shipbuilding on Monday. Six firms were asked to tender for the fisheries protection vessel. The tenders are currently being evaluated. The hon. Gentleman will realise that that is a technical process that will take some time.

Mr. Buchan: Does the Minister realise that the problems facing the lower part of Renfrewshire are compounded by three major events that have occurred largely because of the Government's inadequacy? I refer to the collapse of Linwood, the collapse of the shipbuilding industry and the collapse of the textile industry. They are all the result of the Government's failures. When will the Minister tell the Chancellor of the Exchequer to stop his arrant nonsense about tax relief for the rich somehow giving employment to the poor? When will he take action, as he can do in the case of the fisheries protection vessel, and give some heart to an area that his Government have thoroughly devastated?

Mr. Stewart: As an hon. Member who also represents part of Renfrew district, I can say that the hon. Gentleman has uttered a lot of nonsense, even by his standards. I know that he could not be at the meeting that the hon. Member for Paisley, North (Mr. Adams), my hon. Friend the Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley) and I had with Renfrew district council on the general position, but the consultant's report on a possible initiative for the district is being considered at a meeting tomorrow. I hope that that will be followed by positive initiatives. We are certainly committed to the development of Renfrew district. In my part of Renfrew district we have recently seen the announcement of 180 new jobs at Fine Fare and the expansion of English Sewing at Neilston in my constituency. The hon. Gentleman should portray a more balanced picture.

Scottish Motor Trade Association Ltd.

9. Mr. Eadie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what reply he has sent to the correspondence he has received recently from the Scottish Motor Trade Association Ltd. on matters of consumer interest.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State will be replying shortly.

Mr. Eadie: The Minister must be aware that recent figures show that it is 18p more expensive to buy petrol in Scotland than it is to buy it in some parts of England. Did he see the recent STV programme which showed that there was a gross difference of between 40p and 50p per gallon between the price of petrol in parts of Scotland and England? As the Scottish Motor Association has written to me saying that it does not accept the Government's policy that market forces will resolve the problem of the consumer being exploited, what does the Minister intend to do so that the consumer can be protected from the exploitation of oil companies?

Mr. Stewart: I read the recent article in the Petroleum Times. As the hon. Gentleman may know, that journal regularly publishes a report on local prices. The article showed that the average price for four star petrol was 177·7p in Edinburgh and 177·3p in London. I understand that the edition coming out later this week will show further reductions. The areas of greatest demand inevitably experience the greatest competition, and that is reflected in a relatively speedy reduction in prices. It is clear that that process invariably takes longer in less populated areas, where competition is not at the same level. The figures do not substantiate the hon. Gentleman's generalisation.

Sir Hector Monro: Has my hon. Friend had a discussion with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport about the changed date for the vehicle registration letter next year? Is he aware that almost every motoring association in Scotland and motor dealer has written to say that the change to October is wrong and will have a serious and detrimental effect, not only on the sale of motor cars, but on the secondhand value that the public would expect? Will my hon. Friend hold discussions on this matter, because at present everything is being done purely for the benefit of the DVLC in Swansea?

Mr. Stewart: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport gave a written answer on 28 April which stated that on 24 April he told the Motor Agents Association that he would be prepared to consider an alternative if the weight of opinion in the motor industry as a whole changed, and provided it was acceptable to the police. If that is not the case, the change will go ahead as planned in October 1987.

Mr. Wilson: Is the hon. Gentleman aware of the anger in Scotland about high petrol prices? Is he aware also that the Director General of Fair Trading has stated that one problem may be that too few petrol forecourts are owned by independents and too many are owned by big combines? In those circumstances, will the hon. Gentleman ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to instruct the Monopolies and Mergers Commission to conduct an inquiry into the matter?

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the MMC prepared a report on the industry in 1979. The OFT conducts an annual review of the petrol retail industry. I have no doubt that, in the course of that review, it will pay special attention to the degree of competition.

Mr. Ewing: I urge the hon. Gentleman not to be complacent about this matter, because there is serious disquiet not only in Scotland but in other parts of Great Britain. Evidence is emerging that the oil companies, the suppliers, are selecting certain areas in Great Britain to subsidise at a much higher level than other areas, especially in Scotland. There is clear evidence that there is a difference of about 50p a gallon in the price of petrol in one area compared with another. That evidence has been put forward by the Scottish Motor Trade Association. Based on the hon. Gentleman's figures, I can produce evidence showing that there is an 18p a gallon difference between the price in Edinburgh and the price in parts of my constituency.

Mr. Stewart: Prices vary considerably. I can tell the hon. Gentleman exactly where the biggest price differential occurs, according to the figures that are available. The price is as low as 154.7p in south Wales and as high as 205p in London. That does not suggest any bias against Scotland.

Mr. Kennedy: Will the hon. Gentleman accept that in the Highlands and Islands there have been persisent problems of differential regarding petrol pices? Car and haulage travel there is not a luxury but an absolute necessity to the whole of the economy because of the way of life. The Highlands and Islands are suffering badly, as I know the hon. Gentleman appreciates, through falling oil prices following the contraction of the North sea exploration market. Will we see some advantage from falling oil prices, such as cheaper costs of derv, haulage costs and prices at the petrol pumps? At the moment we are seeing nothing. We are getting the worst of both worlds.

Mr. Stewart: I assure the hon. Gentleman that the Government are very conscious of the price variations. We have vigorously reminded the oil companies of the need to ensure that rural areas, such as the Highlands, derive adequate benefit from lower oil prices.

Scottish Development Agency

10. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the total expenditure by the Scottish Development Agency since its inception.

Mr. Rifkind: The Scottish Development Agency has spent a total of over £940 million in the period since it was formed in 1975 up to 31 March 1986.

Mr. Knox: Will my right hon. and learned Friend say what the agency has spent, a year on average, under the Government and how it compares with the average spent each year under the Labour Government?

Mr. Rifkind: The average annual spend of the SDA under the present Government is £109 million, against a figure of £44 million under the previous Government.

Mr. Millan: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman take this opportunity to correct the impression, which seems to be prevalent in many parts of Scotland, that other worthwhile projects are being abandoned because of expenditure on the Glasgow garden festival? Is it not true that the SDA's allocation is not adequate to enable it to take up all the worthwhile projects put to it? That problem has nothing to do with the festival. An increased allocation is needed for the SDA.

Mr. Rifkind: The right hon. Gentleman is half right and half wrong. He is correct in that the SDA has emphasised that the garden festival is in no way interfering with its allocation of expenditure. The SDA has expressed that view more than once. This year the agency will be able to spend more than £136 million, which is more than in any previous year.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my right hon. and learned Friend realise that a substantial part of the vast sums which the SDA has been authorised to spend have been spent in the Dundee area? Is he aware that one of my constituents, who runs a large timber, haulage and carpentry business, recently advertised twice in the Dundee Courier and Advertiser for joiners but was unable to get a single applicant?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is correct to say that the remit of the Scottish Development Agency extends throughout Scotland and includes Dundee and rural areas, both in my hon. Friend's constituency and elsewhere.

Mr. Home Robertson: Why have the Government rejected the call by COSLA and the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs for an SDA rural development fund? Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware of the urgent need for the development of jobs and services in rural areas in Scotland? As the Tory Government evidently know little and care less about the rural areas in Scotland, I take this opportunity to give the Secretary of State a copy of Labour's new charter for rural areas.

Mr. Rifkind: We did not accept the proposal for a rural fund for the simple reason that we already spend in Scottish rural areas over 10 times more than the size of the proposed rural fund. Frankly, although it is easy to talk in terms of funds, the resources available to the farming community and those elsewhere in the rural areas are much more important. The hon. Gentleman should be the first to appreciate how well farmers do as a result of the Government's decisions.

Sir Russell Johnston: I should like to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman essentially the same question that was asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) about the Highlands and Islands Development Board, which he failed to answer. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give us a clear yes or no? Is he, or is he not, in favour of expanding the activities of the state funding of enterprise through the SDA and the HIDB?

Mr. Rifkind: I have already pointed out that the SDA has received more funds under this Government than under their predecessors. The HIDB has also received substantial resources. The hon. Gentleman should draw his own conclusion from the facts.

Mr. Forth: Given my right hon. and learned Friend's confidence in the SDA's success, is he prepared to recommend to his Cabinet colleagues that we set up similar bodies in the rest of the United Kingdom, starting, I hope, with the west midlands? Is he prepared to recommend that resources similar to those given to the SDA are given to all such similar bodies, to give every region a fair crack of the whip?

Mr. Rifkind: The SDA's successful achievements have been recognised not simply by Scottish Members but by the former Secretary of State for Trade and Industry — my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) — and other hon. Members. It is for Members representing other constituencies to put the views that they think appropriate.

Agriculture Industry

11. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has any plans to provide further financial relief for the livestock sector of the agriculture industry in Scotland.

Mr. MacKay: In the six months to the end of April, Scotland's 20,000 beef and sheep producers have received direct Government support in adverse weather aid and headage and variable premiums of over £95 million, compared to £72 million in the equivalent six months of 1984-85. A further £10 million in hill subsidies will be paid out by the end of June.

Mr. Kirkwood: Is the Minister aware that from the Scottish borders, and indeed from the whole of the south of Scotland, reports are coming through that this year's lambings are substantially down on previous years because of the mortality rate of the lambs? Is he aware of that taking place in other parts of the country? Will he take steps to see that the people who are suffering these losses receive more support, bearing in mind the difficulties that they experienced last summer and the bad lambing conditions this year?

Mr. MacKay: The lambings this spring will be one of the factors taken into account in the autumn in the annual review of farming in relation to HLCAs and the like. As the hon. Gentleman knows, this year HLCAs were increased by 14 per cent. on average and by no less than 22 per cent. on hill cows. The right time to review the livestock position for the year is at the annual review in the autumn.

Mr. Pollock: Can my hon. Friend confirm that, as a result of the welcome news of the extension of the Highland and Islands Development Board boundaries into the Forres and Tomintoul areas of my constituency, livestock there will qualify for enhanced rates of payment of HLCAs? That will represent significant support for those hard-pressed sectors.

Mr. MacKay: I can confirm to my hon. Friend that the extension of the boundary of the Highland and Islands Development Board's area into parts of his constituency will mean that the people there, whether they are farmers or small business men, will have available to them the same payments as are available in the rest of the board's area.

Mr. Wallace: Will the Minister confirm that the Government's contribution to the European development programme proposed for the islands of Scotland—which has a certain potential to help the livestock industry in the islands—will be new money?

Mr. MacKay: If my memory serves me right, on all these proposals, the current one for the Western Isles and the one proposed for other islands, 60 per cent. of the input comes from the Government and 40 per cent. from the European Community.

Mr. Holt: While my hon. Friend is looking at the possibility of extra money for Scotland, will he tell his right hon. Friend the Minister for Agriculture where Cleveland is, so that it can have some money?

Mr. MacKay: I shall draw to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what my hon. Friend has said.

Mr. Home Robertson: Will the Minister accept that it would be intolerable if the Government were to use the House of Lords to introduce an amendment into the Agriculture Bill that would penalise Scottish tenant dairy farmers, on the same basis as has been done in England and Wales over milk quotas? Will he give an undertaking that any decision on that matter that affects livestock farmers in Scotland will be taken in this elected House of Commons?

Mr. MacKay: Although the hon. Gentleman is a farmer, I am not sure whether he understands the livestock and milk sector of the industry. If the Government do not take action on this front, tenants will remain in the position that they are at the moment, which is that they have no right to any money or compensation.

Mr. McQuarrie: Will my hon. Friend take account of the problems arising in the rural areas about the less-favoured area designation? In a considerable number of cases one farmer is designated as being in a less-favoured area for livestock while the next farmer is not. That causes considerable anxiety as well as problems for the farmer who does not happen to be in the less-favoured rural area.

Mr. MacKay: I fully appreciate my hon. Friend's point. There is a well-rehearsed procedure for reviewing the position of a farm where the farmer feels he ought to be in the less-favoured area and is not. If any of my hon. Friend's constituents feel so aggrieved, they should make the necessary application for a review.

GEAR Project

12. Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will consider continuing the Glasgow eastern area renewal project in Glasgow for another three to five-year period beyond 31 March 1987 to enable it to complete the final one third of the job which it was set up to do.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Ancram): The present phase of the project will come to an end in March 1987. Discussions are now under way on the future management arrangements for a continuing commitment to the east end of Glasgow after that date.

Mr. Marshall: As usual, the Minister has dodged the question. Is he not aware that unless this project is extended everything will go tragically wrong? Has he not been in the area recently to see for himself how much has still to be done and how far from completion the project is? Does he want to see much of the investment already made going to waste, or will he reconsider the position and agree to extend the project to enable it to be completed for the benefit of everyone involved, not least his own Government?

Mr. Ancram: As the hon. Gentleman knows, I have made several visits to the area in the past two or three years and I am well aware of the kind of work that has been done. He should not underestimate the gains that have been made so far in the area, or the achievements of GEAR since its launch in 1976, which have often been very considerable and clearly evident in the progress that has been made towards tackling the problems that exist in the east end of Glasgow. The project has lasted 10 years and it is right that now, at the end of 10 years, the project should be ended and that there should be an evaluation of its successes so that similar projects may be used in other parts of Scotland.

Labour Statistics

13. Mr. Allen Adams asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the increase in numbers of unemployed persons in the Paisley travel-to-work area in the first quarter of 1986, compared with the first quarter of 1985.

Mr. Allan Stewart: On 9 January and 6 March 1986 the numbers of unemployed people claiming benefit in the Paisley, North parliamentary constituency—there is no Paisley travel-to-work area as such—were respectively 5,854 and 5,596. On 10 January and 14 March 1985 the corresponding figures were 5,695 and 5,571. The figures for March 1986 are not comparable with earlier figures because of the change in the compilation of the unemployment statistics announced on 19 February.

Mr. Adams: Is the Minister aware of the real anger and dismay that is felt in the Paisley and Renfrew areas over the Government's failure to provide jobs since the closure of Talbot? Can he name a single major employer that he has attracted into the Renfrew district in the past five years? Will he speak to the Scottish Development Agency and take along with him a map of west Scotland to show the agency where Renfrew and Paisley are, as the SDA does not appear to know?

Mr. Stewart: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman was able to ask his question. Unfortunately, he was not listening earlier during Question Time when I said that there would be a meeting tomorrow involving the SDA about a possible initiative for Renfrew. I also named earlier two companies in my part of Renfrew district which have expanded under the Government's policy. I know that the SDA is committed to ensuring that Renfrew district gets its share of the resources that are available.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Local Authority Services

35. Mr. Foulkes asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland in what sectors he has instituted prosecutions against local authorities in relation to failure to achieve a statutory defined level or standard of service or provision.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland (Mr. Peter Fraser): I do not entirely understand what the hon. Gentleman means by "sectors" in this context, but so far as I am aware no such prosecutions have been instructed recently.

Mr. Foulkes: I am surprised that there are no prosecutions, in view of the cuts that are taking place. The regional councils in a number of areas are failing to carry out their statutory duties for children, the disabled, the elderly and young offenders under the social work and education legislation. Will the Solicitor-General and his colleague, the Lord Advocate, have another look at this and decide whether some prosecutions could be instituted? Instead of instituting prosecutions against local authorities, should they not be instituted against the real villain, the man behind it all, the Secretary of State for Scotland?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: In common with the rest of the House, I enjoyed the hon. Gentleman's question. However, if there is a sector where he believes that prosecutions should be taken against local authorities, which was the basis of his original question, I hope that he will tell me where he believes abuses are taking place.

Mr. Henderson: Will my hon. and learned Friend accept that it would assist decisions about prosecutions if local authorities were required to keep separately their expenditure on statutory duties as opposed to their expenditure on other matters? For example, Fife regional council has spent more per head on education than any other education authority in Scotland and it claims that it is short of money for desirable projects within its statutory responsibilities, yet it has spent a lot of money on other things, such as giving holiday meals to striking miners' families.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I understand my hon. Friend's point. However, all that I am asked to do is to look at those circumstances where prosecutions might be moved against local authorities. It might be that in certain circumstances authorities are in breach of the duties imposed on them by the House of Commons, but there is a clear distinction between that and having the opportunity to mount a prosecution. However, if there are specific areas where that is necessary, I hope that they will be brought to my attention.

Mr. Ewing: In order to get some balance into the question and answer, instead of considering the possibility of prosecuting some local authorities, will the Solicitor-General consider an alternative form of treatment by holding up as an example of a good council the Angus district council, which is SNP-controlled, and puts the rents up and cuts public spending when it is told to do so by the Secretary of State? Indeed, it does everything that it is told to do by the Conservative Secretary of State for Scotland and has never been in any danger of falling foul of the law in order to defend its ratepayers.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: With an eye to next Thursday, the hon. Gentleman has made his point well.

Mr. Bruce: Would Grampian regional council be open to prosecution, given that within Aberdeen 45 per cent. of eligible children can go to nursery school, whereas within Gordon district fewer than 5 per cent. can go to nursery school? Should not such a wide variation within the same local authority area lead to a prosecution for under-provision in part of the area for which the authority is responsible?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: If the hon. Gentleman feels that there is some failing there, that is a matter for local control and discretion. Again, I think that that is what the hon. Gentleman has his eye to rather than any particular prosecution which he seriously thinks I might mount.

Mr. Bill Walker: Are local authorities ever at risk from prosecution as a result of strikes by their employees?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: So far as I am aware, no.

Police Misconduct

36. Mr. Canavan asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland whether he will instruct regional procurators fiscal to give more comprehensive replies to people who have formally submitted a complaint about criminal misconduct by the police.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I do not consider it necessary to give any such instruction. All persons who make a complaint of criminal conduct by a police officer are precognosced by the procurator fiscal. With the request to attend for precognition there is sent a note which explains in detail the procedures followed and the considerations taken into account in deciding whether criminal proceedings should be instituted.

Mr. Canavan: What advice would the Solicitor-General give to somebody who lodges such a complaint, has to resist considerable police pressure to withdraw the complaint and spends considerable time and effort obtaining legal advice to pursue the complaint, getting the names and addresses of witnesses and being cross-examined by a senior police officer and the procurator fiscal, only to receive a curt, two-sentence letter months later from the regional procurator fiscal saying that no action is to be taken? If the regional procurator fiscal cannot even be bothered to try to give an explanation of why no action has been taken, is it any wonder that many people consider that it is almost a complete waste of time lodging a complaint against the police because the system is biased in favour of the establishment and against the complainant?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Anyone who makes a complaint against the police, as I have already said, is given a full explanation of the procedures that will be followed through and what might have happened if at the end of the day there are to be no proceedings. One reason, which the hon. Gentleman might appreciate, why that note is, as he describes it, curt, is that it might be that in the circumstances, as in other cases, the procurator fiscal has given a warning to the person involved. As the hon. Gentleman may well recall from a debate that we had some time ago in the Scottish Grand Committee, it was clearly his view and that of his hon. Friends that where a warning was to be given by a procurator fiscal it should not be widely divulged.

Parliamentary Questions

37. Mr. McKelvey asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will list the subjects about which he has transferred questions for oral answer from himself to the Secretary of State for Scotland in the current Session of Parliament.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I have transferred questions on legal aid; tape recording of police interviews; the reprimand of a sheriff; private legislation procedures; justice of the peace courts; fisheries offences; and statistics on drunk-driving and orders made under section 18(2) of the Children and Young Persons (Scotland) Act 1937.

Mr. McKelvey: I am sure the House thinks that that is disgraceful. Does the Solicitor-General not realise that the Secretary of State has enough troubles in Scotland at the moment without the hon. and learned Gentleman passing the buck and transferring those questions? Why does the hon. and learned Gentleman not stand at the Dispatch Box, stop passing the buck and answer those questions himself?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Simply because my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has not entrusted those responsibilities to me.

Mr. Merlyn Rees: To whom should I address a question brought to my notice by a constituent in Yorkshire about the standard of service in a sheriff court in Scotland?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: It depends on whether the right hon. Gentleman's complaint has to do with criminal proceedings or civil proceedings. If he would care to write to me, I shall make sure that if I cannot answer it myself I shall transfer it.

Firearms

38. Sir Hector Monro asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many prosecutions for firearms offences have been instituted in the last convenient year; and how many alleged offenders held firearms certificates.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Five hundred and fifty four prosecutions in respect of offences involving firearms took place in 1984. The provisional figure for 1985 is 555. Statistics relating to the number of those prosecuted who held firearms certificates are not held centrally.

Sir Hector Monro: Since the security of firearms is of first importance, does not the fact that my hon. and learned Friend does not keep statistics for those who hold firearms certificates show that additional pressure for the imposition of greater restrictions on those who hold firearms certificates may be misplaced?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I understand why my hon. Friend is concerned about this, and I may take the opportunity to discuss it with him further. All I can say at the moment is that I do not know the figures for offences by those who hold firearms certificates, but if my hon. Friend feels that there is a particular abuse, or that a particular identification is necessary in the classification of these offences, I shall certainly look at that.

Fraud

39. Mr. Hirst asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland whether the Crown Office follows any special procedures in prosecuting serious cases of fraud in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: In June 1984 a fraud unit, comprising both legal staff and precognition officers, was established in the Crown Office in co-ordination with the police to investigate and prepare major fraud cases referred to it by procurators fiscal. The unit, with direct access to Crown counsel, has brought about a concentration of effort on and expertise to such cases and already has a number of very successful prosecutions to its credit. It is the intention of my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate to reinforce it.

Mr. Hirst: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for his reply. Bearing in mind the complexity of major fraud cases and the inevitable problems confronting juries in trying to assess the evidence, does my hon. and learned Friend agree that it might be preferable to have a skilled assessor to assist the judge, rather than entrust this matter to a jury?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: This is a matter that was suggested by Lord Roskill. However, our experience in Scotland to date has not made me want to question the jury system for fraud trials. I have considerable sympathy with juries who have to sit through such trials for anything up to six or eight weeks. I am not aware of any major fraud cases in Scotland where it could be said, as a matter of objective assessment, that the jury had come to the wrong verdict.

Mr. Maxton: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Arising out of questions?

Mr. Maxton: Yes, Mr. Speaker. During the answer that he gave to me on question No. 2, concerning AIDS in Scotland, the Under-Secretary, the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. MacKay) made the accusation that I was condoning a criminal offence, in that I was condoning drug misuse. That is a very serious accusation which I hope the hon. Member will take the opportunity to withdraw, because when he reads the answer that he gave me—or, rather, the answer that he gave to the question put by the hon. Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Henderson) — he will appreciate that he was not condemning drug misuse, he was condemning people who were at risk from AIDS.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is going into the question again. I am sure that the point has been well taken by the Minister. [HON. MEMBERS: "Withdraw."] Order. If the Minister made that accusation, I am sure that he would wish to withdraw it—but I did not hear that.

Mr. John MacKay: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I shall read carefully the record of what I said, but my recollection is that I did not suggest that the hon. Member was condoning illegal activities. I did suggest that he was condoning drug abuse. [HON. MEMBERS: "Withdraw."] I hope that the hon. Member will also read what he said, because I suspect that he went a great deal further than he intended.

Mr. Ewing: Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Minister has just compounded the felony by admitting that he had accused my hon. Friend of condoning drug misuse. In its widest possible sense, drug misuse is a criminal offence and the Minister ought to be man enough to withdraw. Perhaps we are expecting far too much of the Minister in expecting him to rise above his usual standards, but he has an obligation to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the House at least to accept the standards of the House of Commons and to withdraw that very serious and scurrilous allegation.

Mr. Wallace: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. As the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. MacKay), has the advantage of sitting beside his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General for Scotland, perhaps the Solicitor-General could advise him whether there are any drug abuses that are not illegal. What he said appeared to imply that the hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Maxton) condones illegality.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let me deal with this matter. May I say that in the House of Commons very rough things are occasionally said in answer to questions. I am perfectly certain that if the Minister made an accusation against the honour of any Member, on whatever side of the House, he would wish to withdraw it.

Hon. Members: Withdraw!

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is a matter for the Minister.

Mr. John MacKay: I have made it quite clear that I shall check the record. If I said anything that I ought not to have said, I shall withdraw it. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Ewing rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have not had an opportunity to check the record, either. The best thing for the House to do in a situation like this, as the Minister has said that he will check the record — indeed, I shall read these exchanges carefully—is to do that and see what happens tomorrow.

Mr. Ewing: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the record is now to be checked, may we have an assurance that the record will remain as it was when the Minister made his allegations?

Hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: Order. [Interruption.] Order. That will be a matter for me. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would not make that accusation against me.

Mr. Maxton: I accept that the Minister may wish to check the record, but may I have his assurance that if he finds that what I have said is correct he will come to the House tomorrow afternoon and ask to withdraw his statement?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that that is what the Minister said.

Later—

Mr. Ewing: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. During the statement and the exchanges on it, I reflected on the comments I made during points of order at the end of Scottish Question Time. I realise that what I said about the possible alteration of the record in relation to the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland may well be taken as a reflection on you, Mr. Speaker. Under no circumstances would I want that to remain on the record. I unreservedly withdraw my remarks and apologise for my intemperate comments.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his typically generous correction. I did not take his comments as a reflection on me. However, I am responsible for Hansard, and I would not allow anything like that to happen.

Soviet Nuclear Accident (British Citizens)

3.36 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tim Eggar): With permission, I should like to make a statement about the evacuation of British subjects following the nuclear accident at Chernobyl in the Soviet Union.

Following indications from countries bordering the Soviet Union, the Soviet authorities announced late on 28 April that there had been an accident at the nuclear reactor in Chernobyl. This was a full day after radioactivity had first been monitored in Scandinavia. The embassy in Moscow was in touch with the Soviet authorities early the next morning to seek information. The Soviet authorities were unwilling to give any details but assured our embassy that there was no cause for concern over the British citizens in Kiev and Minsk. In the absence of any authoritative information from the Soviet authorities, which sadly continues to be a feature of this crisis, the ambassador was instructed to seek the fullest possible details. He was only able to talk to the Soviet authorities this morning.

During the course of yesterday afternoon I took the decision, in the light of the continuing uncertainty and lack of authoritative information, that it would not be right for British citizens to visit the western Soviet Union unless absolutely necessary. As regards those already there, we requested the fullest co-operation of the Soviet authorities in assisting any who decided to leave to do so. The embassy was instructed to offer every help in this respect, including repatriation.

I reviewed the situation again this morning. Despite the inadequate information from the Soviet Union, it was evident, particularly from reports based on United States satellite observations and from Swedish scientific sources, that the situation at Chernobyl was such that it was necessary to advise British citizens in Kiev and Minsk to leave. We have also decided to extend to north-east Poland the advice already given to intending travellers to the western Soviet Union. We are in touch with the Polish Government to identify which areas they consider to be at risk.

Our embassy is in continuing contact with the Soviet authorities about the practical arrangements for evacuation. That will probably mean that the students from Kiev and Minsk should travel to Moscow for evacuation from Moscow. Our ambassador has been told that the Soviet authorities will be of assistance. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will be seeing the Soviet ambassador this afternoon and impressing on him the need for the fullest practical co-operation.

There are still many unanswered questions. We urge the Soviet authorities to release the fullest possible information immediately. We have established an expert working group in order to monitor the situation on an hourly basis and advise Ministers on appropriate action.

The lesson of this incident is that the openness which Mr. Gorbachev has said is necessary in Soviet society must become a reality.

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): The Opposition welcome the swift action which has been taken to bring home the students and teachers in the areas of the Soviet Union affected by this undoubted catastrophe.

We thank those in the British embassy in Moscow, in the British Council and elsewhere who have acted so quickly. Will the Minister reassure us that the evacuated students and teachers will not have to bear additional cost as a result of this sudden departure? Given the cuts which have already been made in the past few years in the British Council's budget, will he ensure that it is recompensed for any additional costs resulting from this emergency, especially if a decision must regrettably be made about the tour of the Soviet Union by the London Festival ballet this weekend?

Have all the bureaucratic restrictions in the Soviet Union on travel and movement been lifted by the Soviet authorities? This is not a time for pretending to play it cool. Rather it is a time for urgent action.

On the wider issues, it is absurd and outrageous that at this late stage we know so little of this cataclysmic disaster. It is completely unacceptable for the Soviet Union's paranoid secrecy to continue to conceal from neighbouring countries the danger facing their peoples. Radioactivity does not respect the lines on any map or national frontiers, and there is a direct and urgent obligation on the Soviet Union and its new leadership to be frank and forthcoming about what is going on.

Can we be assured that the British Government have offered technical help, given the unique knowledge and experience that we have? When was it offered, and can we be assured that the Government will continue to press it? What are the Government doing about demanding better international standards for civil nuclear power and toughening the role of the International Atomic Energy Agency? Is not one lesson of this dreadful incident for both Britain and the Soviet Union that secrecy and civil nuclear power do not go together?

Mr. Eggar: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his kind remarks about Foreign Office officials — I shall pass those remarks on — and about the active role that the British Council has played with regard to the students.

I am sure that the Soviet embassy will take careful note of what the hon. Gentleman said about Soviet secrecy. I simply repeat what I said in my statement: that it would have been much easier had the Soviet Union been more open in the circumstances.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will repeat the assurance that was given this morning by our ambassador that we would be willing to give technical assistance if we were asked. We have not yet been asked. As for strengthening the IAEA rules, it is of course interesting that, when the rules were drafted, it was very much on the initiative of Soviet and British specialists working together. It is unfortunate that the Soviet Union has not at least conformed to the spirit of those rules.

I am told that the students in Minsk will travel on their revalidated air tickets from Moscow to London under arrangements that have been made by the British Council. We understand that those in Kiev, most of whom are there under the arrangement of Progressive Tours, are making similar arrangements for their return.

As for the hon. Gentleman's request for assurances about expenses that are incurred and the Festival ballet being cancelled, I am sure that he is aware that we are in constant touch with the British Council and the company. As yet, no decision has been made to cancel the tour. We shall continue to co-operate.

I am grateful for the tone in which the hon. Gentleman opened his remarks.

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): On behalf of my constituents who have young people studying in Minsk, may I thank my hon. Friend for his exceptionally prompt action in getting people evacuated? Will he make it clear to the Soviets that we will not tolerate any hindrance when it comes to getting our students out of Minsk or Kiev to Moscow and thence to London? Have any plans been laid for medical tests of those who have been evacuated?

Mr. Eggar: I thank my hon. Friend. We have had assurances that no hindrance will be put in the way of those who wish to leave. We shall have to see how matters develop, but we have no reason to believe that any bureaucratic delays will be put in people's paths. We are arranging for students and others who are returning to London, immediately to undergo a full medical check at Oxford. We are also making arrangements to fly out monitoring equipment to Moscow, which will be operated by our embassy there so that we can keep an eye on radioactivity levels in Moscow.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): May I join the Minister in condemning the unnecessary time lag and secrecy? Will the survey of possible contamination that the students may have suffered be carried out by the National Radiological Protection Board and will they be monitored regularly? Has the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority offered any technical help to the Soviet Union to fight the fire? If not, why not?

Mr. Eggar: As for the survey of the health of those who return, what happens in future will depend on the examination that they will undergo at Oxford. We are considering that matter carefully. No offer has been made by the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority directly, but we are making it quite clear to the Soviet authorities that, if a request is made, we will help as best we can.

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): Is my hon. Friend aware that I have several constituents who are visiting Kiev and Minsk, notably from Surrey university at Guildford? My hon. Friend says that arrangements are being made to evacuate them through Moscow as apparently, the Soviet authorities' normal rules require that all departures from Russia are through Moscow. Will my hon. Friend prevail on the Soviet authorities in this case, as all the trains and airlines from Kiev to Moscow are very heavily booked, to allow my constituents in Kiev and, if necessary, in Minsk to depart through Prague or Budapest instead, where they can get out much more quickly and with much less hassle and difficulty?

Mr. Eggar: I am aware of the representations that my right hon. Friend had made on behalf of his constituents. Our latest information is that it is not possible to get places on the aeroplanes from Kiev to Moscow tonight, but we believe that places will be made available on the overnight train. Our embassy in Moscow is keeping close tabs on that and we shall certainly consider my right hon. Friend's argument should it be necessary.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Although I welcome the Minister's statement about the efforts to safeguard British citizens, he will recognise that people who are contaminated could suffer very long-term effects from cancer. It is not infectious like for example, a plague. President Reagan, most generously and completely, has offered the full facilities of the United States to help the Soviet Union for, in a certain area of nuclear technology, there has always been close co-operation between the Americans, the British and the Russians, especially on nuclear safety.

Will the Government go further than indicating a readiness to help? Will they put at the disposal of the Soviet authorities the experts from the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority, British Nuclear Fuels plc, the National Radiological Protection Board and the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate, which have great experience of handling matters of this kind? As this is a major international environmental catastrophe, can it be seen in that light rather than simply as an opportunity to attack secrecy, which I greatly regret, in the Soviet Union, as there have been accidents or near-accidents in Britain and a major effort to cover up what has happened. Such a disaster could happen in any nulcear power station in the world, including ones here.

Mr. Eggar: The right hon. Gentleman is developing a considerable ability to miss the point. We will of course make assistance available to the Soviet Union when it is requested. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will reiterate that fact to the Soviet Ambassador this afternoon. The Soviets have already been informed by the Swedes and the Germans that they feel that we are the people who have the most likely expertise in this area because of our experience with graphite fires. Our people are standing by to be of assistance if the Soviet Union requests.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): When the Prime Minister meets the Soviet ambassador this afternoon, will she make it clear to him that, if this dreadful tragedy is to be properly sorted out to prevent such events in the future, it is essential that the Soviet Union gives all the scientific information properly and gives a great deal more information than it has so far chosen to give its own citizens?

Mr. Eggar: I am confident that my right hon. Friend will be making that point.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): I thank my hon. Friend and his officials for their advice and assistance during the night to my constituent in Kiev and her parents. In the event of any obstruction to the evacuation, will he immediately acquaint the House with the fact? Our concern is with our constituents, but is it not the case that, despite the attitude of the Soviet authorities and what we may think of that attitude, our sympathy remains with the Ukrainians and other peoples who have been affected by this disaster?

Mr. Eggar: Of course we express a great deal of sympathy for the people who have been killed and for those who may die in the future as a result of this appalling incident. With regard to information to my right hon. Friend and other right hon. and hon. Members who have been in touch with the office, we will continue, so far as we are able, to give an update directly to hon. Members and to the families of those concerned. We do not anticipate any obstruction, but if there should be any I will inform the House.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I remind the House that the Minister's statement was concerned with the evacuation of or assistance to British subjects, not with the general principle, which I know is of great concern? We must stick to the statement. Furthermore, we have a heavy day before us. I intend to give precedence to those hon. Members who were not called on the private notice question yesterday. In view of the business before the House, I can only allow the statement to continue for a further 10 minutes.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): Will the Minister arrange for those arriving from the Soviet Union to be thoroughly debriefed so that the greatest amount of information is gathered? Will he ensure that there is radiation measuring equipment, not only in Moscow but at all available locations in eastern Europe where it can be placed? Is this not a situation in which our reactor engineers should use all available channels open to them to contact directly their opposite numbers in the Soviet Union and make available all information on fighting fires in graphite-moderated reactors, whether it is asked for or not?

Mr. Eggar: First of all, of course I can assure the hon. Gentleman that we will be discussing the situation with the people when they return and we will get the maximum amount of information from those sources. I take careful note of the hon. Gentleman's point about radiological monitoring equipment. I will consider it further. As I said, we were able to get the equipment to Moscow quickly and we hope that it will be operating on Thursday evening or Friday. We will do what we can to make information and assistance available, but we must have the avenues opened up to us. It is not a case of our being deaf to them.

Mr. Stefan Terlezki (Cardiff, West): I congratulate my hon. Friend and the Government on taking such swift action to evacuate British citizens, wherever they may be in the Ukraine or Minsk. It is a tragedy, and it is with sorrow that I speak in the House, having been born in the Ukraine. A month ago, after 44 years' absence, I visited the very area where the tragedy occurred. I am sorry to say that, unless the Soviet Union co-operates fully with the West to assist it in finding the cause, nothing much will be achieved. How can the Soviet Union ask for help on the one hand, but, on the other, withhold all the information that is required? I sincerely hope that our Government will put all necessary scientific—not political—pressure on the Soviet Union, and Mr. Gorbachev in particular, to ensure that such a tragedy never occurs again, not only in the Soviet Union but anywhere else in the world.

Mr. Eggar: I thank my hon. Friend for his comments, particularly because he has such great personal experience of and personal feeling for the Ukraine. I agree with my hon. Friend. It is all very well to ask for a dialogue from us, but there has to be information coming from the Soviet Union. I can assure the House again that we shall give what assistance we can as soon as we see an avenue through which to give it.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): The Minister rightly said that he has issued warnings to British people visiting north Poland. Has he warned anyone else? Are there any other preparations made for evacuation? What is the hon. Gentleman's information about the movement of the radioactive cloud? Where is it expected to move to and settle, and is it moving in this direction?

Mr. Eggar: The advice that I gave in my statement referred to north-east Poland rather than north Poland. One of the reasons why, this morning, we established a group of experts to advise us on an hourly basis as to exactly what our advice to British citizens should be, was that we needed to know, among other things, the direction of the wind, to make it clear where the danger was likely to be. At the present moment, there is no danger in this country. We are monitoring radioactivity levels, but there has been no increase above the normal levels.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Is there any evidence that there was even a small-scale nuclear explosion, and even if the whole of one of the reactors were to burn out—[HON. MEMBERS: "Evacuation."] All right. Evacuation. There is great danger from the radiation which has come out of the plant. Can my hon. Friend tell the House, assuming that the whole reactor burnt out, how much radiation would be there, and how it would compare with the radiation from a nuclear bomb?

Mr. Speaker: That was very wide.

Mr. Eggar: I thank my hon. Friend for that creative question. In accordance with Mr. Speaker's wishes, I shall not comment in detail on his points.

Mr. Terry Lewis (Worsley): The whole House and the country will appreciate the speed with which the Foreign Office and the embassy in Moscow have moved on the evacuation and advice to those with immediatly pending travel. May I take the Minister in another direction and remind him that this summer, many thousands of tourists, myself included, will hope to go to Minsk and Kiev? [HON MEMBERS: "Freebie."] When the yobboes on the Conservative Benches have settled down, I shall press on with my question on this serious subject. Will the situation be monitored? What advice will be given to people who are intending to travel in the medium and longer term?

Mr. Eggar: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his kind remarks about the Foreign Office. I can assure him that we shall continue to monitor the situation not only in Minsk and Kiev, but in other areas of the western Soviet Union. We shall advise travellers accordingly. Again, our job would be made much easier if the Soviet Union made available more information.

Mr. Kenneth Warren (Hastings and Rye): Will my hon. Friend make it clear to the Soviet ambassador that, as one of those who is going to the Soviet Union next month under the leadership of Lord Whitelaw, on the Inter-Parliamentary Union delegation—[Laughter.] This is no laughing matter. I am sure that all of us would express real concern——

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Cancel the visit.

Mr. Warren: I do not think that this is at all funny. Many millions of Soviet people are now exposed to radiation, which we would not wish on any citizens in the world. I hope that that will be conveyed to the Soviet ambassador in the United Kingdom. During the discussion would it be possible to ask him if he would accept British charter aircraft to carry out the evacuation speedily, and whether he would be so kind as to inform his Government that if they would only tell us all the grades of fallout from that plant, especially in view of the worry about the plutonium weapon-grade material which is produced there, we could probably render assistance to the Soviet people, which we are all eager to do?

Mr. Eggar: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend's last point. We anticipate that the evacuation from Moscow will take place with charter aircraft. We are considering what we can do direct into Kiev, should it not be possible to make bookings on normal transport in the near future.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): May I express a minority opinion? What purpose is served by the House of Commons, at this time of acute crisis, lecturing worried people, as the Soviet leadership must be, on secrecy? Will the Minister reflect that in 1957—this has now emerged under the 30-year rule—when there was a graphite fire at Windscale, his Prime Minister, Harold Macmillan, decided not even to tell the Irish? As my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray) said, are we not more likely to create the conditions for our experts to do something about it if we shut up about secrecy—that goes for the Minister's Front Bench as much as for mine—than if we lecture the Russians on secrecy? Now is the time for help, not hindrance.

Mr. Eggar: I must say to the hon. Gentleman that our primary concern must be for the safety of British citizens. If we do not have the information on which to advise them, how can we be expected to look after their safety?

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): I congratulate my hon. Friend and his Department on the speedy and efficient way in which the matter has been carried out. Will he assure the House that he will ask the Prime Minister to express to the Soviet ambassador this afternoon the wholehearted contempt of the House for the way in which the Soviet Union has behaved towards its neighbours in not informing them of the exact position?

Mr. Eggar: I am sure that the Soviet ambassador will take note of my hon. Friend's point.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): If the Soviet authority took into its confidence not only the international community but its own people, would not one of the virtues be that it would dampen the rumours and speculations? Has the Minister seen the headlines in some newspapers, claiming that there are up to 2,000 victims? Would it not be useful if the Russian ambassador were told that while the British people have every possible sympathy with the Russian people over what has happened, they find it extremely difficult to understand—without using the same words as the hon. Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames)—why the full truth is not being told?

Mr. Eggar: I am sure that the Soviet embassy will take that point when it reads the Official Report of our discussions this afternoon.

Mr. Andrew MacKay (Berkshire, East): Is not the most significant aspect of this tragic affair the woeful lack of information coming from the Soviet Union? Would my hon. Friend be surprised if some people with an insight into the affairs of the Soviet Union in the light of these events were to feel that there has been a woeful disregard for life there?

Mr. Eggar: My hon. Friend is absolutely correct.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): On behalf of the Munro family in my constituency, whose daughter Catriona was one of the student party at Minsk, may I thank the Minister, the private office and the representatives of the Government in the Soviet Union for the first-class help and attention which they gave the families? They have done much to alleviate the obvious concern and distress of the family at home in the Highlands of Scotland. Regarding the travel arrangements, is it intended that the party at Minsk will in all likelihood fly from Moscow tomorrow and arrive at Heathrow tomorrow evening?

Mr. Eggar: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his remarks, and I shall see that they are passed on. We understand that on present schedule the party at Minsk is due to arrive at Heathrow tomorrow evening.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): As this is a world problem, will the Government raise through the United Nations the need for the Soviet Union to give the fullest information to the United Nations' affiliate — the International Atomic Energy Agency?

Mr. Eggar: That is a point that we shall want to consider. Our immediate concern is to get the necessary information for us to advise our citizens appropriately.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Reverting to an earlier answer about medical tests on students and other evacuees returning in the near future—which I welcome—will the Minister also give an assurance that those who, for one reason or another, are delayed for several weeks, and do not return to the United Kingdom for one or even two months will receive the same medical screening and assistance when they return? Will he persuade his hon. Friends that some of our medical expertise should be issued to the Ukraine Supreme Soviet and the other local hospitals in the affected areas?

Mr. Eggar: We are keeping medical screening under constant review. Obviously, what we do in future will depend greatly on the results of the screening of the first groups to return. Obviously, if medical assistance is requested, we shall make it available.

Mr. Neil Thorne (Ilford, South): In facilitating the evacuation of British personnel, can my hon. Friend comment on the effectiveness of the Soviet civil defence and civil defence and protection procedures and say whether they are in any way inhibited by any bogus nuclear-free zone?

Mr. Eggar: I am afraid that I do not have information on that area.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would rather take the point of order after the application under Standing Order No. 10, as there is also another point of order.

Soviet Nuclear Accident

4.6 pm

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that merits urgent consideration, namely, "the impact of the Soviet nuclear accident on the future of the British nuclear power programme."

As I was unable to notify you before 12 o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I must draw your attention to certain matters which have come to my notice since that deadline. First, a forecast of 20,000 cancer deaths has been made by Greenpeace. Secondly, there has been an explosion in New Delhi in a heavy water factory for the Indian nuclear industry. Thirdly, restrictions have been placed on water, food and milk consumption in neighbouring countries. Fourthly, Representative Edward Markey, an American congressman, has said, properly, that there is a 45 per cent. risk of such an accident occurring in the United States during the next 20 years.

The matter cannot be contained simply by rebuking the Soviet Union for its secrecy, although I greatly regret that it has not given more information. It may not know what has happened; that is always a possibility. However, it is clear that there has been a melt-down and a fire, with added hazard. It is possible that neighbouring reactors will be affected by the fire and that rivers may be contaminated. This is a major international environmental disaster, comparable in the civil sphere to what happened in Hiroshima when the first bomb exploded.

I am asking that we now have an opportunity to discuss fully the whole nature of the problem. Many British people, not only those with relatives in Russia but those who live near our nuclear power stations, want an opportunity to have the matter fully discussed. We should discuss how far it is true that Britain has been candid about its nuclear industry. For eight years I had responsibility as a Minister, and on many occasions information was not made available to me. This is a matter—[Interruption.] I hope that the House will listen. I am talking about our nuclear power programme. When there was a disaster at Kyshtym in 1958, it was known to the atomic energy authority but was not disclosed for 15 years to British Ministers. As my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) pointed out, when there was a fire at Windscale it was not disclosed to the Irish, who were deeply concerned. When there were leaks at——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has only three minutes in which to speak, and he has used up two and a half of them.

Mr. Benn: The point is that nothing could be more misleading than for responsible Ministers to give the impression that such an accident could not happen here. It could. Openness is one thing, and everyone should want it, but the risk of a tragedy is another. I urge the House to take seriously the need for a debate tomorrow on the whole question of nuclear safety in Britain as well as in other countries.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Gentleman asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter which he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the impact of the Soviet nuclear accident on the future of the British nuclear power programme."

I in no way under-estimate the importance of what the right hon. Gentleman has put to the House and nor do hon. Members, but, as he knows, the only decision I have to take is whether to give this matter precedence over the business already set down for today or tomorrow.

I listened carefully to what the right hon. Gentleman said, but I regret that I do not consider the matter that he has raised to be appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10. I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House.

Channel Tunnel Bill

4.13 pm

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to raise a point of order on the Channel Tunnel Bill, of which I have given you prior notice.

The Government, through the Department of Transport, have recently circulated to Kent district councils on the consultative committee chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for Hampshire, North-West (Mr. Mitchell), Minister of State, Department of Transport, a public document entitled, "Channel Tunnel Timetable". That document, of which I have sent you a copy, purports to set out the future parliamentary timetable of the Channel Tunnel Bill in meticulous detail and in a way that has certainly not been disclosed to the House. In particular, that so-called timetable gives several precise dates of legislative events and stages in the House and the other place. For example, it states that the Select Committee will hold its proceedings from Tuesday 17 June until 24 July.

I submit that that is not just a misguided piece of parliamentary clairvoyance, but a display of Government arrogance — it will be interpreted as such — that has already been greeted with consternation in Kent and by Members of Parliament for constituencies there.

I think that the whole House is aware that there is already concern in Kent at the way in which some of the Bill's scrutiny has been rushed through within a short time. As a result, the people of Kent place great reliance on the hybrid Bill procedure, which allows them to petition the House and, for the first time, to obtain a fair hearing for their grievances. They hope that Parliament will do what the Government have so far failed to do, and will scrutinise the Channel tunnel project with thorough and proper procedures.

Unfortunately, the Department of Transport published timetable may create the impression that the Select Commitee will be yet another fixed rush job and that Parliament will just dance subserviently to the Government's tune and keep to the Government's timetable. As the guardian of the rights of constituents through their elected representatives, Mr. Speaker, may I ask you to rule on the following points?

First, is it in order for a Department to issue a public document giving the parliamentary timetable on a Bill that has not yet even had its Second Reading? Surely that is a contempt of the House. Secondly, will you reassure the House and the people of Kent that no timetable has been imposed by the Government on the Channel Tunnel Bill, and that such a power rests only with Parliament? In particular, will you emphasise that the sitting arrangements and timings for a Select Committee are decided by the members of that Committee, and will you take note of the view that any attempt to rush through a Select Committee's hearings on a Bill of this magnitude in six weeks would be highly unusual, if not irregular?

Finally, will you confirm, Mr. Speaker, that the Channel Tunnel Bill, far from being at full speed ahead, is already marooned by other procedural snags of the Government's own making? Is it not the case that the hybrid parts of the Bill have already been judged out of time by the Examiners, and that the Bill can now proceed only if the Standing Orders Committee takes the controversial step of granting it an official dispensation? Will you use your good offices to ensure that some second thoughts are given to the Bill by the Government and the usual channels in order to ensure that better parliamentary manners and a greater degree of fair play and fair hearing is shown to my constituents and others whose interests are affected?

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) for giving me notice of his point of order, as it has enabled me to go into the matter in some detail.

The hon. Gentleman is correct in stating that the Examiners of the Petitions for Private Bills, to whom the House referred the Bill on 18 April, reported on Monday that, in the case of the Channel Tunnel Bill, the relevant Standing Orders have not been complied with. The Examiners' report has therefore been referred in the usual way to the Standing Orders Committee.

As to the other points that the hon. Gentleman raised, I need say only that progress on the Bill, and the time spent on it, are entirely matters for the House, not for me.

Any informal timetable or other document circulated by the hon. Member in charge of the Bill must be a matter for him. A formal timetable or guillotine could be imposed only by the House.

As the House knows, this Bill is a hybrid Bill, and will follow well-established procedures. If the Standing Orders Committee allows the Bill to proceed, and if the House decides to give the Bill a Second Reading and commits it to a Select Committee, it will be for the Chairman and members of that Committee to decide on the times and duration of its sittings.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The House will be grateful to you for that ruling, which meets some of the anxieties raised quite properly by the hon. Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken). But the matter goes a bit further than that. All hon. Members will want to know where on earth the document came from and what involvement the Secretary of State for Transport had in its preparation. Such timetables are not simply manufactured out of thin air. If the Secretary of State for Transport has been involved, I very much hope that the Leader of the House, who is in his place, will convey to him the anger felt on both sides of the House over his consent to its publication. If the Secretary of State is involved, we expect an early statement from him on the matter.

Mr. Mark Wolfson (Sevenoaks): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I thank you for clarifying the position? The position of my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) in relation to the Channel Tunnel Bill is well known. I support the concept of the tunnel and the Government's approach, but I also share the concerns aired by my hon. Friend, as it is essential that my Kent constituents should feel that their very real concerns will be properly considered by the House, as you have outlined, Mr. Speaker, and by, in particular, the members of the Select Committee.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that I need add anything to what I have said. I hope that I have made the position clear.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg (Hampstead and Highgate): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. As the document has been referred to, will it be made available to the rest of the House, so that hon. Members may see the wording used and whether the interpretation put on it by hon. Members fits with the actual wording?

Mr. Speaker: I do not know anything about the document. It is a matter for the Government. I understand that it is an unofficial timetable from some hon. Member concerned with the Bill, but I do not know anything about it.

WELSH AFFAIRS

Ordered,

That the matter of the Welsh Development Agency, being a matter relating exclusively to Wales, be referred to the Welsh Grant Committee for its consideration—[Mr. Durant.]

Air Navigation Orders Amendment

4.21 pm

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make Air Navigation Orders subject to negative resolution procedure.

Section 60 of the Civil Aviation Act 1982 gives the Secretary of State for Transport the power, by statutory instrument, to regulate air navigation through air navigation orders. On 30 October 1985, Air Navigation Order No. 1643 was made. It was laid before Parliament on 7 November 1985, and came into operation on 1 December 1985. That statutory instrument contains 139 pages, 10 parts, 98 sections and 13 schedules. It is a complex and formidable instrument.

At the time it was laid before Parliament it was subject to the negative resolution, and it would have been possible for hon. Members to pray against it. In theory at least, there was a form of parliamentary scrutiny and control. I say "in theory" because the instrument is so long and complex and contains sections which, when examined carefully, disclose that it gives huge powers to the Secretary of State for Transport, powers over which Parliament no longer has any say or control. For example, article 64(1) in part VIII, which concerns the control of air traffic, states:

"Without prejudice to any other provision of this Order, the Secretary of State may make regulations (referred to in this Order as the Rules of the Air and Air Traffic Control) prescribing—

(a) the manner in which aircraft may move or fly including in particular provision for requiring aircraft to give way to military aircraft."

Subparagraph (e) states:

"any other provisions for securing the safety of aircraft in flight and in movement and the safety of persons and property on the surface."

Article 69(1) states:

"Where the Secretary of State deems it necessary in the public interest to restrict or prohibit flying by reason of—. . .

(iii) national defence or any other reason affecting the public interest".

That is a sweeping and all-embracing power. Article 69(1) (b) states:

"Regulations made under this article may apply either generally or in relation to any class of aircraft."

That is another catch-all power vested in the Secretary of State. I submit that those are wide-ranging and sweeping powers. Not surprisingly, air space users have, in different ways, registered their concern.

My right hon. and hon. Friends the Ministers at the Department of Transport are aware of the concern. I have attended meetings with Ministers at which representatives of the independent airlines have voiced their concern about Air Navigation Order 1985, No. 1643. I have also attended meetings at which Ministers have been made aware of defects concerning the legal aspects of a number of the articles and schedules on Air Navigation Order No. 1643.

When Parliament gave the Civil Aviation Authority the power to advise Ministers and Ministers the right to introduce rules of the air with no further reference to Parliament, it did so because it believed that those matters should be handled by experts. The first group of experts was the staff of National Air Traffic Services. National Air Traffic Services is a joint body which is responsible to the Ministry of Defence and the Ministry of Transport. It comprises civil servants experienced in air traffic control and serving Royal Air Force officers also experienced in air traffic control. The present controller of NATS is a civil servant. The previous controller was a serving Royal Air Force air marshal. The present deputy controller is a serving Royal Air Force air vice-marshal. The previous deputy controller was a civil servant.

The experts from National Air Traffic Services were required to consult the experts representing all the interested bodies who use the air space. Recommendations which emerged from the consultations regarding the introduction of regulations affecting air space were to be made to the Secretary of State for Transport. The experts were required to consult a body called NATMAC. The chairman of this body is a serving Royal Air Force air commodore.

If the consultations between the experts had worked effectively and the users of the air space had been confident that discussions were not just ritual or, as some have said, a sham, the fact that Parliament has no say in the introduction of new air space regulations would not have mattered. Sadly, I have to report that new regulated air space has been introduced. Evidence claiming to support the need has, upon examination, in more than one instance, been found to be flawed.

I cite the example of Blue 22, the airway between Edinburgh, Glasgow and Aberdeen. It took me many years to have the airway moved. It was moved to the position where I suggested it should and could have been when it was first proposed. I thank my hon. Frind the Under-Secretary of State for Transport — the Member for Worcester, North (Mr. Spicer)—and my noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State in the other place for making the change possible. We remain deeply indebted to them.

Recently, we have seen the introduction of special air space rules at Royal Air Fiorce Brize Norton and the 200 square mile rule 36a mandatory radiocall air space at the United States Air Force base at Upper Heyford. I know that hon. Members are aware of other reasons for it being reported. I shall make my position quite clear. I fully support the decision on the use of that base, and nothing that I have to say is in condemnation of that act. I would support it a second time.

I understand that hon. Members have been advised that microlight balloonists, hang gliders, parachutists and other recreational flying organisations support the measures that have been taken and are happy with the arrangements concerning Brize Norton and Upper Heyford.

Hon. Members have been advised that local gliding clubs are happy with the arrangements on a trial period basis—an arrangement which was made by a working group which was asked to look into the problems that were claimed to exist. In my view, those claims have not been proven. I believe that the near-miss statistics are flawed.

I have been advised by the air space user bodies that, contrary to what hon. Members have been told, none of the bodies is happy. I shall be writing to my hon. Friend at the Department of Transport and will provide evidence that they are not happy. I shall provide him with all the details.

It was not acceptable for a senior RAF officer to advise the air space users' experts at the NATMAC meetings that they should not lobby hon. Members—however well-intentioned that advice was and however it was given. He was not qualified to do so. That was unwise and probably naive.

No one denies that we must have safe air space. No one denies that some controls are essential. I claim that the system of checks and balances which is required in a democracy has broken down. At present, the system is fundamentally flawed.

Regarding the trial at Upper Heyford, the evidence suggests that the air traffic controllers will be unable to handle the radio traffic. In my view, the trial will not produce any reliable evidence on which decisions can be taken. The airlines are unhappy. Commercial and recreational fliers are unhappy. Aviation legislation is in a confused state. The system used to create the legislation is not adequately scrutinised by Parliament. The body responsible for introducing the legislation is supervised by two Ministers—two bosses—which is a most unhappy situation. That is why urgent action is needed. The present policy has structural defects which will lead to management and operational problems. My Bill will make a small contribution towards rectifying the situation.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Bill Walker, Mr. Alan Haselhurst, Mr. Jack Aspinwall, Sir Hector Monro, Mr. Albert McQuarrie, Mr. David Lambie, Mr. Ernie Ross and Mr. Dennis Canavan.

AIR NAVIGATION ORDERS AMENDMENT

Mr. Bill Walker accordingly presented a Bill to make Air Navigation Orders subject to negative resolution procedure: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 6 June and to be printed. [Bill 152.]

Orders of the Day

Public Order Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

New Clause 1

OFFENCES OF HARASSMENT, ALARM OR DISTRESS

'(1) A person is guilty of an offence if:

(a) he uses words which are threatening, abusive or insulting or behaviour which is threatening, abusive, insulting or disorderly, and

(b) those words or that behaviour cause harassment, alarm or distress to another person, or

(c) such words or behaviour are likely to harass, alarm or distress another person.

(2) Offences under this section may be committed in private as well as in public places, but a person using words or behaviour inside a dwelling does not commit such an offence unless the use is likely to cause harassment, alarm or distress to persons outside that and any other dwelling.

(3) In subsection (2) "dwelling" has the same meaning as in section 4(2).

(4) It is a defence for the accused to prove that his conduct was reasonable in the circumstances.

(5) A constable may arrest without warrant anyone he finds committing an offence under this section.

(6) A person guilty of an offence under this section is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 3 on the standard scale.

(7) A person is guilty of an offence under this section only if he uses words which are threatening, abusive or insulting or behaviour which is threatening, abusive, insulting or disorderly and he intends his words or behaviour to cause alarm, harassment or distress or is reckless as to the consequences of his words or behaviour.'.—[Sir Eldon Griffiths.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

4.30 pm

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): With this it will be convenient to take the following: Government amendment No. 12.

Government amendment No. 13, in clause 5, page 3, line 32 leave out from 'if' to end of line 7 on page 4 and insert

'he—

(a) uses threatening, abusive or insulting words or behaviour, or disorderly behaviour, or

(b) displays any writing, sign or other visible representation which is threatening, abusive or insulting, within the hearing or sight of a person likely to be caused harassment, alarm or distress thereby.

(2) An offence under this section may be committed in a public or a private place, except that no offence is committed where the words or behaviour are used, or the writing, sign or other visible representation is displayed, by a person inside a dwelling and the other person is also inside that or another dwelling.

(3) It is a defence for the accused to prove—

(a) that he had no reason to believe that there was any person within hearing or sight who was likely to be caused harassment, alarm or distress, or

(b) that he was inside a dwelling and had no reason to believe that the words or behaviour used, or the writing, sign or other visible representation displayed, would be heard or seen by a person outside that or any other dwelling, or

(c) that his conduct was reasonable.'.

and amendment (a) thereto, in line 6, at end insert—

'(c) causes a noise or noises which is or are likely to harass, alarm or distress another person and he has reason to believe that such noise or noises is or are likely to cause such harassment, alarm or distress.'.

Government amendments Nos. 15 to 17, and 19 and 22.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: The new clause and the amendments arise from the debris of the late and unlamented clause 5. The Police Federation said:

"Clause 5 we regard in its present form as a legislative nightmare. We do not regard it as practicable in its present form and its present potential to do that which it is apparently intended to do is close to nil."

When I arrived somewhat late in Committee, I was delighted to hear the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) quoting those wise words. Although I would never accuse him of being a born again Christian, I was delighted to find that, in the intervening period between consideration of the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill and the consideration of this legislation, he had come a long way towards accepting at least the occasional wisdom of the police service. I welcome the right hon. Gentleman to the group of supporters of the Police Federation and hope that he will long continue to adopt that posture.

It would be wrong to rehearse in detail my new clause 1, because the House will wish most to hear the Government's explanation of their amendments, which, broadly speaking, traverse the same territory as the new clause. In the interests of starting this long Report stage at a good pace, the best thing that I can do is to allow my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office to explain the Government's amendments.

Clauses 4 and 5, with which this series of amendments deal, are among the most important in the Bill. For a long time we have been conscious of the threat to our people from violent crimes — for example, rape, burglary, vandalism and assaults. We have been less conscious of that which affects large numbers of ordinary people but rarely gets into the headlines — the insults and harassment which distress the elderly, the poor and the lonely in the neighbourhoods of our cities, especially in high-rise buildings. Too often such crimes and harassment are ignored by the media. They are rarely tackled in the House because they do not have the political sex appeal of the larger crimes. The House will be going to the rescue of a large number of ordinary people if it passes the amendments.

We should be concerned primarily with the victims— the elderly, the pregnant women wheeling their prams in areas where they are set upon by hooligans, the black people in white neighbourhoods and, sometimes, the white people in black neighbourhoods, who are confronted by gangs of youngsters who behave in a fashion with which we must deal.

I am glad that the Government's amendments, with the Opposition's support, have included the offensive literature, signs and other graffiti that can be used to cause distress and to harass.

I have just returned from Northern Ireland. I know, of course, that that region is not covered by the Bill. This morning I saw a sign which almost precisely illustrated the types of signs with which we should deal. After the petrol bombing of the homes of a large number of Northern Ireland police officers, especially three women police officers who were intimidated out of their flat by petrol bombs, signs were held up saying, in the language of the National Coal Board, "Go home to a nice warm fire. Join the RUC." By any measure that is insulting, but I am not certain that a court of law would necessarily, under the terms of the amendments, bring in a finding of guilty in such cases.

There is no doubt that the intention behind a sign which says, "Go home to a nice warm fire. Join the RUC" and which is held up in the neighbourhoods in which police officers live is crystal clear. Also crystal clear is the literature put out, I regret to say, by the GLC and some of the London boroughs in their attempts to insult, harass and cause distress to the police service.

I shall not argue the case for my new clause. I look forward instead to hearing the explanation of my hon. Friend the Minister of State of the Government's amendments, which more or less traverse the same ground as new clause 1.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): The greatest environmental nuisance from which our people suffer is noise caused by their fellow citizens. The law is inadequate. The police and environmental health officers believe that it is inadequate. Large numbers of people in the inner cities whose life is made hell by noise from their neighbours certainly know that the law is inadequate.

The environmental health officer who deals with all the problems of pollution would be able to tell us that the greatest number of complaints that he receives on pollution concern noise and noise nuisance. It is a striking fact that in the past two years the number of complaints concerning noise has increased by about 25 per cent. each year.

I should like to give two examples. I remember coming up to London one evening at 8 o'clock. I got out of my car and heard the noise of a pop concert. It was the loudest noise in the vicinity. If I had tried to talk to someone on the street, I would have found it difficult because of the noise. I found out later that the pop concert was a third of a mile away from where I was standing. There must have been 250,000 people within earshot of that din. The concert had started at half-past 2 in the afternoon. No doubt the police had received countless complaints. As my hon. Friend the Minister will know, the police could do nothing about it. There was, of course, always the possibility of going to the environmental health officer, but, because it was Lambeth, no such officer was on duty at that time. Of course, he could have done little about the problem.

My second example concerns a letter from Mr. Bailey, a constituent of the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen). Mr. Bailey kindly sent me a copy of a letter that he sent to his Member of Parliament. The hon. Gentleman is not here, but I hope that he will not mind if I read a short extract. The letter stated:

"as I am writing this letter, there is music playing from a flat loud enough to drown the television in my own flat . . . The particular flat in question had a party last night . . . and after a sleepless night . . . at 7.30 the music was still blasting out. This was Sunday evening. On Saturday evening there were five all night parties, so that evening was sleepless. Last Wednesday the flat that is making the noise tonight had had another all night party . . . All this . . . takes place in one section, one of the quadrangles of the estate on which I live, to say nothing of the fact that there are also parties being organised in other sections . . .

These are not simply parties, a large number of them are paying businesses brought about by tickets being printed and issued in public houses . . . charges being made . . . the printed tickets advertise 'the blues party sounds' disco equipment, lights, DJs etc . . . Add to this you get a great movement of people wandering, running and shouting round the balconies, knocking doors at all hours, going from one party to another and back again, shouting across from one walkway to another at each other, bottles are broken on the walkways—milk bottles, wine bottles etc., walls are urinated on and to have to use the lifts in the morning is foul as you literally stand in pools of urine where the lifts are used as a public convenience.

The position at present is that all that can be done by the police is that they can ask for the noise to be turned down, but it rarely has any effect as they have no power to reinforce this. The environmental health officer can be informed though cannot be called out at the necessary times".

Mr. Bailey and the people who live near him, and the many thousands of other people in our inner cities, have a real problem to live with. It is time that we stopped tolerating the intolerant making life intolerable for many of our citizens.

As a result of the experience that I had with the pop concert, I wrote to my hon. Friend the Minister and asked what the Government could do about it. He kindly wrote back to me and said:

"Experience suggests that Part III of the Control of Pollution Act 1974 offers considerable scope for action against environmental noise . . . However, I agree that it does not always provide the perfect solution."

We are not looking for the perfect solution, but we are looking for a solution. The letter continued:

"There can be a problem where the objective is to stop the noise, rather than prevent recurrence".

I suggest to my hon. Friend that if he is in the vicinity of the noise he will find that it is a big problem. My hon. Friend's letter went on:

"successful action usually depends on the availability of the EHO to act during the night, during the holidays or at weekends and this unfortunately is not always possible. Enforcing a notice through the courts would, of course, take time."

I have just proved to my hon. Friend that that is a great underestimate and is a problem as well.

A number of local authorities are anxious to take action to deal with this problem, but many of them are less aggressive in their supervision of this issue. In that context, one has only to look at the local authority run by that seminal influence on the philosophy of the Labour party, Mr. Bernard Grant—Haringey—to answer the question about whether the law is effectively applied there. My hon. Friend said in his letter:

"the Public Order Bill currently before Parliament includes a provision for the creation of a new offence of disorderly conduct, which in certain circumstances could apply to the nuisance caused by noisy parties."

That is this Bill. I welcome that provision and regard it as an invitation to help to reinforce the Bill by bringing forward my amendment. I may well seek to press it to a Division, but we shall see how we go.

A short article was published not long ago in Environmental Health. Opposition Members may be every bit as interested in that article as are Government Members, because many of their constituents suffer the same problem. The article stated:

"Early in 1983 the London Borough of Waltham Forest received a complaint about noise nuisance being caused by loud music, live and recorded, being played by a young couple (with two children and pregnant with a third), in a tower block. The nuisance was confirmed by an environmental health officer and despite verbal warnings it continued. In August"—

hon. Members should bear in mind that the nuisance started early in 1983—

"a Section 58 notice was served on them both. Ten days later a contravention was witnessed by an environmental health officer. Legal proceedings were instituted and came to Court on the 8th November."

The section 58 notice was served in August and legal proceedings did not come to court until 8 November. The article continued:

"The case was adjourned and there followed two more adjournments. The music at this time was still continuing to such an extent that one complainant took his family into bed and breadfast accommodation and another slept on a park bench.

The Council then decided to seek an injunction which was granted on the 19th December. On the 23rd December the Section 58 case came to Court and the defendants were found guilty, and each fined £200 with £100 costs.

They appealed against conviction and sentence but failed to attend the Crown Court hearing in May 1984."

—the original nuisance having started well over a year before—

"In July the music started again, intermittently at first but then more persistently. On the 1st October a warning letter was sent and apparently ignored. The Council then reluctantly took action under the injunction and on the 4th December 1984"— nearly two years after the original offence—

"the case appeared in the High Court.

The Judge found in the Council's favour but due to the now three children did not sentence the woman defendant. The man, however, was given 7 days imprisonment, suspended for 3 months. The Judge further ordered that the music should never again be a nuisance and after 10 pm should not even be audible anywhere outside their flat."

I wonder whether the people have had even that success. That was two years of hell for all the people living in that neighbourhood and that was all that could be done under the law as it exists.

My hon. Friend is bringing forward his amendment which will make it an offence if anybody indulges in disorderly behaviour

"within the hearing or sight of a person likely to be caused harassment, alarm or distress thereby."

If such an offence occurs, a police constable will be able to ask the offender to desist and, if noise is the offence, to turn down the noise. If the offender does not do so, in the final event arrest will ensue. We need to know whether this will apply if a noise case is taken to court. Will the court interpret my hon. Friend's amendment as applying to noise?

4.45 pm

We are anxious to know whether the law is wide enough and whether it can be applied. Many of the people who suffer are the weak, like the little old lady who has to put up with this din week in and week out. Under the present law, if the case is taken to court, the probability is that such a lady will have to go to court and testify. I ask the House to think of the potential harassment, victimisation and intimidation she would have to consider. She would not go to court because it would not be worth her life to do so. To go to court is not a realistic alternative for her.

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow): My hon. Friend is right, but does he agree that the problem is even worse than he has outlined? There is a civil remedy, but no legal aid is available for those who take that sort of action. Because of the time-wasting tactics in such a case, the person that my hon. Friend describes would find herself with enormous court bills and no remedy at the end of the day.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend is an expert in these matters, and I accept his advice. That is the reality of the problem, and the experience of many unfortunate people has taught them that they have no real remedy.

I look forward to what my hon. Friend the Minister has to say about his amendment. Will it remedy the situation? My amendment seeks to give the police powers which will be sensibly used, because the police are always cognisant of the overall necessity of maintaining public order. If this nuisance occurs and many people in the neighbourhood complain, the police will be empowered to go and tell the offender to desist. If he does not desist, the police will be able to take further action. Short of such powers, I do not know how we are to rid our neighbourhoods of this nuisance. I am sure that my hon. Friend will look at the matter as carefully as he can and, hopefully, will see what the Government can do to help.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): I am slightly puzzled by the part of Government amendment No. 12 which reads:

"except that no offence is committed where the words or behaviour are used, or the writing, sign or other visible representation is distributed or displayed, by a person inside a dwelling and the other person is also inside that or another dwelling.'."

However, having seen such an incident once, a passerby would be less likely to do anything or become annoyed than someone in a house across the road who must look at an offending sign day in and day out. I should like to know why the amendment has been so worded.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg (Hampstead and Highgate): I support amendment (a) in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) to Government amendment No. 13. He has hit on an issue important to those of us who represent inner-city constituencies. Not a surgery of mine passes by without someone complaining about noise nuisance from above them or to the side of them. Such noise arises from parties of various kinds and ranges from guitars to bongo drums, all of which causes immense unhappiness. I suggested that such occurrences are not the everyday life of parliamentary draftsmen or Ministers' advisers. Consequently, they may not realise the problems faced by ordinary people who live in blocks of flats in inner cities.

The Minister is a robust Yorkshireman who comes from a part of the world that used to provide superb cricketers. He is therefore able to knock odd advice away from him and to say, "They may be right in detail, but I want this done. Find a form of words that will do it." I am sure that that is the wish of my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North, whose amendment I was delighted to sign, and that is what I certainly want. I do not want to be told, "We think that it is covered by the Bill, but it will have to be tested in the courts." We do not want to be told, "It is rather difficult and we are not sure whether it can be done."

When my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North said that he might have to force this issue to a Division, there was laughter from the Opposition Front Bench. I do not find this a funny matter, nor do my constituents who have come to me with very real problems and who have been unable to sleep for weekend after weekend.

I do not expect the Minister to say that he accepts the amendment, because I know that no drafting by Back Benchers ever satisfies the rigid criteria of parliamentary draftsmen—and understandably so. I hope that he will accept that there is a real problem in this regard and say that if the amendment is not pressed he will return at a later stage with a form of wording that will cover the important issues that we are seeking to raise.

I hope that the Minister will understand that this is one of the two most frustrating types of case with which we must deal. At present we cannot help people. We can tell them to use the byelaws and to get three people to sign, but then those who have signed are subjected to unpleasant threats.

There is a case in my constituency at present of people who have done immense service for charity in London and overseas. One is now sick with heart trouble. The council moved those people to a quiet flat, but they are being harassed by a group of young 12-year-olds who constantly skateboard outside, thus making it difficult for them to sleep. When the woman remonstrates gently—and she is a gentle woman — with some of the parents, she is verbally harassed and told to mind her own business. That was not the phrase that was used, but I doubt whether the House would wish to hear the filthy language that exists even in Hampstead. The following night, until dusk, these skateboarding youngsters made life for my constituents utter hell.

That is also a form of noise, and while it may not be possible to bring it within the scope of the amendment suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North, it illustrates the point that a citizen should not be obliged to get the support of other citizens who are then exposed to the verbal harassment and intimidation that might follow.

The intervention of the police under reasonable circumstances would be a more pleasant way of proceeding for the innocent victims of extremely unpleasant circumstances. I therefore hope that the Minister will be able to give some comfort to our constituents who are so disturbed by all this.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Giles Shaw): In responding to my hon. Friends, I wish also to speak to the Government amendments that have been grouped with the new clause. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) for having the generosity to move his new clause in such a rapid and courteous way. I shall attempt to deal with the subject of the new clause in my comments on the Government's amendments.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Mrs. Kellett-Bowman) asked about the purpose of amendment No. 12. That relates to clause 4, which replaces the existing offence of threatening behaviour in section 5 of the Public Order Act. Although the amendments propose a complete redraft of sections 1 and 2, they contain only two changes. The first was a point put to us by the police to reformulate the test of conduct likely to cause a breach of the peace, and clause 4 specifies parties to the conduct. However, in making the offence more specific, we unintentionally lost some of the conduct currently caught by section 5. In particular, clause 4 would not catch the situation where the defendant used threats towards one person in a way that was likely to provoke a violent response by someone else — for example, the victim's parent or spouse.

There was doubt whether certain other triangular conflicts would be covered. Amendment No. 12 puts this beyond doubt by inserting "or another" in the appropriate place in clause 4(1). In this respect it brings it into line with section 5 of the Public Order Act. That is why the amendment is so drafted.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: In my new clause and in the Government amendment, the offence is not committed where one person is inside a building and the other person is inside that or another dwelling. The problem is that if two flats are adjacent to each other and a vile notice in the window is visible to a person living in an adjoining flat, the other person is aggravated, annoyed, harassed and insulted, but the police can do nothing about it because the person who is harassed is in another dwelling.

Mr. Shaw: My hon. Friend will recall that in Committee we spent a substantial time discussing the extent to which the offence should extend to individuals within private dwellings. He will also be aware that the other part of our amendment refers to the display or writing of visible representation

"which is threatening, abusive or insulting."

We made it quite clear that that does not have the same impact as words or behaviour outside. My hon. Friend is therefore right to say that in this case we are constrained by the privacy of separate homes. He will recall that if a person made an insulting remark or displayed a sign for the benefit of outsiders, that would be covered. But it would not be covered if it was within the same private dwelling. If that does not satisfy my hon. Friend, I shall take the matter up separately with him.

The main amendment is No. 13, which reflects the redrafting to clause 5. There are three changes of substance to which I should draw attention. Much the most important is the introduction of a victim. We said in Committee that we hoped to introduce such a requirement, but without going so far that the victim would be required to give evidence in every case. Some doubt was expressed as to whether we could square the circle in that way, but we believe that we have managed to do that by importing into clause 5(1) the additional requirement that the defendant's behaviour should be within the hearing or sight of a person likely to be caused harassment, alarm or distress thereby.

5 pm

The victim need not be someone who was alarmed, harassed or distressed, but someone who saw or heard the defendant's conduct and was likely to be alarmed by it. The prosecution will not necessarily have to produce the victim in court, but it will have to identify in each case who it was who was likely to be alarmed and so on. The court's mind will thus be concentrated on the impact, or likely impact, of the defendant's behaviour on those who were around at that time.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): I well understand the basis upon which the changes have been made, and, of course, I welcome the concessions that have been made, but does the hon. Gentleman agree that the form of the amendment dealing with the likelihood of someone being affected is yet another example of the law paying slavish adherence to the hearsay rule? Does he not think that it is high time that the hearsay rule was re-examined in respect of offences such as this? Does he not think that it would have been far better to require there to be somebody who was actually harassed, alarmed or distressed, but to permit hearsay evidence to be given in court as to the fact that that person had been harassed, alarmed or distressed? I make the suggestion particularly in the light of the White Paper on criminal justice which was recently published in which the Government appear to accept the principle that we must re-examine the hearsay rule to see whether we need to adhere to it as tightly as we have.

Mr. Shaw: The hon. and learned Gentleman would have witnessed, if he had been a member of the Standing Committee, the substantial discussions that took place on how far we should go to provide an offence which would protect although it would identify those persons on whom a mischief was committed and which did not require such persons to face the defendant. The Committee was also concerned about the court relying solely on the evidence of the arresting officer or the officer bringing the charge.

The points made that convinced us that we were going in the right direction were, firstly, that there was a real need to protect the vulnerable members of society and not to require, in every case, the victims to be produced in court. We believed equally that it was necessary to remove as far as possible the accusation that there was a revival of the sus law and that it was not simply a matter of hearsay or suspicion. We believe that we have gone some way in the drafting of this amendment to achieving those aims.

Where an offence is committed a person must be within sight or hearing whom the officer can claim would have been likely to have been harassed, alarmed or distressed. The amendment still provides for more direct evidence to be produced, but if we are to protect the vulnerable from giving evidence in cases involving disorderly conduct from young hooligans we would not want that to happen in every case.

The victim must certainly be proved to be someone who had been alarmed, harassed or distressed or that the defendant's conduct was at least likely to alarm. The prosecution will not necessarily have to produce the victim, though it must identify who it was who was likely to be alarmed or distressed. In that way, the amendment will have the desired effect.

It is not enough for magistrates to feel that the person would have been alarmed or distressed, or that someone might have been so if present at the scene. They must ascertain who was there and whether that person was likely to be alarmed, harassed or distressed by the defendant's conduct. We believe that that is an important new safeguard which should help to quell any remaining fears that the disorderly conduct provision is a revival of sus.

The next change that we have made to clause 5(1) has been to delete the requirement that the defendant must have reasonable cause to believe that his words or behaviour are likely to cause alarm, harassment or distress. That reflected the views expressed in Committee that we wanted to provide a defence for the defendant who was not aware and had no reason to be aware that his behaviour was likely to cause alarm and so on and that this safeguard might perhaps be achieved by reinserting "reasonable grounds to believe" as a defence. Clause 5(3)(a) of the amendment does that by providing a defence that the defendant had no reasonable cause to believe that anyone was likely to be alarmed, harassed or distressed by his behaviour. Clause 5(3)(b) provides a similar defence for a defendant inside a dwelling.

Finally, amendment No. 13 deals with a consequential amendment to clause 5 flowing from the deletion of clause 8(5). We initially considered an amendment similar to that I described earlier to clause 4 which would have brought within the offence the distribution or display of any writing and so on. However, if clause 5 were recast to catch the distribution of written matter, letters would come within its scope. That would go potentially very wide if the offence extended to all insulting or abusive correspondence which was likely to alarm, harass or distress. It would cut across the work on poison pen letters currently being done by the Law Commission. For that reason we decided to restrict clause 5 to the display of any writing, sign and so on.

Amendments Nos. 15, 16, 17 and 19 are minor and consequential amendments to the amendment I have been discussing. The amendment moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) draws attention to a very distressing position which he amplified in the examples he gave. It is his intention that we should add a new sub-paragraph to clause 5(1) which specifically penalises the causing of noise which is likely to harass, alarm or distress another person. I must tell my hon. Friend that we cannot accept his amendment as it stands because we have now deleted from the offence the phrase "reasonable cause to believe". However, I hope that I might persuade him that at least some of the examples that he has cited would be covered by the offence that we have revised. In introducing a requirement of a victim we deliberately provided that it should be someone within hearing or sight of the defendant so that noise alone is not excluded from disorderly conduct. Blowing whistles, banging dustbin lids and shouting obscenities would all come within the scope of the offence, as would some of the examples given by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North as they are examples of disorderly behaviour. Using insulting or abusive words likely to cause alarm, harassment or distress will also come within the scope of the offence.

Disorderly conduct may well be appropriate to prosecute people who use noise to harass others, but it would still have to be proved to the satisfaction of the court that that was the intention of the use of the noise, or that the person was simply paying no heed to the consequences of using excessive noise in the street. Where there is persistent noise nuisance a special procedure under the Control of Pollution Act 1974 may well be appropriate and may well be a more appropriate channel to follow.

My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North drew particular attention to the problem caused by long and noisy parties which remain a persistent nuisance and cause distress and harassment to other residents in the area. Section 58 of the Control of Pollution Act 1974 enables an officer of the local authority to serve a notice on the person causing the noise. My hon. Friend is well aware of the responsibilities which lie in those areas. If the recipient fails to comply with the notice, criminal proceedings may be instituted, although I accept that that does not bring swift satisfaction.

My hon. Friend must realise that if the new powers are not sufficient we must look again at the position to ensure that we have available the primary powers to deal with the nuisance caused by constant music noise. That power will be found within the Control of Pollution Act; music noise is not, of itself, disorderly conduct.

Of course, this is the first time that we have discussed this issue in the Bill. I therefore tell my hon. Friend that I am persuaded from what he has said that we should take more time to examine the problem and perhaps to enter into discussions with the police about it so that we do not take precipitate action. If my hon. Friend can supply me with further examples of the kind of problems he has addressed in his remarks and if there are gaps in the law, we shall see what we can do to fill them.

However, the extension of clause 5 in the way proposed by my hon. Friend's amendment will not help to ease the distress felt by neighbours as a result of noisy parties. I shall want to examine that point further and, as the Bill proceeds, we may wish to come back to that matter. I would be grateful to have the assistance of further examples from my hon. Friend or from my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg), and I shall enter into discussions with the police on those issues.

In the light of those assurances, I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds will withdraw his clause and allow us to examine the procedure further.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): Amendment No. 13 is a major improvement. We welcome the steps which the Government have taken to change the clause in the course of redrafting. However, we still have a number of doubts.

My right hon. and hon. Friends know only too well from everyday experience the difficulties which face many people, particularly in inner city areas, as a result of people who gather in some numbers and cause harassment, alarm or distress. On some of the council estates in my constituency youngsters gather at the bottom of staircases, around blocks or in dark corners and make a considerable amount of noise, frequently late into the evening. Many people, particularly single elderly people living on their own, go in some considerable fear of the activities of such people.

The answer to that problem lies in good sensible practical policing. Again, there are examples to be found in my constituency of tenants sitting down with council officers, counsellors and the local police to work out a programme of action to improve the physical fabric of such estates in order to reduce the opportunities for such gatherings and to discuss with the police how to patrol and deal with such action. In the cases where that solution has been tried it has worked and there has been much improvement.

The major practical response to such problems and difficulties, which all of us recognise exist, certainly all of us who represent inner city areas, must lie in improvements to the fabric of our neighbourhoods and estates and in good sensible patrolling by police officers on the beat who know their local patch and the local people.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: The hon. Gentleman is describing a situation that we all know. Does he agree that, in addition to what he has said, it would also be helpful to allow the police on to the estates, where they can be of direct assistance to the people living there?

Mr. Smith: I would certainly agree that beat policing by police officers on council estates, and indeed in council blocks, is to be welcomed. In my area the local authority has issued a standing invitation to the police to do so. I particularly welcome close and careful discussion between tenants, the council which owns the property and the police to ensure that concerted action is taken to deal with such problems.

We still have some disquiet about amendment No. 13 and the new offence of disorderly conduct which the Government have brought forward in response to the acknowledged difficulty. First and foremost, we welcome the fact that the Government wish to include the presence of a potential victim. I stress the word "potential" because the amendment does not make the presence of a victim a necessity. Opposition Members would have preferred to see an actual victim and actual distress and harm having been caused for an offence to be committed. Indeed, we would have welcomed the suggestion made by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) about the kind of evidence that might well be permissible in order to prove that actual harm, distress or alarm was caused.

5.15 pm

Let me give one obvious example. If, on a council estate, an elderly tenant went in fear because of a gathering of youngsters and fear was caused, but the elderly tenant was reluctant, for understandable reasons, to give evidence in court, it should surely be possible, for example, for the tenants association on that estate to give evidence on that person's behalf. That would be a sensible way to approach the matter. However, the Government have come up with the formula of the presence of a person having to be demonstrated, but that the distress, alarm or harassment must simply be likely to be caused, rather than actually caused. We are worried about that, because it leaves us with a hypothetical action being the subject of an offence, rather than an actual action being the subject of an offence.

Secondly, we are worried that the Government have not seen fit to include, as they would have done if they had followed the advice of their own White Paper, the word "substantial" as a clarifying definition in the nature of the offence of causing harassment, alarm or distress. It would have brought back a distinction between inconvenience being caused and fear being generated, which is the nub of the problem in attempting to define an offence of this kind. We should have preferred to see the word "substantial".

Thirdly, we are worried that the burden of proof appears to have been changed in the amendment—the change which the Minister described — from the prosecution having to prove that someone had reasonable cause to believe that the use of the words or behaviour was likely to harass, alarm or distress, to the defendant having to prove that he had no reason so to believe. That changes the burden of proof from the prosecution to the defence, and we are worried about the impact of that.

Those are our three major concerns about the clause as it would stand if the amendment were accepted. We are even more deeply worried about amendment (a) to the proposed amendment No. 13. We would not wish to see this amendment accepted, and we warn the Minister against too ready an ear being given by him to his Back Benchers. We are especially worried about the difficulty of definition. All of us who represent inner city areas, where people live close together, accept and acknowledge that there is a noise problem. However, we do not believe that inserting noise into the list of potential offences in the clause would present a solution to that problem.

Mr. Marlow: I understand what the hon. Gentleman says. Does he agree that action of some sort needs to be taken to reinforce the law with regard to the noise nuisance which he has been discussing?

Mr. Smith: If the hon. Gentleman will wait a moment, I shall answer his point. It is difficult to distinguish between the noise which is an inconvenience to others but which would not, in all reasonableness, be described as a criminal offence, and the noise which, because of its loudness, persistence and close proximity to others, should become subject to the criminal law. We are worried because, if the hon. Gentleman's amendment were accepted, it would be difficult for the courts to know where to draw the line.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the amendment might have a deterrent effect if it were put on the statute book? People might think twice before acting in such an inconsiderate manner.

Mr. Smith: I am always doubtful about legislating for reasons other than to create an offence. It is not sensible to legislate to give messages to the general public. However, action can be taken, and I would welcome any moves to make a civil proceeding on issues of noise easier for the public to undertake. At present, it is a daunting and difficult process for ordinary members of the public to undertake.

Mr. Marlow: If there is a robust group of young people who consistently make a lot of loud noise, and if there is an elderly, relatively defenceless citizen in proximity who is persistently and consistently abused by this noise, how can the hon. Gentleman suggest that it would be possible to take a civil remedy? How could that person, with all the potential intimidation that would be present, pursue a civil case through the courts——

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: And the expense.

Mr. Marlow: —let alone the expense.

Mr. Smith: Many suggestions could be made, including making it much easier to use the local authority environmental health service to assist in such action. The Opposition would prefer such a procedure to be examined, rather than the Government seeking to put a sweeping power on to the statute book which could be open to wide misinterpretation.

The Opposition would also say — this is a crucial matter — that it is much better to endeavour to prevent such distress, alarm and noise from taking place than to attempt to create offences after the event. We must enable local authorities to improve the standards of their estates and neighbourhoods. We should pursue that route vigorously.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: The hon. Gentleman has tried to find a way through a difficult problem. Does he accept that the majority of environmental health authorities are open only during normal working hours and that much of the trouble occurs outside those hours? Does he also accept that much of the noise nuisance occurs in purpose-built blocks of council flats which have not been affected by a lack of money for maintenance? Even if they were superbly improved as the hon. Gentleman wishes, doors and windows would unfortunately still be left open and the noise would pour out. Does he accept that changing the civil law to make it easier and quicker to obtain redress will not help those whom he and I wish to help?

Mr. Smith: I did not wish to turn this into a party political debate, but it grieves me to hear a Member who supports a Government who have withdrawn rate support grant from local authorities and rate capped authorities in inner cities say that environmental health offices are not open for long enough, and that environmental health officers are not available in sufficient numbers or at the right times to assist tenants in such circumstances.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: They never have been.

Mr. Smith: It also grieves me to hear from a Member who supports a Government who have cut housing investment allocations to local authorities by two thirds during the past seven years that there are problems in the standards of construction and maintenance on council estates.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: The hon. Gentleman is straying from the Bill.

Mr. Smith: I am not straying from the Bill. I am identifying a major problem in the prevention of crime, and the distress, alarm and harassment caused to individuals who live in inadequate accommodation.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: We are talking about windows being open.

Mr. Smith: That is a major problem, and cuts in resources available to local authorities are a major cause of that problem.

We are considerably worried about some aspects of the Government's amendment. We are especially worried about the absence of a victim, and the fact that the victim need only be a potential or likely victim. Some aspects of the offence are similar to the sus law, which is bad for those who must be protected from such behaviour and bad for the police.

Although the Opposition have that major reservation, we shall not divide the House on the amendment, because major advances have been made on the original clause in the Bill that we debated on Second Reading. We are worried that the delicate balance between protecting the peace and quiet of individual citizens and protecting the civil liberties of other citizens, which the Bill is all about, has not yet been struck by the Government. Despite our worries, we welcome the improvements which were won in Committee and which the Government have introduced in the amendment.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): I welcome the Government's attempt to meet what was undoubtedly the most serious matter debated in Committee on clause 5 and its ambit. The Minister will agree that no issue exercised more hon. Members from different parties. It was recognised that the Government's Bill was quite out of line with their own White Paper and that the new offence which was being created would not require the presence of a victim or that the victim should have suffered serious harassment, alarm or distress. The Government have made an important amendment, broadly in line with what the Minister promised in Committee. He has, therefore, made a measurable improvement to the Bill.

I still have doubts as to whether the Minister has wholly squared the circle, as I think he put it in Committee, in that I suppose it will still be necessary to demonstrate by evidence that there was such a victim. That will place upon the police some requirement to prove that there was somebody there and that the somebody was not just a figment of an overheated imagination. So the presence of the victim in court may on occasion be a necessary part of the process of obtaining a conviction under the clause as amended. I am bound to say that I do not think that it is necessarily a bad thing. There will be many cases where evidence of this kind which obtains convictions will act as a strong deterrent to behaviour of the kind that the clause is designed to catch.

5.30 pm

Sir Eldon Griffiths: The hon. Gentleman has a very good point. I am sure that he will accept that where the police can find a suitable person to come forward, a robust person who is not likely to be intimated by others, they will wish to produce such a person to the court. The point that we are really getting at here is that some people are fearful of the consequences of giving evidence. That is the heart of the matter.

Mr. Maclennan: That is right. That is why the Minister was sensitive to the need to try to avoid a situation in which a conviction could not be obtained without the evidence of the victim. The Minister has made an appreciable move. I welcome it, and I do not propose to seek to divide the House on the amendment.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Having had experience of a peace convoy and its activities in and around my constituency in Stafford, where a considerable amount of alarm was caused to the local community and to individuals, I strongly welcome this amendment, which has been given careful consideration by the Government. I am sure that the chief constable of Staffordshire, who has helped to work out proposals which would enable these measures to go through, will be equally pleased, as will my constituents.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: It falls to me now to propose whether new clause 1 be pressed. Perhaps I can comment very briefly on what my hon. Friend has had to say.

I cannot see that the Government's amendments are vastly better than new clause 1, but I accept, of course, that, with the benefit of parliamentary counsel, which was not available to the Police Federation when I drafted new clause 1, the Minister is likely to be better advised.

I was for my sins chairman of the Noise Council while Minister at the Department of the Environment, a task that I think my hon. Friend took on himself somewhat later. I also drafted, or was the Minister responsible for drafting, much of the Control of Pollution Act 1974, carried through by the successor Government when we lost office. I am conscious of the limitations that it imposes on those who wish to bring actions for noise nuisance. I subsequently became president of the Association of Environmental Health Inspectors and discussed with its members on many occasions their difficulty in enforcing that law. My hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg) was quite right in saying that it is sometimes very difficult to find an environmental health inspector on a Saturday evening when much of the nuisance occurs.

There is a problem here, and my hon. Friend the Minister genuinely accepted it. I understood the reservation expressed from the Opposition Front Bench about it. I would have thought, however, that at least in some cases the phrase "disorderly behaviour within the hearing"—the words in this clause—would catch at least some of the worst forms of musical noise that are persistently directed at people and cause distress.

I hope that my hon. Friend will look into the matter seriously. I think that I can say that the police service will be anxious to co-operate with him, because one is conscious of the fact that there is unlikely to be legislation of this scope again for some years. We might as well deal with it now as wait for what could be a decade or more to have another vehicle as apt as this one to tackle the problem. So I hope that my hon. Friend will press on seriously with his consultations with the police to see if he can produce a solution before the Bill goes to another place.

Mr. Hayes: Will my hon. Friend agree that the very last thing that the police—or, for that matter, the public—want is for the police to be embroiled in neighbours' disputes and that this is to be avoided at all costs?

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I was going to say that at the end of my remarks but my hon. Friend allows me to say it now. The police dislike being dragged into arguments about whether music is noise or music. Some may think that Beethoven is noise; others may think that bop is noise. There is a problem here, and definition is a tricky matter. However, it may be possible for the Minister to come up with some solution before the Bill concludes its processes through the House.

I have one technical point to make to my hon. Friend in respect of Government amendment No. 12. He sought to deal with my intervention and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Mrs. Kellett-Bowman). May I try again to explain what is bothering us? If I were to put up in my back window a most offensive notice which was provocative to my immediate neighbour looking through his back window, that could certainly qualify as behaviour which was caught by this clause.

The note that my hon. Friend very courteously passed to my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster and me contained the advice that all the affronted person had to do was to step outside his house. Then, if he could see the notice displayed in his neighbour's window, the offence would have been created. Alas, with back-to-back houses, particularly when one is ten storeys up, if I were to step outside my house in such a fashion as to be able to see that offensive notice, I would immediately fall a considerable distance and break my neck in the process. The only way that I can step outside is through my front door, and from my front door, by definition, I cannot see what is visible through my back window.

This is a simple practical problem. I know that my hon. Friend, in his diligent manner, will address it, and I look forward to his taking care of it in another place.

The Government have the balance right between not reintroducing sus and avoiding the practical problems of the police being unable in all circumstances to provide a victim who is willing to come to court. It is because I think that the Government have the balance right that I beg to ask leave to withdraw the new clause in favour of the amendment of the Government.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Marlow: May I say a few words on my amendment, Mr. Deputy Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: No. We will come to the hon. Member's amendment in due course. We have already discussed it.

New Clause 3

ABUSE OF UNION FLAGS

'Any person who uses the union flag in any procession or demonstration the purpose of which is to stir up hatred against a racial group in Great Britain or at which such hatred is likely to be stirred up shall be guilty of an offence.'. — [Mr. Lawrence.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 28, in clause 12, in page 8, line 4, at end insert 'or if its intention is to incite racial hatred'.

Mr. Lawrence: The name of the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) ought also to appear as supporting new clause 3, but by a printing error his name appears on the marshalled list as supporting amendment No. 1.

One of the most pernicious and objectionable kinds of public disorder that is too often perpetrated today is public disorder connected with racial hatred. This is particularly objectionable, because in our multiracial society an increasing number of people who come from races not indigenous to the United Kingdom are easly offended, hurt and distressed by manifestations of this kind. It is to deal with that matter that part III of the Bill has been particularly and importantly created. It deals with a whole range of despicable offences that cause racial hatred.

One of the most sickening and offensive manifestations of racial hatred is when the National Front and its satellite organisations march through the streets carrying the Union flag, as though the people of Great Britain approve of that kind of racialism, or any racialism, as though the people who gallantly fought under the Union flag in the second world war against fascism have relented of their activity and now favour what some of them laid down their lives to oppose.

It is difficult to think of a more insulting abuse of decent society than to have racially hateful processions being swathed in the honour and dignity of the Union flag. In order to avoid the kind of distress that is caused not only to racial minorities but to every decent citizen in this country, it is necessary to take more action than is available under part III of the Bill. Unfortunately, we do not seem now to respect the flag, or to encourage respect for it, as we ought to do. Those of us who have the privilege from time to time of going to the United States cannot help but notice that every office of state and that every office of public administration has, by the desk, the United States flag. Hardly any activity of a public kind in the United States takes place without some reference to, or some prayer directed to, their union flag.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: They do not have a queen.

Mr. Lawrence: My hon. Friend points out that they do not have a queen, but makes the fact that we do not have such respect even worse because, in a sense, the Union flag is an embodiment of the monarchy and a manifestation of the monarchy, for which we in this country have so much respect.

As long as there is no special provision to deal with abuse of the flag, such abuse will continue. So will the dissatisfaction and distress of decent British citizens and racial minorities whom we in this place have to protect. As long as no offence arises from such abuse, distress will needlessly be caused. My amendment will remedy that defect in our law. It will encourage respect for the Union flag. It will restore some degree of decency to political demonstrations, which we must, of course, tolerate and perhaps encourage in this country, but which often get out of hand.

Manifestations of public disorder are dealt with elsewhere in the Bill. A provision that specifically makes it an offence to abuse the Union flag will have the additional virtue of weakening the public persona of that most repulsive of all political groups, the National Front, and its satellite organisations.

5.45 pm

As for amendment No. 28, under the Bill, conditions on public processions can be imposed by a senior police officer in certain circumstances. He can do so if he reasonably believes, first, that a procession may result in serious public disorder; secondly, if it may result in serious damage to property; thirdly, if it will cause serious disruption to the life of the community; and, fourthly, where the purpose of the organisers is the intimidation of others. That is all very praiseworthy and welcome, and I sure that all right hon. and hon. Members will support provisions that deal with matters of that kind, but my complaint is that the line has been unnecessarily drawn at that point.

Where the purpose of the organisers is the intimidation of others, it is most sensible that a limitation should be placed upon processions, in certain circumstances, by senior police officers but, alas, that restriction is limited to two kinds: intimidation that compels somebody not to do something that he has a right to do, such as going to work, and intimidation that compels others to do something that they have a right not to do, such as not to go to work. However, the amendment does not deal with intimidation for the purposes of inciting racial hatred, which is a particularly unpleasant form of intimidation. Why is it not dealt with? Racial hatred is dealt with in part III of the Bill. Racially insulting matter may not be published or distributed, or possessed with a view to publication, and words or gestures that are racially hurtful may not be used in a public place. However, one cannot stop a procession or impose conditions upon a procession whose purpose is to incite racial hatred. That is quite an important and glaring hole in the Bill.

Mr. Derek Spencer (Leicester, South): Is my hon. and learned Friend aware that on two occasions during the 1970s under the existing law conditions were attached to marches of the National Front through the Highfields area, an area where many Asian people live? Under the existing law, therefore, there is a measure of control that will be extended by the Bill. Does my hon. and learned Friend think that that is sufficient, or would he go even further?

Mr. Lawrence: I am pleased to hear from my hon. and learned Friend that from time to time such a limitation is indeed imposed. Clause 12 either consolidates and clarifies the existing law, which is one of the purposes of the Bill, or it adds something to the existing law. It contains no mention of the very power to which my hon. and learned Friend has referred. If there is no mention in this consolidating, explanatory and extending measure of a power that already exists, it might be taken that that power no longer exists. That seems to me to present some kind of danger.

Irrespective of whether my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer) is right, the fact remains that clause 12 gives senior police officers powers to impose conditions on public processions when there is intimidation. However, it makes no sense to restrict the kind of intimidation which can be limited, or to exclude an especially repulsive form of intimidation —intimidation which is intended to incite racial hatred. Therefore, for clarification and simplication, if not for the extension of the existing law, all senior police officers in any threatened part of the country should have clearly in mind what the law is. The law should be extended so that all of the examples referred to by my hon. and learned Friend will apply generally throughout the country and not just within the police authority to which he referred.

It appears eminently sensible to extend clause 12(1)(b) to read:

"the purpose of the persons organising it is the intimidation of others with a view to compelling them not to do an act they have a right to do, or to do an act they have a right not to do or if its intention is to incite racial hatred."

For that sensible reason, I hope that I have the support of all hon. Members.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): First, may I draw attention to the misprint on the Amendment Paper. I had intended that my name should appear under that of the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) and not under that of "Mr. Secretary Hurd" as he is described in the amendment underneath. That is entirely due to a printing error.

Happily, there are occasions when hon. Members, who disagree profoundly on many issues, come together in an attempt to preserve and extend those basic decencies which lie at the root of democracy and which allow us to disagree as freely as we do without violence and usually without ill will. I am pleased to support the efforts of the hon. and learned Gentleman both in connection with new clause 3 and amendment No. 28.

New clause 3 deals with the Union flag. It is an obscenity that those who would stir up racial hatred and ill-will, who are basically devoted to the philosophy of Hitler and Mussolini, who regard fascism as their creed and "Mein Kampf" as their bible, should wrap themselves up in the Union flag as the symbol of their despicable organisations.

The campaign of fascists and Nazis—whether they call themselves the National Front or the National party —is aimed against blacks, Asians, Jews or any other minority. It is wrong that, in our law, they can freely use the Union flag, the symbol of our democracy and our decency, to precede them in their parades.

Some of us remember the Mosley marches in Ridley road. Some of us emerged from the armed forces to find that the philosophy which we had been rallied to fight against was using the Union flag as its banner. I served as a war crimes investigator in Germany and came back to find fascists using the Union flag in their parades. It is undoubtedly a source of great unhappiness to those who are proud of our democracy and to whom the flag is a symbol to defend.

I hope that new clause 3 will be accepted. It does not represent a new effort by the hon. and learned Gentleman or me. I have before me a copy of Hansard for 3 February 1982. Similar discussions took place then, but unfortunately the Government declined to accept the amendment. There was no vote on it and it faded into the mists of the past as one of those worthy motions which did not receive the assent of the House. I hope that will not happen again.

Amendment No. 28 is allied to new clause 3 and it is a happy decision to take them together. The amendment is specifically aimed at making clear beyond doubt, manifest beyond peradventure, that those who march with the intention of inciting racial hatred will be in breach of the law and should be dealt with by the authorities. Unfortunately, the freedom which we cherish and which we do not like to impede in any way is used too often by those who would destroy it and attack the decent and happy lives of our citizens. We are concerned only with the prevention of the abuse of freedom. It is a poignant, vicious and too common evil to use the freedom in our decent democracy deliberately to stir up racial hatred. That is the intention of marches and demonstrations in areas where black people live or, as in Leicester, where Asian people live.

I remember a march one Saint George's day during a general election campaign. The candidates of all of the decent parties—which means all parties other than the National Front and the National party — went to the chief constable and asked him to place a restriction on a march which would clearly cause ill-will, unrest and no small danger to the police whose unhappy job it was to try to preserve the peace of a city in the face of deliberate disruption.

When the chief constable decided to allow the march to continue, I concluded that the law was too weak and that it was wrong to leave such a decision in the hands of the chief constable. There was, inevitably, a battle and the police were in the centre. A vast number of police were doing their best to preserve the safety of our citizens at great cost and risk to themselves and at great cost and risk to ratepayers. A breach of the peace, which should never have been permitted, occurred.

The hon. and learned Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer) said that it is possible to place restrictions or bans on such demonstrations under the existing law. I agree with the hon. and learned Member for Burton that the law is not clear enough and that the guidance given to chief constables is not manifest. It would be wrong to amend the existing law without specifically including the intention to incite racial hatred.

I hope that that proposition will unite the House and that the discussions which are going on on the Government Front Bench are intended to ensure that the Government agree to the amendment so that there is no need to rally the troops and press it to a Division. I anticipate that all of the Opposition parties who sit on this side of the House will agree to the amendment. I know that the Government willingly adhere to the principle and hope that they will accept the amendment.

In advance of the attacks, which I know will be made on those of us who support the new clause and the amendment, by the National Front and other fascist and Nazi organisations, may I say that there is no desire to restrict the decent expression of free speech. There are, however, certain restrictions in any society. We are not allowed to engage in defamation, libel or slander. We are not allowed to speak treason or to incite violence. There are limits on our freedoms so that we may live together in decency and dignity.

At present, the restrictions are not great enough when applied to those who would remove the freedom of others to live in equality, irrespective of their race, creed or ethnic origin. We are here concerned only to restrict the freedom of fascist and Nazi organisations and racist bodies to stir up hatred in demonstration, march and by use of the Union flag. I strongly hope that the Government will accept the new clause and the amendment.

Mr. Spencer: I hope that the Government will be able to consider amendment No. 28 further. The lesson to be learnt from a study of public order in the past few years is that what is tolerable at one time is utterly intolerable a few years later and justifies the intervention of the criminal law. Recognition of that fact has led to the Bill, and the extension of police powers to attach conditions to marches which were not to be found in the Public Order Act 1936.

We must ask whether the Bill goes far enough. The Select Committee said that an amendment such as amendment No. 28 had two faults—first, that it was impracticable because it introduced a test which did not raise a justifiable issue and, secondly, that it would lead to the prohibition of marches by certain political groups. Those objections seemed valid to the Select Committee at the time, but I should like to consider them in turn.

Does anybody think that the test would be impracticable? Does anybody think that a National Front march through the Highfields area should not attract the intervention of the criminal law? What is so fine and nice about the application of the test in Highfields and countless other areas in large cities? I do not regard it as a matter of nicety—I regard it as being as plain as a pikestaff.

Mr. Lawrence: My hon. and learned Friend's argument is extremely valid and is surely answered in clause 17 and, no doubt, others. In clause 17, precisely the type of judgment which was previously objected to is required. It requires somebody to decide whether the publishing and distribution of written matter is intended to cause or provoke racial hatred. There seems therefore to have been a shift in the approach to practicability since the Select Committee reported, and I am grateful to the Government for it.

Mr. Spencer: My hon. and learned Friend is quite right. The existing law requires that there is a reasonable belief that serious public disorder will ensue. Acting under that provision, the police in Leicester have twice attached conditions to marches. That shows how closely linked are the concept of causing serious public disorder and the intention to cause racial hatred. In practice, it is almost impossible to isolate the two. We must now recognise that the law should be specific.

The Select Committee's argument that an amendment such as is proposed might prohibit marches by certain political groups is invalid. It said that the amendment would automatically prohibit certain political parties from processing publicly because of their notoriety and because their views constitute an insult and a provocation to various communities. It is quite right—their views do constitute an insult and a provocation, and their very presence inspires such feelings. If marches have that effect, the matter must require further consideration. I invite the Government to say that, upon better reflection, the reasons which seemed good to the Select Committee have at best worn thin and at worst should be rejected.

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): The anomaly of my speaking as a representative of Northern Ireland on a Bill which does not apply to the north of Ireland is that, if ever there were two amendments or new clauses which should apply to Northern Ireland, these are them.

The hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) spoke emotively and effectively of the Mosley marches in Ridley road. I ask him to remember that I have such experiences nightly as, where I live, there are people who engage in fascist activities each night. From 1 to 26 April, 79 people who happened by birth to be Catholic by religion were burnt out of their homes simply because they were Catholic. Over the same period 50 policemen were burned out of their homes by those same people because they earned their living as policemen.

That, in any man's language, is fascism. It is fascism equal to that referred to in the Mosley marches. We could coin a phrase in relation to the type of fascism we see in the north of Ireland, to which this legislation does not apply. We could see a new type of fascism emerging which could best be described by saying that it is accompanied by a bible in one hand and a petrol bomb in the other.

Mr. Reg Freeson (Brent, East): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the links are even closer than that? There is evidence of links between the National Front and associated groups in this country and certain extremist Protestant groups in Northern Ireland. In some instances those links lead to suspected gun and ammunition running from this country to Northern Ireland to assist extremist groups such as those to which the hon. Gentleman refers.

Mr. Mallon: I thank the hon. Gentleman for reminding me of that. I can confirm his point.

Court records, show that members of the National Front have appeared before the courts in Northern Ireland charged with this type of fascist activity, centring on threatening people in their own homes, backed up in a cowardly fashion by petrol bombs. They are also accused of attacks upon the families of police officers in their own homes. The irony and ambiguity are there. This legislation is very much needed within Northern Ireland, yet it does not apply there. Indeed, as someone who wishes to see the peaceful reunification of the Irish nation I would be tempted to ask for a definition of "Great Britain" in this new clause. If ever an amendment were needed in the part of Ireland where I live, it is this.

It is sad and tragic when, from the hour one is born, and as one grows up, one sees the flag that most hon. Members and I would look upon with respect—the Union flag—hoisted on broomsticks and used as a means of incitement and intimidation against another section of the community for seven months of the year.

There is a mirror image of fascism in Northern Ireland. On one side we have that which avows its loyalty to this Parliament, this Government and the British Crown. They used to call themselves Unionists. I do not know what they will call themselves in the future. Every time they hoist the Union flag on a broomstick and use it as a means of incitement within my community they are behaving in a fascist way and in a way which should come under the influence of this new clause. That is also reflected by another section of the community. As someone who honestly wishes to see the reunification of Ireland, when I see the Irish flag used to insult those who are Unionist and Protestant, my blood boils. That is the type of racial incitement covered by this new clause. That is the type of fascist problem we are dealing with in Northern Ireland.

It is an anomaly that I, as a Northern Ireland representative, am debating something which does not apply to Northern Ireland, where it is most needed. On the Benches behind me we should have those who represent the Unionists, but they dare not come here even to hear the debate.

On amendment No. 28, anyone who has been following the problems in Northern Ireland would realise that the prohibition of marches is very relevant. For the next three or four months, until the end of October, Ministers who represent the Government in Northern Ireland, I as a Northern Ireland representative, and every person living in Northern Ireland face 2,000 more marches. One hundred and eighty six of those marches are controversial. We have seen what has happened in two of them. Is it not time that we started to look at the problem in Northern Ireland and at the way in which the marching season is allowed to dominate not just the lives of the ordinary people but the whole political process. One could almost say that for seven months of the year politics goes into abeyance while everyone — Unionist, Nationalist or whatever creed — is allowed to trail his coat up and down the streets of Northern Ireland causing inconvenience to everyone, enormous expense to the taxpayer and great danger to everybody who lives in those areas and to the people who have to police them.

It would be remiss of me if I allowed the debate to continue without reminding the House of the anomaly that new clause 3, amendment No. 28 and the Bill do not apply to Northern Ireland. The things I have mentioned are happening in Northern Ireland. The term "Great Britain" is used in an anomalous way in new clause 3. Is it not time that we looked at that type of developing and rampant fascism? There is no means of dealing with it. Those marches continue year after year, costing millions of pounds of taxpayers' money, yet we bring down the blinkers. The usual type of myopia creeps in and we put it to one side by saying, "It is only Northern Ireland." The right hon. Lady the Prime Minister once reminded people under questioning that the north of Ireland was as British as Finchley. God help Finchley.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I wish that the Bill applied to Northern Ireland, but it does not. This morning in a police station in Northern Ireland, which shall be nameless, I saw what was left of the possessions of three young policewomen who had been subjected to petrol bombing. Those possessions were gathered in half a dozen black plastic bags. There were photographs of their loved ones, a charred badminton racket, a couple of pairs of gym shoes and all the artefacts of the life of those young women, as they had been living peacefully in their flat doing their duty as police officers. Of course, those who threw the petrol bomb which intimidated those women out of their homes were the same people who carry the Union flag. The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) is right to make his protest against that.

I am glad that the leaders of the other Northern Ireland parties, who unhappily are not here, have very responsibly denounced the attacks on the homes of the police. I am pleased to say that there is some evidence that those attacks are diminishing.

I understand very well what the hon. Gentleman has said about the marches still to come. However, he illustrated the problem of the amendment. No one could claim that the use of the Union flag in Northern Ireland, in the distressing circumstances I have just described, is strictly directed to the incitement of racial hatred. It may be religious or political, but I doubt whether it is strictly racial and that is the purport of the new clause and the amendment.

The hon. Gentleman illustrated another problem. He knows, as well as I do, that occasionally the tricolour of the Irish Republic is used—I will not say in an equally repugnant fashion, but in a manner which certainly incites other people in Northern Ireland. I have had the distressing personal experience of knowing that one man, carried to his funeral in a coffin which bore the flag of southern Ireland—although within our own country—accompanied by hooded men who were members of Sinn Fein or worse, carrying weapons and firing them into the air, said that his aim in life was "killing Protestants". The flag of the Irish Republic was used in just as obnoxious a fashion as the Union flag is used.

That is the technical problem that I face. If the new clause were passed, it would have all my sympathetic support, but I am not sure whether we would be right to say that only one flag should be banned from use in a demonstration. All flags, whatever they are—American or German flags, swastikas, fascist or Communist flags —if they are used to incite the hatred and harassment that we seek to deal with, are the artefacts of violence, irrespective of whether they are the Union flag or any other.

Therefore, the House must be careful before it imputes an intention to the flag itself. The intention lies in the hearts and minds of the people, not in the piece of cloth. Although I understand—I am sure that the House will, too — and largely support the intentions of the new clause, technically there are many problems in passing it as it stands.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): It is helpful to have the benefit of a speaker from the Social Democratic and Labour party in Northern Ireland. The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) always speaks powerfully. Those who remember his maiden speech will recall the eloquence and force with which he made his remarks, and he did so again today. We must be grateful to him for that.

I think—indeed, I hope—that everyone in the House will be sympathetic to the ideas and intentions behind the new clause and the amendment. I suspect that I can say with certainty that the Minister will be, too, because, to be fair to him, in Committee, particularly on part III of the Bill, on racial hatred, he was very good and showed his willingness to accept amendments from us and to insert some himself, which strengthened the offences that most of us are anxious to stamp out.

There is a problem of definition. For example, the Conservative party uses the Union flag at its conferences from time to time. Although a conference is not a demonstration, if a person used a Union flag outside and made comments that were seen as racialist, that party or organisation would be in trouble. I take the view that no political party should ever use the flag of the country because, in doing so, it tries to take unto that party the national identity of the country. I do not believe that one can legitimately do so. I can see that there is a problem of definition, but I ask the Minister to take away and look at the two amendments to see whether they can be incorporated in the Bill. There is a powerful argument for the wording and intentions behind them.

I remember, as many of us will, how, in the 1950s and 1960s, many black people from the Caribbean used to put, with pride, the Union flag on their cars, carry the Union flag, and speak highly of it. It was only after the flag was taken over by various racialist organisations and used to flaunt in their face in an offensive manner that that practice began to fade out among the ethnic minority groups, especially black people from the Caribbean.

As I suspect the Minister will tell us, some aspects of the problem are already covered by part III. Clause 19 says:

"A person who uses in a public place or at a public meeting words or gestures which are threatening, abusive or insulting is guilty of an offence if he intends hatred against a racial group in Great Britain".

If a person carrying a flag was doing other things, in words or gestures, which showed racial hatred, one could argue that the two points that the amendments seek to deal with are already dealt with in that clause.

Amendment No. 28, in the name of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner), changes the position inasmuch as it applies to processions. The Minister might like to tell us whether he thinks that the wording of clause 19 covers the circumstances referred to by my hon. and learned Friend and perhaps also by the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence).

I ask the Minister not to reject the amendments out of hand. They put powerful arguments, which we touched on in Committee. If the Minister argues that the matter is already covered by the Bill, he will have to demonstrate to the House that clause 19 does the job. If he says that that is not so, there is a strong argument for him to look at the amendments while the Bill is going through the House of Lords, and perhaps table amendments later if he feels that that is appropriate.

Mr. Cash: I share many of the sentiments expressed on both sides of the House about this provision. I await with interest what the Minister has to say on the subject.

As my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) said, there is no doubt that no flag should be used to incite racial hatred of any description. I would consider voting for the new clause in a Division if what the Minister said did not satisfy us and matched up to the sentiments that have been eloquently expressed on both sides of the House.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The debate initiated by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) has taken, for me at any rate, a substantial turn. The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) will recall that we debated such issues in Committee. We debated an amendment that was akin to amendment No. 28, grouped with new clause 3, moved by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton. We negatived the amendment after a fairly full discussion of the complexities involved in inviting the police service to seek to interpret the situation in which they become involved in making such a judgment.

I remind my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton that this is the nexus of the public order problem, where the police are seeking to take a view on a situation that could be fluid, and have to decide whether it would be wise to intervene for this or that reason to prevent greater mischief. This is an emotive and powerful issue. Hon. Members on both sides of the House have spoken with feeling. The hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner), my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton and the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) all did so. The contribution by the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh was relevant to the discussions that we are having, although the Bill does not apply to the Province that he so proudly represents. It is vital to hear a point of view that is as cogent as his.

In dealing with these matters, we are seeking, at the extremity, to avoid the major provocation, which, collectively, we all seek to prevent. In Committee, we tried to improve and tighten the conditions under which we are taking action on public order.

There is a significant difference between new clause 3 and amendment No. 28. New clause 3 requires that the Union flag should be a provocation. I hate to say "provocation", but that is the impression that is given. I suspect that that is a broader concept. On the other hand, amendment No. 28 appears to include major mischief that is the consequence of action being taken which could result in racial difficulties of one sort or another — intimidation, the creation of racial hatred and so on.

I must remind the House—this was touched on by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer)—that this issue was substantially discussed both in the Select Committee's report and in the Government's White Paper published last year. The report states:

"Assessment of the likelihood of a breakdown in public order remains a relatively technical matter upon which the chief officer of police may pronounce. The likelihood of a procession stirring up racial hatred or intolerance is a more difficult test to apply.

[Mr. Giles Shaw]

A measure which rested on the judgment that incitement or intolerance was likely to be caused would present insuperable problems of enforcement and could easily backfire by creating martyrs for free speech out of groups whose policies and activities, having been subjected without hindrance to the judgment of the electorate have been decisively rejected."

That is the type of problem to which the Select Committee drew our attention, and we reflected that concern in the preparation of the Bill.

6.30 pm

Likewise, in our White Paper on the review of public order law, paragraph 6.4 on the Union flag states:

"In the course of the review of public order law it has been suggested to the Government that the use of the Union Flag should in some way be restricted. This suggestion reflects concern at the use of the national flag by extremist right-wing groups. The Government considers this use of the flag deeply offensive, and believes that most people share this view. But it has proved impossible to devise a provision which defines satisfactorily those organisations or individuals who should be allowed to use the flag or those occasions on which its use would be permitted. Accordingly the Government has concluded that it is not practicable to try to legislate to control the use of the flag."

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton seeks primarily to deal with that particular provision through new clause 3. It is probably not as significant in terms of public order, of controlling racial incitement and racial difficulties as amendment No. 28.

The substantive mischief seems to be addressed by amendment No. 28. I recognise the concern felt on both sides of the House about marches where the intention is to intimidate others, especially ethnic minorities, and that, perhaps, in clause 12 our definition of "intimidation" may be unduly tied to the concept of coercion, as, indeed, it is. We talked a great deal about that in Committee. That limitation is perhaps something which we should be prepared to reconsider and, in particular, to discuss with the police.

I cannot be so welcoming to new clause 3 about the use of the Union flag. I suspect that an amendment penalising the use of the flag in a procession the purpose of which is to stir up racial hatred would probably already be subordinate to amendment No. 28. The real mischief is not the misuse of the flag, but marching to stir up hatred or deliberately to put whole communities in fear. I am sure that my hon. and learned Friend also considers that to be the problem.

I shall certainly reconsider the issue in relation to amendment No. 28, despite the fact that it was talked out in Committee where we felt that we had reached a consensus. I am minded to do so because of the range of expressions put to the House, and I would be grateful if my hon. Friend would agree to accept that advice in relation to his amendment.

Mr. Lawrence: To some extent I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister for his undertaking, which will be most welcome, but may I take the opportunity to say that this might not have happened had it not been for the enthusiastic support for the new clause and amendment which has been voiced by hon. Members on both sides of the House, especially those representing Leicester constituencies. I am grateful for that.

Perhaps I might be permitted to attempt to strengthen the Minister's elbow with the following observations when he tries to imbue those who are about to reconsider the matter with the good sense behind the inclusion of amendment No. 28. The objection raised by the Select Committee to such provisions because they might automatically prohibit political groups cannot possibly apply where we are merely giving a power to a senior police officer to consider whether it is appropriate to impose a condition on a march. That is not automatic prohibition of political marches or political parties. Therefore, that criticism falls.

The second criticism is that the measures are impracticable. Clearly that objection has now been superseded by the completely new approach which the Government have adopted, and which is welcome. In clause 17 they see no practical difficulty in creating an offence for:

"A person who publishes or distributes written matter which . . . intends hatred against a racial group in Great Britain".

There is no impracticability about that measure. If there had been, it would not have been included.

In clause 18 the Government see no impracticability in applying such a restriction to the possession of racially inflammatory matter where a person intends "hatred against a racial group in Great Britain to be stirred up as a result of the publication".

The same applies to clause 19, where "words or gestures" create an offence if a person

"intends hatred against a racial group in Great Britain to be stirred up".

It is nonsense for the Government to say that there is some impracticability about using the test in new clause 3 when they have said that there is no such impracticability about using it in those three provisions which relate directly to the same intention—to stir up racial hatred.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My hon. and learned Friend is stretching my credulity a bit far when he examines the judgments that can be arrived at in printed material on the one hand and a fluid public assembly on the other. The problem is the practicability of the fluidity of a situation.

Mr. Lawrence: It must be manifest to anyone with even the meanest of intelligence whether a publication is intended to stir up racial hatred, that a gesture or action is intended to stir up racial hatred, or that a march or procession is intended to stir up racial hatred. Those matters are not subtle. They do not require close attention with a magnifying glass or weighing up with scales. They are blatant, open perversions of what people consider to be ordinary decencies. To march past the Cenotaph on Remembrance Day with the Union flag, boasting about fascism and the National Front is a manifest perversion to which nobody should have the least difficulty in applying a practical test.

Mr. Cash: My hon. and learned Friend may care to draw the Minister's attention to the Flags and Emblems (Display) Act (Northern Ireland) 1954, which has been a source of considerable controversy. Does he recall that serious questions arise in relation to that Act, which may have implications in this context for the rest of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Lawrence: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for drawing the Minister's attention to that point. However, until I have studied it, I have nothing useful to add.

Mr. Soley: To assist the House, will the hon. and learned Gentleman ask the Minister to clarify his commitment? We understand that the Minister will reconsider the words in amendment No. 28 and will, at some stage, insert them into the Bill. On the other hand, the Minister may just be reconsidering the matter. At some point the House will surely want to insert those words into the Bill.

Mr. Lawrence: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that helpful intervention. Of course I assume that when my hon. Friend the Minister says that he is taking away an amendment to reconsider it, he intends to do something constructive and not just talk about it. It would be churlish to come to any other assumption. Certainly nothing that my hon. Friend the Minister has ever done would lead me to suppose that he intends to do nothing.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Perhaps I can respond to the invitation that has been conveyed to me by my hon. and learned Friend on behalf of the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley). I said that if my hon. and learned Friend was good enough to withdraw amendment No. 28 we would take it away and discuss it with the police in the context of the Bill, as drafted, to see whether the Bill is adequate. If it is not, we will introduce an amendment. There will be a discussion about the amendment in relation to the conditions contained in clause 12, and we shall have to see whether the latter are adequate to deal with the problem highlighted by the amendment.

Mr. Lawrence: The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) said that he thought there might be a problem of definition. There might be a problem if one accepts what my hon. Friend the Minister says about the difficulties of amendment No. 28, but of course I do not accept what he says. However, there can be no problem of definition with regard to new clause 3, because there is only one Union flag. I refer to the national flag, which is commonly, but wrongly, known as the Union Jack. Moreover, "Any person" means any person. If someone comes out of the Conservative party conference waving a flag in a despicable way, he should be as subject to the restrictions of the law as anyone else who does something grossly offensive with the Union flag. Whether the person involved is a Conservative does not matter; the same rule must apply. There is obviously no problem of definition, and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will not be unnecessarily deterred from considering the issue more fully.

Mr. Mallon: Is there not something slightly contradictory in restricting the terms of the amendment and the clause to racial hatred? For 65 years the same sort of hatred has been expressed in violence year after year in Northern Ireland. That hatred could not, strictly speaking, be defined as racial hatred. It could be defined as religious or political hatred, but the net result is the same. Such dangerous hatred results in great violence and bloodshed.

In Northern Ireland the concentration of violence and hatred that has gone on for 65 years has culminated in the past 17 years of extensive violence. Almost 3,000 people have died. That seems to be excluded from the Bill, and there is something contradictory about that. From Northern Ireland's point of view, it seems cynical to exclude all that on the ground that it does not come within the definition of racial hatred.

Mr. Lawrence: There may be something contradictory about it, but I have enough problems trying to get the Government to accept my limited and less all-pervasive proposal.

Mr. Janner: Perhaps I can ease one of the problems facing the hon. and learned Gentleman and the Minister. If amendment No. 28 is withdrawn on the basis that the Minister has implied, that he will positively reconsider it, and that reconsideration does not lead to the Government's acceptance of it, there is a distinct likelihood that a further effort will be made to reintroduce it in the other place. If the hon. and learned Gentleman saw fit not to press his amendment, we would not press it either.

Mr. Lawrence rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I remind the House that there is no question of amendment No. 28 being withdrawn. It has not been moved, but is being discussed with new clause 3.

6.45 pm

Mr. Lawrence: I had hoped that when my hon. Friend the Minister reconsidered amendment No. 28 he would not exclude the possibility of reconsidering new clause 3. I would feel happier about accepting his undertaking if he could give the tiniest sign that the abuse of the Union flag will also be reconsidered. I have no doubt that that issue will also arouse the concern of those in the other place. If that happens, it may well increase the amount of activity when the Bill returns to this House.

Mr. Mallon rose——

Mr. Lawrence: I shall not give way, as there are many other important matters to consider. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me.

The House has discussed this issue several times, and most recently on 3 February 1982, when it debated the Local Government (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill. On that occasion we were again told that the Government were sympathetic but that it would be premature to introduce such a measure into the Bill because a Public Order Bill would be presented to the House in due course. It was said that the matter was being considered in a much wider review and that instead of pre-empting any discussions on the point it would be better to leave it until later and not adopt a piecemeal approach towards improving the law. That time has now come. If that improvement is not made now, when will it be made, so that the ethnic minorities can be protected against such indecent activities? The excuses are getting a little thin. The objections raised hitherto seem to have even less foundation now.

I do not wish to be churlish, and I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister for his undertaking. However, if he could move just a little, almost imperceptibly, so that those of us who are very careful to discern movement can see some, and if he would agree to reconsider the Union flag issue, I should be most grateful. Its use is very hurtful and offensive to many people. On the basis of that most welcome undertaking, I shall not press the amendment or the new clause. Accordingly, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

RIOT

Mr. Giles Shaw: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 8, after 'threaten', insert 'unlawful'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 9, 10, 20 and 21.

Mr. Shaw: The amendments flow from undertakings we gave in Committee to look further at the definition of violence in clause 8. Two criticisms were made of the definition—first, that it was wrong to refer to "violence justified by law", which appears in clause 8(2) and, secondly, that the definition of violence in clause 8(3) was rather cumbersome. We have moved to discharge our obligation fully under the first head. Under the second head, despite my best endeavours to find a more elegant phraseology, we have not been able to satisfy the recommendation. I hope that the House will regard the changes that we have made as suitable.

Mr. Cash: I believe, as I have done for a long time, that, to deal with violence during a riot, we need a provision analogous to section 24 of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978, which deals with dispersal when requested by a member of the Royal Ulster Constabulary whose rank is not below that of chief inspector. However, in this context I state specifically that I would not expect the military to be involved, as they are in Northern Ireland. We face a potentially serious situation. Plastic bullets and so on may be used and innocent children may get caught up in a riot.

If a power of dispersal were made available which enabled people to take responsibility upon themselves to disperse—when a warning had been given, or when the police knew the framework within which they were operating when an incident appeared riotous—the public would have greater safeguards than they do at present. That power would provide an opportunity for a person to take a moment to reflect on the position and would provide a cooling-down period.

I hope that, when the Bill reaches another place, those matters will be taken on board. There are serious deficiencies in the law which will become apparent sooner or later, such as when an innocent person gets caught up in a riot but could have avoided it if a warning system were available, during the night or during the day, to allow him to get off the streets before the police moved in.

I received a lengthy letter from the Prime Minister on this point. I understand that some chief constables have reservations about it. The matter is by no means as clear-cut as has been thought. Some chief constables would favour such a provision and others would not. I should be grateful if the matter could be given further consideration as the Bill proceeds. I believe that the Riot Act 1714, which was repealed about 10 years ago, should have been replaced by a provision along the lines suggested.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): I thank the Minister of State, Home Office for fulfilling the undertakings he gave in Standing Committee.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 2, in page 1, line 11, after 'using', insert 'unlawful'.

No. 3, in page 2, line 2, after 'threaten' insert 'unlawful'.—[Mr. Giles Shaw.]

Mr. Alex Carlile: I beg to move amendment No. 4, in page 2, line 9, leave out 'life' and insert '7 years'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments:

No. 8, in clause 2, page 2, line 22, leave out '5' and insert '3'.

No. 11 in clause 3, page 3, line 4, leave out '3' and insert '2'.

Mr. Carlile: I did not have the advantage of serving on the Committee — a pleasure I missed with some disappointment—but I did follow its proceedings with awe, if not with total admiration. I know that the matters which I am about to raise were discussed then to some extent, so I propose to be brief.

The offence of riot provided for in clause 1 is subject to a maximum sentence of life imprisonment, or a fine, or both. When the Bill's proposals were first mooted by the Government, we were told that it was intended to provide a scale of offences dealing with public order—a scale of decreasing seriousness, starting with riot, moving on to violent disorder, which was the next offence down, affray, and so on. One can understand the good sense of introducing a scale of offences to deal with a problem, but one would expect, reasonably and logically, a corresponding scale of sentences to deal with those offences. One would expect that the maximum sentence for the most serious offence would be the highest, that the sentence for the second most serious offence would be lower but in proportion, and so on.

The Bill provides for a maximum sentence of imprisonment for life for the offence of riot. There is an enormous drop to imprisonment for five years for violent disorder and for three years for affray. The relationship between the maximum sentence for riot and the maximum sentence for violent disorder—offences which may arise on the same set of facts—is distant indeed.

I recognise that we have already, at least in part, an independent Crown prosecution service and that within a few months the whole of England and Wales will be covered by an independent prosecution service. Hopefully, we can count on the good sense of the Crown prosecution service not to prosecute people for riot when they have not done something terribly serious. On the other hand, despite the good work that was done in Committee and particularly the concessions which the Government have been prepared to make on the definition of "violence", in respect of the definition of riot one is left with the possibility — this was canvassed widely in Committee—of relatively trivial behaviour falling within the offence of riot. In my view—it is also the view of many others—it is important that maximum sentences are proportionate to the conduct which is described in the offence.

If a riot takes place, and if a group of people acting either separately or together commit serious offences of personal violence against others, they can be charged with substantive offences of violence. We are used to heavy sentences, indeed life sentences, being available for offences including murder, rape, robbery, arson with intent to endanger life, and causing grievous bodily harm with intent.

If people are to be subject to a maximum sentence of life imprisonment, they should be charged with a specific offence of personal violence which might justify a sentence of life imprisonment. Riot, as defined by the Bill, could not strictly be described as an inchoate offence, but it is an unspecific offence. I suspect that juries, being members of the public and knowing perhaps that the maximum sentence for riot is life imprisonment, would be extremely reluctant to convict people of such an unspecific offence as riot.

Will the Government consider whether it might be right to introduce a much lower maximum sentence than life imprisonment for the offence of riot? I believe that few judges would be tempted in any circumstances to pass a sentence of more than seven years imprisonment for an offence of riot. A seven-year sentence would be a proper maximum.

Mr. Spencer: Does the hon. and learned Gentleman have evidence that juries have been loth to convict at common law for the offences of affray, unlawful assembly and riot where the maximum sentence is life imprisonment?

Mr. Carlile: The three offences which the hon. and learned Gentleman mentioned are ancient common law offences. They were developed by the common law over the centuries to deal with the changing exigencies of life. Juries on the whole have little knowledge of maximum sentences, especially for offences the origins of which are found deep in history. This offence of riot has been very much in the public gaze in recent months—indeed, in the past couple of years. I believe that someone on the jury will be bound to know what the maximum sentence is.

The hon. and learned Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer) knows that sometimes a little knowledge can be very dangerous, especially with juries. I fear for the efficacy of this offence before juries if the maximum sentence of life is retained.

Surely seven years is a perfectly proper and realistic maximum for this type of offence. If we are to have realistic maxima as a general principle, let us start with new offences which we lay down in Parliament. If in so doing we reduce the maximum sentence for riot from life to the right level of seven years, we still will not have the right sort of scale if we leave five years as the maximum for violent disorder and three years as the maximum for affray. A much more realistic scale which would meet the requirements of sentencing and what the judge has to do in court would be provided if the maximum sentence were three years for violent disorder and two years for affray.

I urge upon the Minister and the Government an important principle which I believe the judges share and in which the Government too should believe. Generally today, the sentence passed by the judge often bears little resemblance to the sentence to be served by the defendant. We should use the Bill as part of our journey along the road to a much more realistic and common-sense policy on sentencing, under which we should introduce maxima and judges should pass sentences which bear a much closer relationship to the reality of what happens to the prisoner after he walks down the step from the dock. I therefore urge the Minister to accept these amendments as reflecting a realistic and common sense view.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: A good deal of the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) was persuasive. My difficulty is that, on convicting a person, the only choice for the court is life imprisonment or a fine. That is what clause 1(6) says.

Mr. Alex Carlile: It is not really for me to correct the hon. Gentleman. It is, in fact, a maximum of life.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Anything up to life.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: That is not what the Bill says. I am glad to hear that confirmation from my hon. Friend the Minister. Despite the fact that clause 1(6) states

"liable on conviction on indictment to imprisonment for life or a fine or both" the word "liable" presumably covers the gradations.

I shall make only one other comment because I suspect that when the Bill goes before another place some of the judges will weigh in on this matter. My hon. Friend is conscious of that. Does it not follow that, if a court concludes that a life sentence is appropriate, at least 12 people will be liable to be given that sentence? The definition of riot is that 12 people must have been involved. No doubt a court could start off with a life sentence for the most serious rioter and go down through the gradations. However, I think that their lordships may well consider that point.

I do not share the view of the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery that the jury would be less liable to convict if the maximum sentence was life. For all that, bearing in mind our experience over the years of the other place, it might be a good idea for my hon. Friend the Minister to ensure that our amendments are not overturned in the other place.

Mr. Spencer: We now see the limp wrist of the alliance drooping pathetically in the breeze of public misgiving about public disorder. The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) suggested that the maximum sentence for the new offence of violent disorder should be three years. That proposal is totally out of touch with the real world. In practical terms, any judge approaching the task of sentencing a person who commits that offence would have to regard the maximum as two years. It is rare that a judge is driven to conclude that the case with which he is dealing is the worst one possible to imagine and therefore justifies the maximum sentence.

As for affray, the proposal is even more absurd. A maximum of two years is proposed, which, in practical politics, would give rise to a maximum sentence of about 18 months. Recently, we have had a number of cases of affray in which the sentences passed by the courts have been measured at between six and eight years. The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery should be ashamed of himself——

Mr. Alex Carlile rose——

Mr. Spencer: —for putting his name to the amendment.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): I endorse the comments of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer). Again we see the alliance being soft on law and order. We must reject the amendment. If the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) has any argument about scale, he should argue that the sentence for violent disorder should be seven years and the sentence for affray five years.

[Mr. Kenneth Hind]

What about juries who are afraid to convict a person for riot because a life sentence may be passed? There is no respectable academic evidence that juries have ever been afraid to convict in such cases, except when the death penalty was the result. In the multitudinous offences in the English system in which life imprisonment is the maximum sentence, no one has ever claimed that such a sentence has deterred juries from carrying out their duty. That argument does not hold water.

It is an insult to juries to suggest that they will somehow evade their responsibility because the maximum sentence for riot is life imprisonment. That suggestion is an insult also to the judges who examine the involvement of the accused, consider the degree of fault under the charge of riot referred to in clause 1 and set appropriate sentences. The purpose of a maximum sentence of life imprisonment is to give the judge the necessary flexibility to reflect, as he sees fit, on the degree of culpability of the person who breeches the law. It also reflects the feelings of horror and opprobrium attached to this offence by the general public. The maximum sentence should stay.

If the hon. and learned Gentleman has an argument, it is that the alternative to five years' imprisonment for violent disorder should be seven years and for affray it should be three years. The matter has been fully discussed in Committee, and I am sure that the public will join with Government Members in recognising that public order offences must be dealt with firmly and that judges should have the option to impose lengthy sentences of imprisonment. I oppose this silly amendment.

Mr. Giles Shaw: As my hon. Friend the Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) has reminded the House, this matter was fully discussed in Committee. I remind the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) that we spent a lot of time debating the matter. The Law Commission recommended 10 years as the maximum sentence for riot, and in the White Paper published in May the Government reflected the Law Commission's view.

As the hon. and learned Gentleman knows, a life sentence was passed at the Old Bailey which suggested that the 10-year maximum might not be sufficient for the worst cases. That case is now the subject of an appeal which is to be heard on 19 May, and the Government think it right to keep the position open until the appeal is heard. We shall, of course, study with care any judgment by the Court of Appeal and we will also listen carefully to the views expressed in Parliament. I note the views of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer) and my hon. Friend the Member for Lancashire, West. I hope the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery will not divide the House on his amendment because we still have an open mind and a decision will depend on the Court of Appeal judgment.

On the other two amendments, the Law Commission recommended maximum sentences for violent disorder and affray of five and three years respectively, and those are the maxima in clauses 2 and 3 of the Bill. The invitation that the hon. and learned Gentleman makes to us to reduce those is not an invitation that I could ask the House to accept because I know the views of my hon. Friends on the matter.

In its working paper the Law Commission originally suggested 10 years for affray and five years for unlawful assembly. The sentences recommended in its final report are a considerable reduction on the working paper proposals. I must remind the hon. and learned Gentleman that we are dealing with major public order offences of great gravity. They are offences that give rise to anxiety and it is right that in the Bill there should be a significant tariff of sentences available so that the courts may offer the public the protection that they deserve.

Mr. Kaufman: I am sorry that the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) was not with us in Standing Committee. He knows that we debated these matters at length and that the amendment that he has moved follows the spirit of the arguments put forward by me and by my hon. Friends. I would certainly not wish the Bill to reach the statute book with a life sentence for the offence of riot, especially the offence of riot as it is defined in this Bill. I might as well say it now, although I will say it later, that when this Minister of State makes a statement in good faith it is just that and I certainly accept it in that spirit.

In Standing Committee the Minister said that it was necessary from the point of view of the Government not to alter the Bill at this stage in the light of the sentence to which he referred. That was taken by us as meaning that once that matter—now very close—was out of the way, the Government would make a change. My hope and expectation is that when the Bill goes to the House of Lords an amendment will be moved from our Benches and I hope from the Government Benches to deal with this matter. I cannot say that I am happy to leave it like that, but I am content to do so in this case because the Government have got themselves on a hook.

I concur with the general drift of the speech by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery. We said the same thing during the debates in the Standing Committee, that we regard this as unique and not something to be repeated in any circumstances. Statutory sentences must be decided by Parliament for judges to follow, rather than decided by judges for Parliament to follow.

Mr. Alex Carlile: I am grateful to the Minister for dealing in a serious way with what was intended to be, and is, a serious matter. The hon. and learned Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer) and his junior thought this to be a matter upon which they could indulge in a little by-electioneering. That comes ill from two hon. Members, one of whom is an hon. and learned Member, from a party which has seen crime increase out of all recognition during its period of office; who cannot even keep the prisons in order, including prisons in the constituency, to my knowledge, of at least one of those hon. Members; and which cannot present the people of our towns and villages with a policeman on foot walking up and down the streets as part of their community. I could continue at some length to deal with the matter in the vein that they adopted. However, I shall not do that because I realise the importance of staying in order during this part of the debate.

7.15 pm

I share with the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) the understanding that the Minister of State says what he means and means what he says. I see a chink of light, in that this matter may be reconsidered in another place, especially after the case to which the Minister referred has been decided.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 4

FEAR OR PROVOCATION OF VIOLENCE

Amendment made: No. 12, in page 3, line 8, leave out from 'if' to end of line 25 and insert

'he—

(a) uses towards another person threatening, abusive or insulting words or behaviour, or

(b) distributes or displays to another person any writing, sign or other visiable representation which is threatening, abusive or insulting, with intent to cause that person to believe that immediate unlawful violence will be used against him or another by any person, or to provoke the immediate use of unlawful violence by that person or another, or whereby that person is likely to believe that such violence will be used or it is likely that such violence will be provoked'.—[Mr. Giles Shaw.]

Clause 5

HARASSMENT, ALARM OR DISTRESS

Amendment made: No. 13, in page 3, line 32, leave out from 'if' to end of line 7 on page 4 and insert

'he—

(a) uses threatening, abusive or insulting words or behaviour, or disorderly behaviour, or

(b) displays any writing, sign or other visible representation which is threatening, abusive or insulting.

(2) An offence under this section may be committed in a public or a private place, except that no offence is committed where the words or behaviour are used, or the writing, sign of other visible representation is displayed, by a person inside a dwelling and the other person is also inside that or another dwelling.

(3) It is a defence for the accused to prove—

(a) that he had no reason to believe that there was any person within hearing or sight who was likely to be caused harassment, alarm or distress, or

(b) that he was inside a dwelling and had no reason to believe that the words or behaviour used, or the writing, sign or other visible representation displayed, would be heard or seen by a person outside that or any other dwelling, or

(c) that his conduct was reasonable.'. — [Mr. Giles Shaw.]

Mr. Chris Smith: I beg to move amendment No. 14, in page 4, line 19, at end insert—

'(8) The Secretary of State shall issue a code of practice in connection with the exercise of the power of arrest under subsection (5) of this section.

(9) Section 67 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 shall have effect as if references to a code of practice included references to a code of practice to which subsection (8) above applies.'.

Many of the arguments about the offence of disorderly conduct and the now amended clause 5 have already been rehearsed. Our major anxiety is about the manner in which the offence will be policed. There is the possibility that a mistaken interpretation of the offence and the way in which it should be dealt with could in some circumstances lead to another sus law. We have been worried about that all along in connection with this new offence and clause 5. Accordingly, we suggest in this amendment that the Secretary of State, in exactly the terms of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, should issue a code of practice to the police to ensure that they are made extremely well aware by the Government and by the Home Office of the manner in which the Government intend them to police this offence and about the way in which they conduct themselves.

I hope the Government will see the advantage of issuing a clear statement of guidance to the police that that code of practice would enshrine. In those terms I hope that the House will accept the amendment.

Mr. Shaw: I am grateful for the way in which the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) moved this amendment. I fully understand the interest that is aroused about the use of the arrest powers in clause 5. We had substantial discussions about that in Committee. It is not our intention to publish a code of practice about this arrest power, because such a single arrest power does not justify such a code. It is our intention to issue guidance about its interpretation in the circular that we send to police forces about the workings of Acts, if and when the Bill becomes an Act.

If the hon. Gentleman withdraws the amendment, I shall write to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) and set out the guidance contained in the general circular on the arrest powers. That will have the full description of the arrest power element that he wishes to be discussed, and it will be placed in the Library so that it becomes a published document. I will do that rather than publish the circular itself, as that will deal with many other issues that it would not be sensible to publish.

Mr. Smith: I am extremely grateful to the Minister for what he said. It is an extremely helpful compromise that guidance should be given to protect the public and to facilitate the job that the police must do. There is considerable public concern about this, and the Opposition are also concerned. It is therefore right that such guidance should be made public in the way that the Minister has suggested.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: Will the hon. Gentleman join me in inviting the Minister to be sure that the document is placed in the Library before the Bill is considered in another place, just in case some people wish to comment upon it?

Mr. Smith: I echo the hon. Gentleman's anxiety and his keenness to ensure that the matter is available for public consideration by both Houses in advance of discussion in the other place. However, the Government may find that the timetable does not permit such a rapid placing of the document in the Library.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I fear that it would be wrong for the hon. Gentleman to expect that we should be able to give this guidance prior to the matter coming before the other place. The circular will be in draft before we are ready to issue it, and we shall have to bear in mind possible changes as the Bill goes through.

Mr. Smith: I accept the practical problems that face the Minister, but I also expect that their Lordships might wish to consider these matters during their consideration of the Bill. In the light of what the Minister has said, and given the extremely helpful content of his contribution, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 7

PROCEDURE: MISCELLANEOUS

Mr. Giles Shaw: I beg to move amendment No. 18, in page 5, line 9 leave out '2 to 4' and insert '1 to 5'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may take Government amendments Nos. 66 to 68.

Mr. Cash: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not know whether hon. Members have noticed that there is a curious smell in the Chamber which seems to be associated with food that has somehow wafted through the air-conditioning system. Can that be looked into, because if it persists it will be most unpleasant?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have detected it myself, and I shall have inquiries made.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I rise in an aroma of take-away.

These amendments are relatively straightforward. Clause 7(2) as drafted provides that clauses 2 to 4 create only one offence for the purpose of the rules against charging more than one offence in the same count or information. The offence in clause 5 can be committed either by using threatening, abusive or insulting words or behaviour or by the use of disorderly behaviour.

It is possible that a court will decide that two offences are thereby created and that an information charging someone with an offence would be bad for duplicity if it did not clearly indicate which conduct it was alleged the accused had committed. To guard against that eventuality amendment No. 18 extends clause 7(2) to clause 5 and also to clause 1 to avoid unnecessary argument in relation to any alternative element in the offence. The other amendments are similar and consequential.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 8

INTERPRETATION

Amendments made: No. 19, in page 5, leave out line 19 and insert

'In this Part—

"dwelling" means any structure or part of a structure occupied as a person's home or as other living accommodation (whether the occupation is separate or shared with others) but does not include any part not so occupied, and for this purpose "structure" includes a tent, caravan, vehicle, vessel or other temporary or movable structure;'.

No. 20, in page 5, line 20, leave out from beginning to 'and' in line 27 and insert—

'"violence" means any violent conduct, so that—

(a) except in the context of affray, it includes violent conduct towards property as well as violent conduct towards persons,'.

No. 21, in page 5, leave out lines 33 and 34.

No. 22, in page 5, leave out lines 35 to 38.

ADVANCE NOTICE OF PUBLIC PROCESSIONS

Mr. Giles Shaw: I beg to move amendment No. 23, in page 6, line 37, leave out from 'notice' to 'notice' in line 39 and insert

'shall be given in accordance with this section of any proposal to hold a public procession intended—

(a) to demonstrate support for or opposition to the views or actions of any person or body of persons,

(b) to publicise a cause or campaign, or

(c) to mark or commemorate an event,

unless it is not reasonably practicable to give any advance notice of the procession.

(1A) Subsection (1) does not apply where the procession is one commonly or customarily held in the police area (or areas) in which it is proposed to be held or is a funeral procession organised by a funeral director acting in the normal course of his business.

(2) The'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we can take amendment (a) thereto, leave out and Government amendments Nos. 25 and 26.

'(c) to mark or commemorate an event.'.

Mr. Shaw: The requirement to give advance notice under clause 11 as drafted applies to every procession unless, under clause 11(5), it is exempt because it is a procession commonly or customarily held or it is a funeral procession.

We had a full and interesting debate in Committee on whether clause 11 was too wide, and we undertook to consider whether we might redefine this requirement in such way as to exclude processions of no interest to the police, such as school crocodiles. That is the main effect of these amendments.

Instead of advance notice being required of all processions—except those caught by subsection (5)—advance notice will be required only of those types of procession set out in the amendment—namely, those intended to demonstrate support for, or opposition to, the views or actions of any person or body of persons; those publicising a cause or campaign; or those marking or commemorating some event. Consequently, organisers of any procession that has the sole aim of getting from A to B, such as crocodiles of schoolchildren or tourists following a guide, will not be required to give advance notice. But those organising demonstrations of a political nature or processions with a wider purpose than movement from A to B will need to give notice.

The existing exemption for processions commonly or customarily held and funeral processions will be retained by virtue of the new subsection (1A) which replaces subsection (5). The reason for this is quite straightforward. If a procession is commonly or customarily held, the police will already be aware of it and have no need of advance notice. If the event is likely to give rise to problems, or the police want an update about this year's arrangements, they will get in touch with the organisers near the time.

These amendments also help to clarify that where a procession arises spontaneously in response to some event —I recall discussion of demonstrations arising out of a sense of grief or loss — no advance notice of it is required. This is achieved by the addition of the phrase at the end of subsection (1). Amendment No. 26 is consequential. This represents substantially the views that were expressed in Committee, and I commend the amendments to the House.

Mr. Soley: I acknowledge that to some extent the Government have moved, but we are still unhappy about the clause and the amendments that the Government have proposed. There are a number of reasons for that. We feel yet again the Government are making the mistake of having far too wide catch-all phrases in the Bill. For example, notice will be required if the object is "to mark or commemorate an event".

That is wide open and could catch just about anything.

If people choose to celebrate another person's birthday down the road by marching together as a group to award a bouquet of flowers, that would be caught by the Bill. I am puzzled as to why the Government have decided to introduce this in the manner that they have. It is an unnecessary extra catch-all phrase that is too wide to be justified.

Originally, it seems that the Government intended to get information about those processions that they thought would cause difficulty for the police and so on. They were really thinking about the 15 per cent. or so of processions that cause such problems. I am sure that the Government accept that the other 85 per cent. cause no problems of any kind. Even by their own standard, I am surprised that they find it necessary to introduce a phrase so wide as as that is a catch-all phrase.

The Opposition are far from convinced that the case for giving notice has been made. We made the point in Committee that there was real doubt as to whether it was desirable for notice to have to be given. There is little evidence that such notice changes behaviour. In fact, most of the assemblies and processions pass off peacefully without trouble. Most people who organise processions give notice to the police. Even if we accept the case for giving notice, as we said in Committee, there is a strong argument that notice should be given not to the police but to the local authority.

7.30 pm

I do not wish to weary the House by going over the ground that was covered in Committee. However, I shall quote from the annual report of the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary in Northern Ireland, Sir John Hermon. It will speed matters up if I simply quote from the relevant passages in that report. The Chief Constable states:

"Earlier I referred to the grievous casualties suffered through acts of terrorism. I regret to report that 1985 was also a year in which the RUC experienced substantial public order problems. This subject is dealt with at some length in the body of my Report and I recommend its study to all interested organisations and individuals."

As an aside, I would hope that the Minister and his Department will consider this specific part of the annual report in some detail.

"I wish to emphasise that the policy of the police in respect of parades and demonstrations is to seek responsibility and co-operation and to encourage dialogue and agreement with parade organisers."

That actually happens in most of the areas, most of the time.

"Furthermore, despite impressions created to the contrary, I would point out that of the 1,897 loyalist parades and demonstrations policed by the RUC in 1985, only 2 were banned and 15 re-routed after unsuccessful attempts to reach agreement through negotiation."

I stress that only 15 marches were re-routed, because this is where the crunch comes in the chief constable's report in relation to the Bill. The Chief Constable continued:

"The police are faced with making difficult judgements in sensitive situations. The decisions taken are genuine, professional police decisions and the law ought to be respected.

Whilst the police will always be responsible for the actual enforcement of the law in public order situations on the streets, it may perhaps be worth considering if responsibility for decisions on the holding and routing of parades should rest with an independent public tribunal."

I must stress here that the Chief Constable's report came out after we had passed the relevant amendments in Committee. The report is especially relevant to the Government's drafting of the Bill. The Government are still asking the police to take what the Opposition have always said would be seen as political judgments. That is precisely what has happened in Northern Ireland. It is precisely because the RUC was asked to take such judgments that it came into the front line. Although I am not suggesting that the problems in Northern Ireland will be repeated here, I would say that people will increasingly see the police as making political judgments concerning the route, the numbers and the timing of assemblies.

In such circumstances, I would warn the Government to listen carefully to what the Chief Constable of the RUC said. That difficulty does not exist here, but the Government should not continue to duck the point about the position in Scotland, where notice is given to a local authority. That process has worked very well and nobody has criticised that co-operation. Notice is given to the local authority and the authority seeks the co-operation of the police. The Government must realise that, at a time when the police are already being drawn into the party political debate, Ministers have come forward with an amendment which keeps the police in that position. I acknowledge the changes made in Committee, but I must say that these changes are not good for the police or for the public.

The Government have written into the amendment, because of the concern expressed by the Opposition and by the Minister during the Committee stage, that there is a need to give advance notice. The Government have added the words to amendment No. 23 — and the Minister correctly stressed this—

"Unless it is not reasonably practicable to give any advance notice of the procession."

[Mr. Soley]

I am a little worried about the word "any". That word could be interpreted in a court of law in a number of different ways. It may be interpreted in a loose manner, that it was not possible to give any notice, or it could be interpreted more tightly, that only 10 minutes' notice should be given. It may be said that someone should have telephoned or handed a notice to a police station only 10 minutes before the event.

As an example, I quote the case of the American bombing of Libya, which took place in the early hours of the morning. People feeling strongly about that event the next day, marched and demonstrated in many towns. It would be possible, as the Minister would argue, that the event was of considerable emotional importance and people should be allowed to demonstrate without notice being given. Yet, as I understand it under the amendment, it could be interpreted by a court that those people could not demonstrate as seven days' notice had not been given of the demonstration. The demonstration was not planned seven days in advance, but some notice could have been given. The trouble with the word "any" is that it could be anything between seven days and a couple of minutes.

I am sure that lawyers would be able to argue for a long time in courts of law as to the use of the word "any". It could mean that they were not required to give notice if the demonstration had not been planned seven days in advance. Whatever is regarded as reasonable in these circumstances becomes a matter for interpretation, whether it be three days, seven days or 10 minutes' notice. There seems to be a curious use of the phrase "any advance notice" and I would welcome the Minister's comments on that part of the amendment.

I am also a little unsure about the question of the posting of notice in the amendment. I do not wish to go ahead of matters now, but we must take account of the way in which notice must be given and that raises the question of notice posted in advance and what happens if that does not get to the police station.

I conclude by saying that the dangerous part of the Bill and the reason why we are still so unhappy with the new Government amendment is that we still do not think that the Government have correctly addressed the problem of achieving a balance between the democratic rights of the people to express their views on political, social, economic and other matters, and the need to keep public order. It seems that the Government are under-estimating the extent to which they are forcing the police into political decisions. The police are being forced into making political decisions and this only makes the waters less clear.

At times of acute economic and social distress—as today — when there is mass unemployment and uncertainty, there will always be demonstrations and assemblies as a means of expressing the anger and anxiety in society. If we try to deal with that by amending the clauses to the Bill which are as widely drawn as they are in paragraph (c) of amendment No. 23 or as loosely drawn in the amendment which includes the words "any advance notice", we will be creating powers which will not only cause problems for the police but will create problems of public order for the nation. At the end of the day, if the police try to exercise these powers, we cannot be sure that they will not trigger off the public order disturbances that people are seeking to avoid.

I would like the Minister to address us about the use of the word "any" in paragraph (c) of amendment No. 23 and to explain the line—

"to mark or commemorate an event."

I would also ask him if he will at least guarantee to the House that he will take a long, hard look at the evidence given by the Chief Constable of the RUC so that the police in this country should have the same kind of powers as those enjoyed by the police in Northern Ireland.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I, too, read with great interest Sir John Hermon's report when it came out, and I have had the opportunity of discussing his thoughts with police officers in Northern Ireland and here. In a word, I think that he is mistaken.

I understand, of course, that in the peculiarly sensitive circumstances of Northern Ireland today, where for one reason or another there are attempts to embroil the police in the politics of the Anglo-Irish agreement, the police face some difficult dilemmas. It is interesting that the Chief Constable's report, which was written before the most poignant of those dilemmas arose, addresses a proper matter. I respect Sir John Hermon for having put his finger on the problem, but that is not to say that I agree with his conclusion.

I can only ask the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) to accept—he has the advantage of having the report with him and I do not—that Sir John Hermon does not suggest that the matter should be put in the hands of a local authority. He is, as I understand it, suggesting some outside body. In present circumstances in Northern Ireland I cannot imagine anything worse than placing the responsibility to allow or not to allow marches in the hands of local authorities which are at one another's throats. Therefore, I hope that the hon. Gentleman was not trying to imply that the Chief Constable's report gives any support for the notion of local authorities being the arbiters.

Mr. Soley: If the hon. Gentleman had listened to my quotation properly, he would know that I said that responsibility should be given to an independent body. He should bear in mind that I also said that Northern Ireland was not Britain. The system is working well in Scotland, and that is what he needs to address himself to, along with the fact that the police in Northern Ireland have been dragged into the party political arena.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: In the spirit in which we have addressed the Bill, I was seeking only to make sure that the hon. Gentleman was drawing no inference from Sir John Hermon's report that that responsibility should be a local authority function, although he properly cited the Scottish example in support of his proposition.

The police, with all their problems and difficulties, are by far the best people to make that decision. They are completely objective, impartial and experienced. Therefore, the responsibility should remain with them.

Let me say one further word about amendment (a). The Opposition seek to leave out paragraph (c). I heard what the hon. Gentleman said about birthday parties, and so on, but I do not think that he was pressing that seriously. It is precisely the events that we have seen commemorated in Northern Ireland which can frequently cause the problem. I notice that in the following paragraph (1A) the Government say:

"Subsection (1) does not apply where the procession is one commonly or customarily held".

That opens the door to a wide number—probably the majority—of innocent processions of the kind about which the hon. Gentleman and the rest of the Committee were concerned.

The Government have achieved a better balance in amendment No. 23 than they did in the original Bill. Indeed, they have got it just about right.

Mr. Hind: I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister of State on finding a good solution to a difficult problem. I must disagree with the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) for a number of reasons. First, the clause is designed to prevent public disruption arising for political reasons. In the majority of cases they are matters which are likely to raise temperatures in our society and cause trouble. It places a requirement on organisers of such political demonstrations to give notice to the police in their district. That is all that it is doing.

To suggest that an event which is
"to mark or commemorate an event"
should not be included in this definition would surely create a lawyer's paradise. My hon. Friend has set out to make sure that no lawyer's paradise is created by extensively defining the criteria under which notice of a demonstration or procession should be handed in to the police.

Paragraph (c) clearly covers the sort of situation where, for example, the National Front would wish to march through Brixton to celebrate the birthday of Adolf Hitler. That is surely something that we would wish the police to know about and, accordingly, be able to take action to prevent any attendant rioting or public disorder. There are other obvious examples of a more Left-wing nature, such as a march to celebrate the birthday of Karl Marx. Such matters all lead to considerations of public order. People who violently oppose a point of view may wish to demonstrate that on the streets with violence or other breaches of public order.

This is a sensible clause, tackling a difficult problem, and I commend it to my hon. Friends as one for which we should vote and give our full support to this evening.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I should like, with the leave of the House, to deal briefly with the points made by the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley). My hon. Friend the Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) gave the clue to why we are seeking still to include commemorative events. Any regular commemorative event, such as an Easter or Christmas procession or May day parade, will be exempted because customarily held processions are exempt, but to go further would create the loophole to which my hon. Friend has drawn attention.

Supporters here of Sinn Fein may call a procession and claim that rather than seeking support for their views they were merely commemorating Bloody Sunday or some other event. Loyalist marchers might claim that the purpose of their procession was merely to commemorate the Battle of the Boyne, and so on. A commemorative occasion as such cannot be divorced from the possible consequences to public order that would occur. Therefore, there is a case for including it and that is why I cannot favour amendment (a).

I take the hon. Gentleman's point about "any" notice. It is clearly a fact that under the clause, as he will know, such notice as would in the circumstances be practicable should be given. Ultimately, if would be for the court to decide whether, under the circumstances, a day's notice could have been given. The importance of including this is that we have asked that, if possible, notice should be given. The hon. Gentleman has frequently and rightly drawn attention to the fact that for the vast majority of processions the police have been provided with full notice, after full discussions and arrangements are made in full agreement. That is the ideal situation.

There is a requirement here to allow for the spontaneous procession as a result of an accident or some other tragedy which, as the hon. Gentleman made clear, could give rise to such a procession. That is certainly acceptable. We have no intention to resile from that. But if it is practicable to give any notice which is commensurate with the circumstances, that notice should be given.

Mr. Soley: Will the hon. Gentleman clarify for the House and people outside whether, in the case of the American raid on Libya, a procession held the following day, say 12 hours after the event, would be a circumstance in which he would expect the law to say that notice must have been given, or is he saying that that would be a spontaneous event?

Mr. Shaw: I cannot hypothecate, but that is the kind of event giving rise to public opinion which is designed to be acceptable under the arrangements that we have proposed. We have provided for a response which is virtually immediate, and a matter of hours is virtually immediate. I would suggest that that would come within the definition of a spontaneous procession when notice cannot be given. But if the procession were a day and a half after the event, I would conclude that some notice should be given. I am sure that most organisers would wish that.

With regard to the hon. Gentleman's third point about local authorities, we have already discussed this with the Association of District Councils, which objected strongly to it and wanted to have nothing to do with it at one time. It would have preferred the police to take that burden off the collective shoulders of the district councils. Wisdom would lie in that direction, but I am sensitive to the hon. Gentleman's point that the police should not be dragged in to make political decisions. Their responsibility is the public order consequence of what has been proposed, and that must be a decision for them.

Question put, That the amendment to the proposed amendment be made:

Mr. Giles Shaw: I beg to move amendment No. 24, in page 7, leave out lines 3 to 10 and insert—

'(3) Notice must be delivered—

(a) to a police station in the police area in which the procession is intended to be held, or

(b) where the procession is intended to be held in more than one police area, to a police station in each area.

(4) If delivered not less than 6 clear days before the date when the procession is intended to be held, the notice may be delivered by post by the recorded delivery service; but section 7 of the Interpretation Act 1978 (under which a document sent by post is deemed to have been served when posted and to have been delivered in the ordinary course of post) does not apply.

(5) If not delivered in accordance with subsection (4), the notice must be delivered by hand not less that 6 clear days before the date when the procession is intended to be held or, if that is not reasonably practicable, as soon as delivery is reasonably practicable.'.

Clause 11 as drafted allows advance notice only to be given by hand. I undertook in Committee to bring forward an amendment to provide for advance notice to be given by recorded delivery post. This amendment makes good that commitment. It provides that, where advance notice is given not less than six clear days in advance, delivery may be effected either by hand, or by post by recorded delivery. If an organiser wishes to take advantage of this facility, it is his responsibility that the notice arrives at least six clear days in advance of the procession being held. That is the effect of disapplying section 7 of the Interpretation Act 1978.

Where it is not practicable to give six clear days' notice of a procession because it is called at short notice, notice must be delivered by hand. In such cases, it is important that the organisers get together with the police as soon as possible. So we did not think it right to allow service by post except when the notice reaches the police at least six clear days before the procession.

Mr. Kaufman: As the Minister will know, we are not in the least happy about the notice provisions of this Bill. Nevertheless, what the Minister has just moved is the fulfilment of a concession that he made to us in Committee, and we thank him for that.

Amendment agreed to.

No. 26, in page 7, leave out line 22 and insert 'the notice'.—[Mr. Giles Shaw.]

Clause 12

IMPOSING CONDITIONS ON PUBLIC PROCESSIONS

Mr. Giles Shaw: I beg to move amendment No. 27, in page 7, line 35 leave out 'This section applies'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 29, 30, 31, 33, 34, 41, 42, 43, 44 and 45.

Mr. Shaw: Again these amendments respond to amendments moved in Committee, in particular the amendment moved by the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland). I agreed to bring forward amendments to provide that, where the chief officer of police gave directions imposing conditions in advance of an assembly, these should be given in writing. Amendment No. 45 makes good that commitment. Amendment No. 34 makes similar provision in respect of processions.

In Committee my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley) tabled amendment No. 54, which would have had the effect that directions imposed by the police on an assembly could prescribe the place at which an assembly either might or might not be held. The intention behind the amendment was to ensure that, where an officer imposed conditions as to the place where an assembly might be held, he would not be obliged to specify an alternative site. He could simply say that the assembly could not take place there. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary indicated that we would bring forward an amendment to give effect to this intention, and that is the effect of amendment No. 43.

Mr. Cash: I am advised, by the tone of your voice in calling me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to speak very briefly. I hope to do so, as I have indeed done so far in this debate, as hon. Members who have been present throughout will testify.

My concern is with a constituency matter, namely the peace convoy which has been descending on my constituency and its vicinity from time to time. It has also moved from the place where it had settled down, on Cannock Chase, to invade parts of my constituency and to cause a great deal of harassment and concern.

The chief constable of Staffordshire has been extremely helpful in putting together a detailed case to illustrate the way in which the people in my area have been affected. The total cost incurred by the county council ratepayers is as much as £85,000, a considerable amount of money, and this expenditure has been caused by the disruption of the lawful enjoyment of Cannock Chase. These people were leaving Cannock Chase and were going into gardens and other parts of my constituency, thereby causing a great deal of concern. I hope, therefore, that this provision, in conjunction with clause 5, will do the trick.

[Mr. Cash]

We have a serious situation on our hands. The peace convoy is rolling all over the country. It splits up into sections. I hope that the provisions of the clause will go some way towards helping to deal with this matter which is so worrying to my constituents.

That is all that I wish to say. I hope that I have gained your approval, Mr. Deputy Speaker, by the brevity of my speech. I beg to ask leave to sit down.

Mr. Kaufman: The hon. Gentleman has, in my view, rather spun it out. I trust that he will take warning from the way in which you called him, Mr. Deputy Speaker, should he deem it necessary to intervene again.

All that I would like to do is to thank the Minister for fulfilling the undertaking that he gave in Committee.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 29, in page 8, line 5, leave out '(2) The senior police officer' and insert 'he'.

No. 30, in page 8, line 6, leave out 'any conditions which' and insert 'such conditions as'.

No. 31, in page 8, line 9, leave out 'prescribing' and insert 'as to'.—[Mr. Giles Shaw.]

Mr. Lawrence: I beg to move amendment No. 32, in page 8, line 10, at end insert—

'(2A) For the avoidance of doubt subsection (2) above shall not apply notwithstanding any conventions or regulation which may otherwise permit such procession to approach the close vicinity of the premises of any foreign mission provided that the senior police officer shall have reason to believe that the procession may lead to a disturbance of the peace of the mission or impairment of its dignity in accordance with Article 22, section 2 of the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations (1946).'.

There is a printing error——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I apologise to the hon. and learned Gentleman. I should have pointed out the error to the House. The hon. and learned Gentleman is, I am sure, about to point out to the House that in line 1 the word "not" is a printer's error and should not be included. I apologise to the hon. and learned Gentleman.

Mr. Lawrence: I am grateful for that, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I will proceed with the amendment as corrected.

I am concerned about processions to foreign embassies of the kind that resulted in the tragic death of WPC Fletcher on 17 April——

Mr. Kaufman: It was not a procession; it was an assembly.

Mr. Lawrence: It was an assembly that was the conclusion of a procession of sorts, and it resulted in the tragic death of WPC Fletcher on 17 April 1984. I am concerned that such a tragedy should never be allowed to happen again. It happened because the police authorities, although the Foreign Office was apparently alerted to the likelihood of trouble from the Libyan people's bureau, allowed the movement towards the square—which to some degree was a procession, if not to a complete degree a procession—to take place close to the front of the Libyan people's bureau. Obviously the police authorities considered that either the threat was not serious enough or that the police did not have the power to stop such a procession.

I am delighted and relieved to see that clause 12(1) provides for such a general power to stop or limit processions, but I am not satisfied that it will be used to stop dangerous processions to embassies. My fear is caused by views expressed when the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs considered the abuse of diplomatic immunities and privileges that arose out of the St. James's square event on 17 April 1984. That Committee reported in December 1984. It was the view of witnesses, some officials and Ministers and also of the Committee, with the exception of myself—my proposal appears in the report and it was negatived—that it was so important that embassies should not be insulated from expressions of public opinion within the receiving state that, provided that work at the embassy could continue normally, there ought to be no restriction upon processions or demonstrations other than those that are already imposed by the existing laws. The tragedy of the existing laws is that they did not prevent the tragedy of WPC Fletcher, although trouble was expected.

If that view, arising from an interpretation of the Vienna convention, or of less official conventions and regulations, were to prevail in future, following the introduction of clause 12 of the Bill a senior police officer might be advised, when a procession approaches an embassy, not to restrict the procession, and it is possible that another police constable will then be shot. At any rate, if it were to happen that processions were to be more freely allowed to approach embassies, considerable danger might still exist in future, as it has existed in the past. It is to remove that potential limitation upon the powers of senior police officers, as set out in clause 12(2), that I move this amendment.

In further support of my proposition, may I add that it was the view of Professor Draper, one of the United Kingdom's leading authorities on international law, when he gave evidence to the Select Committee that a receiving state owes a wider duty to a guest mission than to preserving the Queen's peace. He pointed out that the Metropolitan Police Act 1839 contains no special powers for police commissioners to prevent processions at or near diplomatic premises and that section 3 of the Public Order Act 1934 does not provide sufficient control, although in relation to other processions there is such control. In Professor Draper's view, article 22 of the Vienna convention, which was given the force of law in the United Kingdom by the Diplomatic Privileges Act 1964, places a greater, not a lesser, duty on the Government to protect embassies. That article imposes an additional obligation, as a special duty, to prevent "impairment of" a mission's "dignity." Professor Draper's view to the Select Committee was that:

"allowing demonstrators to form up behind barriers placed for the purpose in the immediate frontage of the Libyan mission premises" was such an impairment of dignity and therefore it was incompatible with article 22 of the convention.

Professor Draper's view, which I supported in the Committee, was rejected by the majority of the Committee —I believe with insufficient reason. The view prevailed in the Committee that embassies should not be insulated and that perhaps they should even be encouraged to be subjected to processions and demonstrations so that they could see and understand what feeling there is against the activities of another country in the host country. Therefore, it is sad to relate, WPC Fletcher died. That was not the fault of the British. The murder was by the Libyans, but the fact remains that it would not have happened if the procession and the demonstration had not been allowed to take place near the mission.

8.15 pm

I have tabled this amendment so that any temptation that there might be by the authorities to say, "Yes, the senior police officer has the power to say that the procession which will lead to a demonstration shall not be allowed to go as close as this, or shall not be allowed to go into St. James's square" shall not be restricted in any way by any argument advanced by any authority that, because it is a diplomatic mission, the caution that he would otherwise impose to restrict a procession shall not apply.

If my hon. Friend the Minister of State will assure me that, as far as the Home Office is concerned, no such advice will be given to a senior police officer that he should, at the margin, allow a procession to take place to an embassy, because it is an embassy, when he would have stopped it if it had been going anywhere else, I shall be satisfied. However, if he is not in a position to give such an assurance, I ask the House to consider the addition of amendment No. 32 in order to make sure that processions that look as though they may be dangerous and that are going in the direction of an embassy shall not be allowed where others would not be allowed, for the very simple reason that the last time that this happened somebody died and this House must make sure that that never happens again to any of our policemen or to any citizen of this country.

Mr. Giles Shaw: In moving his amendment my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) deleted the negative which inadvertently appeared on the marshalled list, and I am grateful to him for doing so. As my hon. and learned Friend said, under article 22(2) of the Vienna convention the United Kingdom is under a duty:

> "To protect the premises of the mission against any intrusion or damage and to prevent any disturbance of the peace of the mission or impairment of its dignity."

I draw my hon. and learned Friend's attention to the fact that the United Kingdom is under a duty to prevent any disturbance of the peace of the mission or the impairment of its dignity. Over the years we have more than fully discharged that duty effectively in this capital city. Most of the credit for that, if not all of it, rests with the Metropolitan police, who have the onerous task of providing protection for the embassies in London.

As my hon. and learned Friend will appreciate, the Vienna convention does not ban demonstrations and marches outside embassies. That would be contrary to our traditional freedoms of assembly and demonstration, and would not be acceptable. On occasion—and we can all think of different occasions—it is right that our citizens should be able peacefully to demonstrate their views to the representatives of foreign Governments here. What the Vienna convention does do is to say that we should take all appropriate steps to prevent intrusion or damage or any disturbance of the peace of the mission or impairment of its dignity. The police, and only the police, have the task of discharging that responsibility and they strive to do so without unduly infringing the right of peaceful protest and freedom of assembly. On occasion, no doubt, some of those in foreign missions would have wished the police to do more, and on occasions demonstrators and protestors would no doubt have wished them to do less, but in general they seem to have got the balance about right.

During our review of public order law we considered whether any special controls were necessary for demonstrations outside embassies. Paragraph 5.12 of the White Paper which preceded the Bill stated:

> "The police's existing statutory and common law powers, together with the new controls which are proposed in relation to static demonstrations, should provide the police with all the powers which they need to maintain order outside embassies, and to fulfil their special duty under the Diplomatic Privileges Act 1964."

The Bill contains provisions which may assist in three particular respects to ensure that our obligations under the Vienna convention can be carried out. First, the police will be able to impose conditions on static demonstrations as well as on processions. Secondly, the ability of the police to impose conditions will be extended from the present sole test of serious public disorder to cover demonstrations which threaten serious damage to property or serious disruption to the life of the community or the intimidation of individuals. Thirdly, the offence of disorderly conduct in clause 5 can be deployed where the offending conduct is likely to harass, alarm or distress the people going to and from or working inside an embassy as well as any other person. My hon. and learned Friend will recognise that these are the conditions which are available in the Bill, which covers all citizens for all events of this character. Subject to the House passing the legislation, there is no change in the rules or conditions which will be imposed on citizens or any person.

There is no special arrangement in the conditions which apply to embassies. On the contrary, the conditions will be identical. Those imposed on demonstrations outside embassies will be the same as elsewhere. The use of the powers will depend on the circumstances. I certainly do not claim that they are likely to lead to a fundamental change in the policing of demonstrations outside embassies. In our view that would neither be right nor necessary to comply with the Vienna convention.

The theme of the Bill is that we should bring the law relating to public order up to date and ensure that the police have the power to prevent and deal with disorder without infringing the right of peaceful protest. Even without our international obligations, it is right that those working in embassies should have the same protection as our own citizens. We continue to take the view, as we did in the White Paper, that additional specific controls are not required and that, with the existing law, the current Bill will confirm that the police have the powers that they need to ensure that our obligations under the Vienna convention are discharged.

The same criteria on public order will apply. The House will take note of the tragedy which occurred as a result of the assembly outside the Libyan people's bureau. I am convinced that the police, who have the right to impose conditions, will take note of that in ensuring that citizens of whatever country, at whatever place—certainly not just our own citizens — are not put at risk by any misapplication of the conditions pertaining to public order.

I trust that my hon. and learned Friend will accept that, in setting out the conditions in this way, the provisions for dealing with the matters which he rightly raised are adequately contained in the Bill. The powers that the police will have will ensure that the conditions are applied outside embassies as they are applied anywhere else.

Mr. Lawrence: I take note of what my hon. Friend has said, and that no instructions will be given by the Home Office or anybody else. In the case of a procession to an embassy, any doubts concerning the dangers of the procession will be suspended because of the supreme importance of a demonstration appearing in front of an embassy. That being so, I am satisfied, and I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendments made: No. 33, in page 8, line 11, leave out 'this section' and insert 'subsection (1)'.

No. 34, in page 8, line 18, at end insert—

'(3A) A direction given by a chief police officer by virtue of subsection (3)(b) shall be given in writing.'. — [Mr. Giles Shaw.]

Mr. Giles Shaw: I beg to move amendment No. 35, in page 8, line 29, after 'constable', insert 'in uniform'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 39 and 46.

Mr. Shaw: In Committee I undertook to bring forward amendments to provide that the power of arrest in clauses 12 and 14 would be exercised only by a constable in uniform. That is the effect of these amendments.

Mr. Kaufman: I thank the Minister for fulfilling the undertaking that he gave in Committee. I am especially pleased that the Government are making this point in statute, in the light of the disquieting reports that come to us from Wapping.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): I beg to move amendment No. 36, in page 9, line 1, leave out subsection (11).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments:

No. 51, in clause 16, in page 11, line 35, leave out from 'highway' to 'and' in line 36.

No. 54, in clause 17, in page 12, line 5, leave out 'Great Britain' and insert 'England and Wales'.

No. 58, in clause 18, in page 12, line 27, leave out 'Great Britain' and insert 'England and Wales'.

No. 62, in clause 19, in page 13, line 11, leave out 'Great Britain' and insert 'England and Wales'.

No. 70, in clause 22, in page 13, line 40, leave out subsection (1).

No. 71, in page 14, line 7, leave out 'a sheriff or'.

No. 72, in page 14, line 10, leave out 'sheriff or'.

No. 73, in clause 23, in page 14, line 35, leave out subsection (3).

No. 78, in clause 24, in page 15, line 11, leave out from 'highway' to 'and' in line 12.

No. 83, in clause 33, in page 19, line 22, leave out from '1985' to 'shall' in line 23.

No. 84, in clause 35, in page 20, line 7, leave out subsection (1) and insert—

'(1)This Act shall extend to England and Wales only.'

No. 85, in page 20, line 7, leave out '12, 14' and insert '17'.

No. 86, in page 20, line 3, leave out paragraph (b).

No. 89, in schedule 1, in page 24, line 11, leave out Part II.

Mr. Ewing: Amendment No. 36 and the large group of associated amendments are not as forbidding as they might appear. The only purpose of these amendments is to remove Scotland from the terms of the Bill.

I am sure the Solicitor-General has heard the arguments before. The Solicitor-General has failed to convince public opinion and the local authorities of Scotland—I am not sure whether he has convinced the police authorities—that there is a need for Scotland to be included in the Bill. There are two good reasons for that submission.

First, the Solicitor-General will be aware that we have sufficient powers under common law in Scotland. The Scottish position is radically different from the position in England and Wales. The Scottish common law covers any situation which may arise in England and Wales and which will be subsequently covered by legislation contained in the Bill. If the Solicitor-General is not convinced of that argument, he need look no further back than three weeks ago. In central Scotland there was a demonstration which had been properly organised and properly authorised. It certainly did not appear to have the portent of trouble. However, under Scottish common law, those organising the demonstration were persuaded not to go ahead with the demonstration in the interests of the community in which the demonstration was to be held.

That is a recent example of a demonstration being cancelled at the last minute without the existence of this proposed legislation. All those concerned were aware that there were sufficient powers in Scottish common law to deal with that situation.

The second good reason for excluding Scotland from the Bill is the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982. That Act gave responsibility to regional councils and all-purpose island authorities to authorise any public assembly, a march or merely static demonstration. So great is that responsibility and so great is their authority that the regions and all-purpose island authorities can decide the route, the number of people who may attend and the duration of the demonstration. I should stress that the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 was put through largely with the agreement of my right hon. and hon. Friends and me. I would not want anybody to think that it was a party political Act. What makes the inclusion of Scotland in this Bill so surprising and unnecessary is the fact that we spent so much time in 1981-82 getting that Act right so that it would cover assemblies such as are addressed by the Bill.

We believe that people have a right to demonstrate within the law. Nobody is trying to justify unlawful assemblies. Our argument is that an organisation could have made all of the necessary arrangements with the regional council or island authority, only to turn up on the day to be confronted by the most senior police officer present and be told that it cannot go ahead.

8.30 pm

All of the briefing notes and other literature that has been provided refers to a sergeant being the most senior officer present, but I am sure that the Solicitor-General for Scotland will concede that there are remote areas of Scotland where the only police officer present could well be a constable. A constable, albeit in uniform, might cancel all of the arrangements that have been authorised by the regional council or island authority. The police officer might be acting with the best possible intentions. I am not criticising the police — I am criticising the Solicitor-General and his Scottish Office colleagues for putting Scottish police forces in a difficult, if not impossible, position.

The regional councils and island authorities are responsible for administering the 1982 Act and are the police authorities. Central regional council could authorise a demonstration which was cancelled by one of its employees at the last minute. That is ludicrous, but police officers are ultimately employees of the regional police authorities. By including Scotland in the Bill, the Government are putting Scottish police forces in an impossible position. I have yet to hear any justification for including Scotland.

I do not see the need for a review of the legislation, but that does not mean that no need exists. If it is necessary to consider the 1982 Act and common law on demonstrations, however, this is not the way in which to go about it. We should be much more thorough than include a small section—with major implications—on Scotland in a United Kingdom Bill. I must plead with the Solicitor-General to exclude Scotland. If a review is needed, we should have properly thought-out and structured legislation which meets our needs. I am sure that the House agrees with that proposition, bearing in mind the differences between English and Scottish law. Our needs and circumstances are often different. I hope that the Solicitor-General will respond positively.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I must endorse much of what the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) said. Those of us who represent Scottish constituencies are generally anxious about how Scottish reforms are dealt with. Many of us would prefer that these debates took place in a devolved Scottish parliament.

This is another example of Scots legislation being tacked on to a substantially English Bill. Much the same happened in 1982, when there was an English Criminal Justice Bill with one or two Scottish speckles. Lord McCluskey described it as somewhat akin to a Yorkshire pudding with porridge oats in it. The Bill does not have regard to the long and separate traditions of the Scottish common law.

Scotland also has very different statutory provisions, especially as regards the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982. That Act puts emphasis on the regional council or island authority to determine whether processions should take place. It empowers them to specify the date and time of a procession, its route, the number of people who can take part, arrangements for its control and to impose certain conditions on it. An applicant for a procession who believes that the council has not fulfilled its statutory duties can appeal to the sheriff. The Bill, however, gives power to a police officer to stop a procession. It is unlikely but, as has been said, that police officer could be a constable. He might overturn provisions that have been considered by a local authority and been subject to considerable debate.

There is one matter on which I take small issue with the hon. Member for Falkirk, East. He referred to processions and assemblies. It is my understanding that the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 does not cover assemblies. In fact, what we have is a totally new provision in relation to assemblies. Therefore, we shall have an entirely separate means of controlling and dealing with assemblies compared with processions. That is illustrative of the anomalous position one can get into by such piecemeal legislation.

Although I was not a member of the Standing Committee, it is my understanding that on at least one occasion hon. Members suggested a Scottish-type solution for some of the English problems. They were told that that was not appropriate because conditions, circumstances and the tradition of law are different in Scotland. What is sauce for the goose should be sauce for the gander. Because this legislation is thought appropriate for England, it does not follow that it is appropriate for Scotland.

Reference was made to the fact that the Bill brings the police into circumstances where they might not wish to become too deeply involved. If the Government are to make a case for this legislation applying to Scotland they should show that there are circumstances in Scotland which are crying out for this type of reform. They should show that there are circumstances in which there is an absence of the law as it stands in England.

I am advised from a reasonably reliable authority that on one day in December of last year there were a series of incidents in Glasgow. One of them involved the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) who had gone to Glasgow to address a rally. On the same day there was a protest march against strip searching in Armagh gaol. There was a counter-march by Ulster loyalists, who sought to intercept those who were protesting against strip searches. That protest was taking place in the City halls. The Loyalists were milling around George square in Glasgow. Those who know the geography of Glasgow will know that Buchanan street underground station is not far away and the National Front was holding a rally there. The Strathclyde community relations council held a multi-racial festival in the City chambers and the Scottish Asian advisory committee was involved in another demonstration nearby. That demonstration was held at short notice and the committee was given permission to waive the necessary 24 hours notice. The National Front attempted to disrupt that demonstration.

I am told by someone who observed all of that that the police handled it brilliantly and that they coped particularly well. That is because they had to use the common law tools available to them. They had to show their policing skills and they did so. The amount of trouble involved was minimal. I fear that if the police have the powers that will be available under this Bill it would not encourage the best policing. There would, perhaps, be an early resort to using the powers and that would lead to lax policing and could cause trouble where, at the moment, more sensitive policing has managed to avoid it.

I do not think that there have been incidents in Scotland which would have given rise to these powers being given to officers of as low a rank as constable. For those reasons I ask the Solicitor-General for Scotland to consider whether Scotland needs the legislation. It will not put a hole through the Government's legislative programme or substantially diminish the effect of the Bill if, even at this late stage, he was to reconsider the position and take out the provisions relating to Scotland. If he feels that there is a need for a broad overhaul and review of the law in Scotland relating to public order and mobbing and rioting that could take place, we would be prepared to consider that if it was brought forward in a specifically Scottish Bill. Once again, law reform for Scotland in this half-hearted, piecemeal and tacked-on fashion is not in the best interest of Scottish law or the Scottish people.

8.45 pm

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): I support this series of amendments. I am sorry that I was not able to hear the speech of the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing). I had understood that the debate would take place later. Nevertheless, without having heard the hon. Gentleman, my views on this matter are fairly clear.

I am against Scotland being included in the Bill—for two reasons. The first is that to which the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) has already referred. We are dealing with Scottish provisions tacked on to an English measure. I am told that Scotland is included because the Bill was produced in panic by the Government and the police in England because during the miners' strike and on other occasions they found that the English legal system was not capable, in their view, of dealing with some of the difficulties which ensued. Even if there were a case for action in relation to Scotland, it is wholly wrong that the Government should have produced this Bill with Scottish provisions tacked on.

I believe that the Committee had only one or two Scottish members—I do not know the exact composition — and I would not be pleased to have legislation changing Scottish law in a major way in relation to demonstrations and assemblies from a Committee largely composed of members representing constituencies in England and Wales. There is no way in which Scottish Members could hope to give any input from our Scottish experience in that context. Therefore, I reiterate the case which has been made within Scotland on many occasions by the Law Society and many others, that where a substantial change in Scottish law is called for, it should be done by separate legislation. I cannot see any reason why there should not have been a separate Bill for Scotland if it is argued that the changes are justifiable.

I now move from my first objection, which is one of principle, to my second objection. I am not convinced that any real change is required in the arrangements for dealing with public assembly, demonstrations and processions in Scotland. Despite all the difficult factors which can arise — the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) referred to an intelligent system operating in Glasgow — we have not had many inflammable situations which have not been dealt with by the police using common sense, and the laws as they already exist in Scotland.

It is for the Government to persuade the House that Scotland should be included in the Bill. I await the arguments, but I think that the Solicitor-General for Scotland may be hard pressed to produce arguments which will be acceptable to me. I agree with many of the arguments adopted by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland and I do not intend to go over the same ground again. However, as a matter of general principle it should be for the local authority — the democratically elected body—to have a say in these matters as we have now.

It seems strange that, only a few years after the Government produced the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982, we have to have such a major reshaping of the arrangements for dealing with processions and assemblies. I do not know what has conditioned the Government to do it, but it seems that they have joined the stampede in favour of a change in the law, without having done their homework. A major change of this kind, which takes responsibility from a democratically elected authority and gives it to the police, should not be done within a time span of two or three years.

An element of civil liberty is involved. It is always easier to erode civil liberties than to establish them. By taking responsibility from the elected authorities and giving it to the police, the Government are not helping either civil liberties in Scotland or, I suspect, the police themselves. The police will look askance at the powers that they have been given. When they take decisions on their own authority, they will become involved in political activity, which is wrong. The police should be shielded from that wherever possible, in the interests not just of the citizens but of the police themselves.

Respect for the police comes from the way in which they enforce the law, but that is not so if people suspect that politcal bias might creep in. I am not saying that the police would adopt a politically biased attitude, but if a demonstration or assembly is stopped or interfered with under the Act, the blame will be placed on the police, when they may not be guilty of anything. It is much better that the responsibility for such decisions is taken by elected politicians who have, in turn, to answer to their electorate for the way in which the powers of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act are enforced.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland (Mr. Peter Fraser): This debate is about the disapplication of the Bill to Scotland. The objective of the official Opposition is to disapply all the provisions of the Bill. I am a little surprised that there is not an amendment on the Scottish provisions in schedule 2, which amends the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982. I think that the basic intention of the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) is that it is wrong to legislate for Scotland in what he sees as an English and Welsh Bill.

While I understand that argument—I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not think that I am making a cheap political point—I am to some extent surprised that it was only in Committee that, for the first time, the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) advanced the argument. No Scottish Labour Member spoke on Second Reading. While the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland spoke, I understand that he did so in his capacity as law and order spokesman for the alliance, and he made no specific reference to the disapplication to Scotland.

This matter was not suddenly sprung on Scottish Members of Parliament. As hon. Members who are interested in these areas of the law will appreciate, in the White Paper of May 1985, we set out in a paragraph that related solely to Scotland exactly what is now included in the Bill.

The hon. Member for Falkirk, East wishes to disapply the whole Bill. As I understand it, the objective of the amendment tabled by the alliance is more limited. It is to disapply only clauses 12 and 14. It is identical to the amendment introduced by the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland in Committee.

It might be useful if I looked at the effect of the group of amendments tabled in the name of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar). I am concerned that, although the broad point of opposition has been stated, some of the consequences of what is proposed might not be appreciated. Most particularly, although the hon. Member for Falkirk, East did not include this in his remarks, what concerns me is that part III of the Bill would be disapplied to Scotland. The measures in that part of the Bill are essentially a modernisation of the present law on racial hatred, now contained in section 5A of the Public Order Act 1936, which was inserted by section 70 of the Race Relations Act 1976, at a time when the hon. Member for Falkirk, East was a member of the Government.

Section 5A of the 1936 Act applies both north and south of the border. I see no reason why this attempt to update and extend the statutory protection offered by the new measures should not do so. Indeed, if the measures did not apply in Scotland, following the repeal of section 5A we would be left without statutory powers in that area, where we cannot confidently rely on the adequacy of Scots common law to come to our aid in every instance involving incitement to racial hatred.

Mr. Ewing: The Solicitor-General is making a valid point, which I accept. In the spirit of negotiation and good will that we are now enjoying, I am prepared to drop the amendments, in exchange for the hon. and learned Gentleman accepting the rest of my amendments.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his generosity. I appreciate that he sees the importance of having the provisions in Scotland. However, the interesting thing about the argument is that his Government, when he was a member of it, saw that some parts of public order should be legislated for on a United Kingdom basis. After the Race Relations Act 1976, the process of legislation was to bring that into the Public Order Act 1936, which applied on a Great Britain basis. Therefore, the idea that for the first time we are legislating on public order on a Great Britain basis, when previously we had done it separately for England and Wales and Scotland, is not true.

I do not need to labour that point. I am relieved, as I am sure every other hon. Member is, that in Scotland we have had fewer racial hatred problems than elsewhere. The hon. Gentleman seems to appreciate that it would be wrong to give a signal to any racial minority, wherever it was in Great Britain, that it is not to enjoy the statutory protection of the law.

Mr. Soley: It would be a little disingenuous to imply that that was the main problem. The Solicitor-General will remember that more than once in Committee I raised the fact that the system in Scotland, leaving aside the racial hatred part of the Bill, was working very well. Time and again, I challenged the Government to say why they felt it necessary to impose on Scotland something which we felt in England and Wales was not necessary. The Solicitor-General never answered that point in Committee, and he is not answering Scottish Members tonight.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I am still dealing with part III and racial hatred. I understood that the hon. Member for Falkirk, East recognised what I was trying to say.

The substance of both sets of amendments concerns processions, covered in part II of the Bill. Both the official Opposition and the alliance seek to remove clause 12(11) from the Bill. I remind hon. Members of the purpose of the clause. It is to give the police at the scene the power to impose conditions on a procession — provided the statutory criteria are met — when the procession is in progress or when the marchers are assembling. It is essentially an on-the-spot power for the police.

This point was picked up by the hon. Members for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) and for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson). The hon. Member for Falkirk, East referred to the powers under the Civic Government (Scotland) Act. However, the difference is this. We have to deal with circumstances that may emerge after the local authority, given the regulatory power that it has under the 1982 Act, has taken its decision. The 1982 Act establishes that regulatory framework, allowing for the imposition of conditions in advance of the march taking place.

Having introduced the measure with the agreement of all parties in Scotland, I would be the first to recognise that it has worked well. Apart from the minor changes in schedule 2, I have no desire to change it. As the hon. Member for Falkirk, East will appreciate, when we introduced the 1982 Act, the powers at present contained in section 3 of the 1936 Act and which continue to give the police power on the spot in relation to processions in Scotland were still in being. They apply with equal force north and south of the border.

During the debate on the Queen's Speech last year, the hon. Member for Garscadden argued for the need to withdraw section 3 of the 1936 Act from Scotland, on the basis that the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982 was sufficient to deal with all the problems that might arise. I am surprised at that stance and at the line that is being followed by the hon. Member for Falkirk, East. Hon. Members will recollect that two years ago I was regularly questioned about the way in which the police were exercising their common law powers in relation to the unhappy circumstances of the miners' dispute. At that time, the hon. Member for Garscadden expressed his concern about what he called the extraordinary wide use of powers under the Police (Scotland) Act 1967, and asked of me:

> "Is the hon. and learned Gentleman not worried . . . that . . . the police will be able to ban any rally, demonstration or meeting without recourse to public order legislation? Is that now wrong?"—[Official Report, 16 May 1984; Vol. 60, c. 360.]

It is precisely because we think that it is important for police powers in relation to processions to be expressly defined that clause 12(11) has been inserted in the Bill. Its removal would give rise to the very fears that the hon. Gentleman expressed then.

I find it curious that in Strathclyde, which includes more than half the population of Scotland, the regional authority imposed conditions on allowing exemption from the notification requirements under section 62 of the 1982 Act. One of its standard conditions is that police instructions shall be obeyed. I would have thought that the hon. Member for Falkirk, East would have thought that that power was not clearly defined. If, for example, that were to be the Bill's provision for the way in which those participating in a procession should act, the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) and others would undoubtedly say that it wholly lacked any specification.

I am puzzled why the hon. Member for Falkirk, East takes such exception to setting out clearly in Scotland, subject to the stern criteria of serious public disorder, serious damage to property or intimidation, the powers of the police on the spot to regulate the circumstances. He made some play of the fact that the police have common law powers in Scotland, and I do not dissent from that observation. However, I remember equally well that during the miners' dispute he and some of his colleagues went to see the Secretary of State, and openly and clearly expressed their anxiety that the police were resorting to common law powers in those difficult and delicate circumstances. What is wrong with taking the opportunity to set out clearly, subject to those stern criteria, how the police should be able to impose their conditions on a procession or assembly, instead of leaving it to the less clearly defined powers of common law which the police have?

The hon. Gentleman rightly points out that it is undesirable for the police to be intimately involved when members of the public are exercising their democratic right either to assemble or to engage in a procession. I hope that the circumstances of such assemblies or processions are such that the powers under clauses 12 to 14 would rarely be used. Indeed, I would consider the management of our affairs in Scotland a success, if the powers were never relied on. Essentially, these powers are to be held in reserve.

The hon. Gentleman said that the regional authority in Scotland was the police authority. He made the fair point that it might seem slightly odd that if that authority gave a group of people permission to process, it might find that a police officer wanted to impose conditions on the exercise of that right. I recognise that possible difficulty, but the criteria are stern. I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman's Labour colleagues on Central region would be somewhat alarmed if police officers employed by them, under the direction of the chief constable, would not take the necessary action if there was serious public disorder, intimidation or serious damage to property.

I hope that we will not have another miners' strike in Scotland. But the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) will certainly remember that at the time of the strike, several people came up from south of the border to express their views about the dispute. There is a good argument for saying that the powers that the police can take to themselves in such circumstances are widely known and that if they are widely known on a Great Britain basis that is all the more to the good.

My final point may prove unnecessary. The amendment to disapply would also disapply several changes made in the Bill in relation to alcohol at sporting events, as contained in the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1980. The hon. Member for Falkirk, East seemed to address his remarks primarily to part II and not to any changes that might be included in relation to alcohol at football grounds. But, as he knows, those measures have operated successfully in Scotland for more than five years. I hope that he will accept that the law could be updated and improved, just as it will be elsewhere in the United Kingdom.

Although the argument for disapplying has been put, the Government believe that we are talking about desirable reserve powers that fall into the pattern that has existed successully in Scotland for some time. Although anxieties have been expressed, those powers are not in any way at variance with what is contained in the civic government code. They merely provide useful complementary provisions where on-the-spot difficulties might arise.

Mr. Ewing: With the leave of the House, I shall reply to the debate. I accept what the Solicitor-General says about the safety of sports grounds and the provision of alcohol there.

But on the whole the Solicitor-General's argument is based on the fact that the amendment will somehow damage the Bill. He has singularly failed to convince me and my right hon. and hon. Friends of that. The Government will have an opportunity in the other place to reinsert anything taken out of the Bill, and so I advise my right hon. and hon. Friends to vote for the amendment so that the Bill is disapplied in the case of Scotland.

Mr. Maclennan: One thing missing from the Solicitor-General's speech on the proposed disapplication of the public order provisions was any justification, based on evidence, that the law in Scotland does not work. When we debated the subject in Committee, he relied on arguments of tidiness and on ex hypothesi arguments that carried no weight with the Committee. He dismissed the views of the Law Society of Scotland, which complained that the Scottish Office had dreamt up this matter, hanging on to the coat tails of the Home Office.

The arguments have been well made about the procedural objections to reforming the law of Scotland via a side wind. I realise that some hon. Members from Labour constituencies in England are not concerned about this measure. Fortunately, they do not represent the views of the majority of the Opposition. [Interruption.] Hon. Members would be wise not to provoke me. If they do, I cannot guarantee that this important matter will be dealt with expeditiously.

The arguments which the Solicitor-General deployed were the best that could be made. He made the typically persuasive speech of an advocate. The fact remains that there is no mischief to be remedied. The law in Scotland is working well. We are being dragged along for reasons of tidiness alone. I regret that the Solicitor-General has seen fit to kowtow to the Home Office. He would be better advised in future to make major changes in Scots law by means of a Scottish Bill. The participation of Scottish Members would therefore be greater at all stages than it has been during this legislation. It is highly unsatisfactory that it is possible only at the concluding stages of the Bill for Labour Members to define their arguments. They are, for understandable reasons, terribly anxious to do so. We cannot proceed in that way.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Donald Thompson and
Mr. Michael Neubert.

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Alex Carlile: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I understand that tonight there has been a riot at Northeye prison near Bexhill, that the prison is on fire, that a number of prisoners have escaped and that what has happened may well have been partly caused by the problems arising from the prison officers' dispute. I ask that the Home Secretary or a relevant Home Office Minister should come to the House tonight to make a statement on what has happened at Northeye prison, which appears to be extremely serious and ought to be dealt with urgently.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Subject to the proceedings and courtesies of the House, I understand that my right hon. Friend intends to make a statement at 10 o'clock.

Clause 13

PROHIBITING PUBLIC PROCESSIONS

Mr. Giles Shaw: I beg to move amendment No. 37, in page 9, line 5, after 'police', insert 'reasonably'.

Mr. Speaker: With this we may take Government amendment No. 38.

Mr. Shaw: In Committee I undertook to look at aspects of the judicial review procedure—namely, the insertion of "reasonably" in two places in clause 13 which reflects the power to ban. I did so in response to amendments moved by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). These amendments give effect to that undertaking and add a requirement of reasonableness to the chief officer's belief, for the purposes of clause 13, and therefore bring the clause into line with clauses 12(1) and 14(1).

Mr. Kaufman: If it were not so pleasant, it would become monotonous, but I thank the Minister for fulfilling his undertaking.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 38, in page 9, line 22, after 'Metropolis', insert 'reasonably'.

No. 39, in page 9, line 42, after 'constable', insert 'in uniform'.—[Mr. Giles Shaw.]

Clause 14

IMPOSING CONDITIONS ON PUBLIC ASSEMBLIES

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge): I beg to move amendment No. 40, in page 10, line 13, leave out clause 14.

We now come to what is probably the most contentious clause in the Bill, in so far as it proposes the introduction of restrictions on traditional liberties and freedoms. Our intention is to oppose the inclusion of clause 14, and to this end we have tabled the amendment.

This part of the Bill threatens to introduce the criminal law into picketing, and in so doing it presents the distinct possibility — indeed, probability — that other forms of assembly will also fall foul of its provisions. The fact that the Bill defines an assembly as being constituted by as few as three people reveals the extent to which the Government have been taken over by their more extreme element, and how much of an influence it has within the Conservative party. It also says much about the Government's policies and proposals as they affect other sections of our society.

I do not have the experience to recall the progress of other Bills, but the number of amendments that the Government have had to accept as a result of the force of argument from the Labour party reveals a carelessness in drafting that must be horrifying to all thinking people who live in the realisation of the power that the Government wield and the extent to which that power can affect their everyday lives and freedoms.

In Committee my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) attempted to persuade the Government that to define a group of only three persons as an assembly, which could thereby make them liable to be in conflict with the criminal law, was an act of the utmost folly that threatened to be a more serious erosion of traditional liberties. Thankfully, the Minister, who evidently does not share the extremist views of some of his colleagues, accepted the strength of the arguments of my hon. Friends and agreed to an increase in the number to 10. That was an improvement on the proposal in the Bill, but it was still short of our perception of what was reasonable if such a provision had to be included at all. I am pleased to learn that the Government, having thought more seriously about the matter, may now be disposed to accept the amendment tabled in the names of my right hon. and hon. Friends proposing that if the clause is to be included in the Bill the number constituting an assembly for the purposes of the Act should be increased to 20.

9.30 pm

Notwithstanding this and other amendments tabled by the Government following arguments advanced in Committee by Opposition Members, it remains our contention that clause 14 constitutes a major change in the right of ordinary citizens to demonstrate their discontent.

Much has been said about the rights of individuals, as though there was some doubt whether the Labour party believes that the rights of individuals deserve protection. It appears that some Conservative Members are under the impression that if an individual seeks support from a number of his fellow citizens—only two originally, but now 19—to protect or advance these rights, he ceases to be an individual and becomes a mob, and as such his rights become less important than they were when he was an individual. What nonsense that is. That defies the traditions and principles of democracy.

On Monday I visited a voluntary group in my constituency called the Riverside Child Health Project. This project brings together mostly young mothers and one-parent families to discuss health and other problems which they have to face — problems of which my constituency has more than its fair share.

In discussions with one young mother, who was extremely concerned about the implications of the Government's proposals for the social services system, I was asked what can these young mothers do but demonstrate to illustrate their opposition? What struck me as significant and cruel is that this week, while the Government continue to progress their proposals for further eroding the standard of living of that young woman and her family, we will have to listen to the Government putting up arguments as to why her one direct avenue of protest should be restricted. Conservative Members may say that that will not happen and that it is not the purpose of the Bill to do that. How do they know that that will not happen? There is nothing in the Bill which says that it cannot happen, although there is plenty that says it can.

The clause reveals that it can happen, and the police will make it happen. A policeman must decide whether an assembly can be effective or not by imposing the conditions laid down in the Bill as to time, place, numbers and so on. In some cases a single police officer must believe that an assembly will result in serious public disorder, serious damage to property or serious disruption to the life of the community. He must decide whether the purpose of the persons organising the assembly is to intimidate others with a view to compelling them not to do something they have a right to do or to do something they must not do. There is too much scope for interpretation within the clause.

What is

"serious disruption to the life of the community"

which a policeman must decide in advance may occur? As the hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes) said in Committee:

"what may be serious disruption to my tranquil village of Wendons Ambo will not have the same effect on a street in Islington?" — [Official Report, Standing Committee, G, 13 March 1986; c. 744.]

What is intimidation? As we saw in the case of Thomas v. The National Union of Mineworkers, at least one judge, Mr. Justice Scott, believes that simply standing glowering can be highly intimidating.

The clause does not say that the participants in the assembly must cause disruption in order to trigger this legislation. Therefore, the opponents of an entirely peaceful demonstration could, by threatening disruption, without necessarily having the intention to do so, cause a demonstration to be moved on by the police and even broken up. We can all think of organisations or individuals who would take great delight in such activity.

Some Conservative Members may still insist that that will not happen, but there is another law which says that if it can happen, it will happen. Even the most ardent supporters of the Bill cannot deny that under these proposals it is possible for a demonstration to be inhibited for reasons entirely within the personal prejudices of an individual police officer.

I am not suggesting that police officers will deliberately set out to act in such a way, but the fact that it is in their power to do so is as worrying to many of them as it is to anyone else. Senior police officers have said that the police should not be thrust into the arena of political decision making. Indeed, the Home Secretary said as much. Under the Bill and this clause they will be, or at best, they may be, thrust into that arena. Because so much will depend upon the judgment and discretion of the police, even when demonstrators act reasonably and genuinely fear the consequences set out in the Bill, they will always have the suspicion that the police are biased against them and that they are making decisions of a political nature. That will cause a further deterioration in relations between the police and the public, and that is why some senior police officers are worried and do not want to be put in that position.

The clause is designed to be restrictive. Therefore, in carrying out the law, as it is their duty to do, police officers will be viewed as acting in a restrictive manner. They will be seen to be against the demonstrators and so, by implication, for the subject of the demonstration. That is why it was argued by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) that the Bill should contain some positive measures to balance the negative elements; that the Bill should recognise the rights of individuals to the right to protest and demonstrate, rather than deal entirely with restrictions on such activities.

The Minister has agreed, again after strong argument by Opposition Members, to issue a circular to the police reminding them of the right of people to assemble and demonstrate peacefully, but a golden opportunity has been missed to win back the confidence of the vast majority of people who will be directly affected by the legislation— the opportunity to give something rather than once again be taking more away.

It is perhaps a measure of the distaste which the Government have for those traditional rights that, while they are willing to issue a circular, they could not bring themselves to incorporate in legislation the right to protest. In Committee the Home Secretary said:

"We have no desire to heap powers on the police for some political purpose. The sole test should be the better protection of the public."

I certainly agree with that, but the public whom I represent want protection against burglars, muggers, rapists and vandals. Not one constituent has asked me for protection against a May day rally or students' rag week parade.

Mr. Nicholas Lyell (Mid-Bedfordshire): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, who had the greatest possible success with his amendments in Committee, which is no doubt why he is proposing this amendment. But should not the public who wish to go to work at least have protection from those who mob around the gates in that the police can ask them to stand back? All right, they may demonstrate, but the man who does not wish to be stopped, even by menaces, should be able to walk through to work. Does the hon. Gentleman not accept that in the case of Mr. Justice Scott, to which he referred, some 50 people sought, by much more than glowering, to try to intimidate people from exercising their lawful rights?

Mr. Clelland: The hon. and learned Gentleman ignores the fact that the police already have considerable powers to make way for people going to work, as was done during the miners' strike. This is an additional power which is designed to restrict not only that activity but some other peaceful activities, as I have described. I am sure that we shall see examples of that as time goes on. This further restriction is an infringement of individual liberties and that is why we shall oppose the clause.

What are we to read into the Home Secretary's words? They reveal to me that the right hon. Gentleman identifies three groups of people—the police, the public and the demonstrators. The job of the police, as he sees it, is to protect the public against the demonstrators. This was confirmed, to my mind at least, when he went on to say:

"I think that we all agree that a balance must be struck between the rights of those who organise and attend assemblies and the rights of other people who are going about their lawful occasions." — [Official Report, Standing Committee G, 11 March 1986; c. 729-30.]

I could not help noticing that the word "lawful" is used of one group but not of the other. It may be a bit Freudian of me, but the right hon. Gentleman's words reveal to me a bias, perhaps subconscious, against those who wish to demonstrate. I must not, however, be too disparaging. The decision to issue the circular is welcome and will, no doubt, have an influence over the practical operation of the proposals, if enacted.

In the Government's whole approach to this matter, we perceive a desire to curtail the freedom of groups and individuals to protest and to dissent. While the amendments which have been accepted have gone some way towards tempering the original proposals, the clause remains too restrictive, potentially too damaging to police-public relations, and too intolerant of traditional rights and liberties. It is good news for Rupert Murdoch, but it threatens to weaken even further the position of those who find themselves in conflict with the rich and powerful.

We spent about 80 hours in Committee on this Bill. When we spend that much time discussing how we may correct the social conditions which have led to so much crime and unrest in our country over the past seven years, that will be when the House really begins to tackle the problem of public order.

Mr. Hind: If this clause is removed from the Bill, we may as well not have a Public Order Bill at all. Nobody who realises the problems of public order today and who is responsible for organising demonstrations will doubt that this Bill will affect in any way the control and administration of demonstrations and processions that are properly organised and responsibly carried out. Those organisers have nothing to fear. What this clause strikes at is the problem outside the print works in Warrington and Wapping, outside Orgreave coke works, outside Nottingham pits. Those are the problems that the public look to us to solve, and this is one of the ways in which we do it.

If we vote against this clause, we fail in our duty to the public — and they are not expecting us to do that tonight. I ask that the amendment be rejected.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Clause 14 demonstrates not only the Government's failure to understand what is required in the situations with which they are attempting to deal but, far more fundamental and disturbing, the Government's continued failure to recognise their international obligations as regards the right of peaceful assembly.

This is a failure not only of the present Government but of successive Governments over many years. It is my view, a view that I urge the House to take, that it is wrong to enact a further series of prohibitions dealing with assemblies without at the same time attempting at long last to enact some positive legislation which gives and defines the right to protest and of peaceful assembly. We tend to assume that, in common with some other countries, we have a right to make peaceful protest, and to assemble to make that protest, but, of course, that is not the case. As Lord Hewart said in the case of Duncan v. Jones:

"English law does not recognise any special right of public meeting for political or other purposes. The right of assembly . . . is nothing more than a view taken by the court of the individual liberty of the subject".

This Government, like all Governments since Lord Hewart spoke those words many years ago, should have brought into domestic law the obligations to which we as a nation have assented in more than one international agreement.

9.45 pm

Pursuant to article 11 of the European Convention on Human Rights, we as a nation have agreed that

"Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and to freedom of association with others", subject to restrictions which, in my view, do not go as far as those in the present clause 14. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights declares that "Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and association."

The United Nations International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights states that

"The Right of Peaceful Assembly shall be recognised."

It is worth bearing in mind, too, the first amendment of the United States constitution which provides that "Congress shall make no law . . . prohibiting . . . the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievance."

The word "right" is repeated again and again in those international declarations. It must be within a framework that includes a clear statement of what our rights are that prohibitions such as those that are contained in clause 14 should be enacted, and then only if they are absolutely necessary.

Mr. Cash: There seems to be something slightly wrong with the hon. and learned Gentleman's argument. All right hon. and hon. Members would subscribe to the idea of peaceful assembly, but clause 14 deals with a completely different situation where a senior police officer reasonably believes that it may result in serious public disorder, et cetera. That is the precise opposite of the hon. and learned Gentleman's case.

Mr. Carlile: The hon. Gentleman is quite wrong. It is the use of the phrase "et cetera" that gives away where he is wrong, because "et cetera" includes the right of a senior police officer to order an assembly to move if he believes that there will be "serious disruption to the life of the community". Quite apart from involving a very subjective judgment or belief, it also involves the police officer in an interpretation of what will be serious disruption to the life of the community. In my constituency in mid-Wales, which is not, on the whole, prone to demonstrations and assemblies, on the day following the American bombing of Libya there were two peaceful assemblies, one in the country town of Welshpool, the other in the country town of Newtown. It was a very unusual occurrence in each of those towns. They were peaceful assemblies and, judging by the newspaper photographs, extremely respectable and respected citizens took part. They assembled to protest against the British Government's error of judgment, as they perceived it, in allowing American F111s to fly from bases in the United Kingdom. [Interruption.] I give way to the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash). I think that he wants to intervene.

Mr. Cash: I intervene briefly only to say that the hon. and learned Gentleman may remember that Welshpool is where Llewelyn died.

Mr. Carlile: If the hon. Gentleman had been a little more straightforward with us, he would have repeated what he said earlier from a sedentary position and I should have asked him to withdraw it.

It would be quite wrong for a police officer to be empowered to tell an assembly like that which, legitimately in my view, is protesting publicly and seeking signatures for a petition, to go into a hall or back street because it happens to be holding up the traffic. On one occasion I saw a demonstration in a village by ladies with prams and pushchairs, who, because a child had been injured the day before in a road traffic accident, were protesting about the lack of a pedestrian crossing. They could have been caught by clause 14 merely because they were holding up the traffic on the main road. It is outrageous for hon. Members to seek to give police officers a discretion which, as the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland) said, will often be severely misunderstood — a discretion to intervene in such assemblies and to try to move them on. Many police officers — indeed, most police officers — are unhappy about the discretion which is invested in them in the clause. That is a discretion which they would be willing to undertake, as opposed to compelled to undertake if this clause is enacted, only if it was set out in a much clearer framework which enabled them to know what the rights of the public are, not just giving them a discretionary slate of prohibitions.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: On what authority does the hon. and learned Gentleman say that most police officers are opposed to this provision?

Mr. Carlile: The hon. Gentleman talks to some police officers, just as I talk to some police officers. From the conversations that I have had with police officers—not union officials but ordinary bobbies—I understand that they are unhappy about this provision. The hon. Gentleman appears to have a slightly different opinion. No doubt we shall hear from him in due course.

The clause as it stands imposes no duty on the police to recognise that the purpose of an assembly should be taken into account. It does not require the police to consider, for example, whether the purpose of an assembly relates to the affairs of the community, such as the pedestrian crossing protest to which I referred. It gives what some regard—perhaps it is slightly overstating the case—as draconian powers to the police. It gives them the ability to say, on the widest grounds of alleged "disruption", that a meeting must take place elsewhere.

The clause as it appears in this Bill is outside what would be its proper context. Of course, if one set out in positive form the right of peaceful assembly—I and my colleagues would say that it should be, as part of the European Convention on Human Rights, incorporated in our domestic law—one would be entitled under article 11(2) of the convention to set out a lawful series of prohibitions within the terms of the convention. That is the proper context for provisions of this general nature. This Bill is not.

Mr. Lyell: I speak in strong support of the clause as an important part of the Public Order Bill. I was not surprised that it was opposed by the Labour party, but I was interested that the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlisle), speaking on behalf of the Liberal party, should also oppose it. If one considers the major public disorder that can be caused not only by the enormous demonstrations which we saw at Orgreave, Wapping or Warrington, but the way in which ruffians can describe themselves as a peace convoy and descend on a whole community, the way in which the villagers of Molesworth can be completely swamped by people, albeit most of them thoroughly sincere, the way that militant animal rights protestors can sometimes descend on farms and homesteads, the way in which the "Stop the City" campaign or a major demonstration on Oxford street can bring the life of a community into serious disruption, is it unreasonable for the police to have powers, when they fear serious disruption to the life of the community, serious public disorder or serious damage to property, to say, "Stand back. Move on. Demonstrate, but go to some more suitable place"? That is not preventing peaceful demonstration but preventing what should be a peaceful demonstration from turning into a riot or a rowdy mob, which is the denial rather than the protection of liberty. That is the essence of the clause and why, reasonably interpreted, as it will be, and checked by the courts, as it can be, it is central and important to the Bill and should be supported.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: It should be said that the police service was not happy at the task that it had to undertake last year during the miners' strike. The police found the duties that fell upon them distasteful, damaging to their relations with the community and a heavy burden on them individually. They nevertheless carried out their duties effectively. In no way did they allow the distinction between their duties under the criminal law to be confused with the Government's trade union legislation, which is an entirely separate matter.

After the scenes that we all saw on television and many of which I saw personally, it would be outrageous if a Bill which purported to deal with public order did not contain a clause such as this. I appreciate the arguments advanced by the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland). I congratulate him on his appearance at the Dispatch Box and on his contribution to the Committee. I hope that he will accept, however, that, taking account of the problems confronted by the police, and which the public observed, it would be nothing less than a dereliction of duty if the House failed to tackle the problem of serious disruption.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I join my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) in congratulating the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland) on speaking from the Dispatch Box so soon after arriving in the House. I am sure that he has deserved that promotion, to say nothing of his contribution to the Standing Committee. Although his speech might have been excellent in rhetorical content and in terms of mastery of brief, I cannot share much joy or rapture at it because he elected to argue that we should have deleted clause 14.

At least the hon. Member was at the Committee when we last debated the inclusion of clause 14. He was present with three other Labour Members when the Committee decided, by four votes to 10, that the clause, as amended, should stand part of the Bill. I make that observation because no vote was cast by the representative of the Social Democratic party/Liberal alliance, who was absent then, as he often was. The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) tried to make good that omission in his speech tonight. He does himself no credit when he suggests that the clause has no place in a public order Bill. It is essential that there are changes in the public order law governing static assemblies.

I remind the hon. and learned Member, because he was not a member of the Committee, that, in the Metropolitan police district, of the incidents of severe public disorder, eight involved processions, three involved meetings and six involved assemblies. Since 1980 we have witnessed serious disturbances on the picket lines during the miners' dispute, at Warrington during an industrial dispute and now at Wapping. Those are examples of serious disorders resulting from static assemblies. I have to remind the House in firm tones that the requirement to trigger conditions imposed on assemblies——

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Public Order Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Prisons

10 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hurd): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the situation in the prisons. There have been a number of serious developments during the course of the evening. At Northeye prison near Bexhill-on-Sea, prisoners this evening set fire to an office, the kitchen, the library and some other wooden structure. There have been no reported casualties. The staff on duty were obliged to withdraw to the gates for their own safety and some prisoners went on the rampage. Parts of the prison have been burnt out. The governor established a command post in the officers' club and, on my latest information, it is still unsafe for the fire brigade to enter the premises.

Off-duty staff have returned to the prison indicating that they are anxious to help restore the situation, irrespective of the present industrial action. The police are at the perimeter of the prison, although it appears that some prisoners have escaped. Some 60 prisoners at Lewes prison in Sussex are out of their cells in one wing and probably seven are on the roof.

In Bristol prison there is a serious situation. Prisoners have broken out of their cells. The governor has felt obliged to call in the police in order to maintain control of the prison. There are reports of minor trouble at three other prisons.

Hon. Members: Resign.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): This is a very serious statement. I make it clear right away that we shall expect another statement from the Home Secretary tomorrow afternoon and, if the situation is not in hand by them, we shall expect the Government to bring about another debate right away. If the Government do not do that, we shall be seeking your agreement for such a debate, Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order No. 10.

This is a very grave situation and it is right that the Home Secretary has given this statement this evening. It is on the record that we warned the Government—[Interruption.]—we warned the Government as recently as yesterday about the delicate and dangerous nature of this crisis, and we spoke of the nation's prisons as a tinder box. Yesterday, the Home Secretary saw fit to dismiss the warnings that we gave. We now face a position the consequences of which cannot be calculated or forecast. The decline of law and order has spread to the prisons themselves.

Yesterday I drew attention to the contingency plans for this dispute at the Association of Chief Police Officers. The Home Secretary responded by saying that it was right that there should be contingency plans. However, Mr. Jarman of the executive of the Prison Officers' Association said this evening that at Northeye prison contingency plans were not brought into operation. Can the Home Secretary confirm that, and can he explain it?

Before there are further disturbing developments, I appeal to the Home Secretary to abandon the preconditions for talks that he laid down yesterday. [AN HON. MEMBER: "That's right—give in to anarchy."] Give in to anarchy? The anarchy has been created by the intransigence of the Home Secretary—anarchy which I warned the Home Secretary about yesterday and which the Home Secretary rejected with disdain.

The prison officers at Northeye prison this evening have shown their sense of duty by returning to duty, to try to remedy the situation despite the dispute. Let the Home Secretary respond in the same spirit by accepting the offer of the Prison Officers Association, to suspend industrial action while talks take place. That would be the proper response in this dangerous situation. [AN HON. MEMBER : "It is called blackmail".] This dispute must be solved quickly. Let action be taken now to bring that about, or the responsibility will rest plainly with the Home Secretary.

Mr. Hurd: The only factual question that the right hon. Gentleman asked me was about the Sussex police. As I said in my statement, they have been in action in support of the prison authorities at Northeye through the evening, so their role in the matter has already proved extremely helpful. I think that the House will forgive me if I do not follow the right hon. Gentleman tonight into the rigmarole of contentious statements with which he finished.

My information is incomplete, but I thought it right to come to the House and say what I knew without embroidery and without any allocation of responsibility. There will and must be an opportunity to discuss these matters. It will be necessary for me to report again to the House tomorrow afternoon. I rejected no warnings, and I yield to no one in my desire, as I made clear yesterday, to bring this unnecessary dispute to an end at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Charles Wardle (Bexhill and Battle): Will my right hon. Friend urge the leaders of the Prison Officers Association to follow the example set this evening by their members at Northeye, who were off duty and who all came in to see what they could do to help in this difficult situation? When it is under control, will my right hon. Friend immediately instigate an inquiry, bearing in mind the considerable anxiety that will be felt in the Bexhill community? Will he bear it in mind that for the past two years, concern has been expressed about staffing ratios at Northeye? In view of what has happened, will he include that aspect in the inquiry?

Mr. Hurd: I agree with my hon. Friend, and join him in the tribute that he paid. The format of the inquiry into these events, which have been not just at one prison, is one of the things that I shall consider swiftly, as well as its scope.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): In commending the Home Secretary on coming to the House so promptly to make his statement, may I ask him, when he comes to the House again tomorrow, to explain why the Government have not heeded warnings given by the noble Lord Whitelaw when he was Home Secretary some five years ago about the dangerous situation that was being created by overcrowding in the prisons? Will he tell the House tomorrow why the Government did not take action to resolve the manning issues giving rise to the present dispute long ago? Will he confirm tomorrow that it is now recognised that the time has come for the dispute to be settled, and settled quickly on the basis of discussions without any preconditions on either side?

Mr. Hurd: My noble Friend not only realised the dangers of overcrowding but acted to prevent and cure them. That was the origin of the prison building programme that is now under way. I agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman that the sooner this dispute is brought to an end, the better. I believe that the offer that I made on 22 April provides a basis for a fair resolution of the dispute.

Mr. Tim Rathbone (Lewes): Will my right hon. Friend accept praise from this side of the House for coming so quickly to the House, making a straightforward, honest statement, and giving a commitment to return tomorrow to elaborate on it? Will he also accept that there seems to be little link in Lewes between the prison officers' dispute and the illegal actions taken by the prisoners, which are all the more sad because of the recategorisation of many of the prisoners and the reorganisation of the regimes and of the staffing to meet those new regimes there? Therefore, when he institutes an inquiry, as I am sure he will, will my right hon. Friend please bring it clearly to the notice of the officers and everybody else concerned that this seems to be an illegal uprising which should be treated as such and no more?

Mr. Hurd: I thank my hon. Friend for his first remarks. I am aware, as he is, of the excellent work which has been done over the years at Lewes prison.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): In the face of this further breakdown in law and order and this dangerous state of affairs, may I say from past experience that in no way should any hon. Member support insurrection, arson and what has just gone on? My party does not do that. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Rees: But we are not prepared to take this stuff about the Conservative party being the only party concerned about law and order. The House is concerned, and we support the Home Secretary. But tonight he should call the POA into his office and should say, "Suspend your action. Come back in the morning and talk." Otherwise, the breakdown in law and order will become worse, and no amount of Saatchi and Saatchi words will deal with it.

Mr. Hurd: I am not dealing with the matter with Saatchi and Saatchi words, and I hope that the House will not do so either. My information is as yet incomplete, so tonight I do not want to enter much further into the details of what has occurred, or into the right steps to be taken in future. Tomorrow there will certainly be an opportunity to do that, but tonight I would rather not say things which in the light of fuller information may look odd or foolish.

Mr. Nicholas Lyell (Mid-Bedfordshire): Although I congratulate those prison officers who have rallied round, is it not the case that the average earnings of a prison officer are £15,000 a year, of which some 30 per cent. is overtime? Is the country not entitled to ask that such officers should be prepared to negotiate without preconditions?

Mr. Hurd: I confirm that figure.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the House that we are in the middle of debate on an important Bill, and that the statement concerns insurrections in three prisons, not the general position.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): When was the last occasion that the prison officers of this country were in such bitter conflict with the Government of the day?

Mr. Hurd: There has been a history of discussion, disturbance and conflict. The House will remember the dispute five or six years ago. However, that is not relevant to the immediate problem before us, which is how to resolve the present position.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the fact that the governor of Bristol prison has had to call in the police will inevitably lead to a disastrous decline in morale in that prison, whatever the outcome of the dispute? I hope that my right hon. Friend will encourage the governor of the prison to look not only to the POA but to individual members of staff, who may well hold different views, inresolving the dispute. Does he agree that the most immediate action necessary to ensure that Bristol prison once again works as a prison is to re-establish the morale that has clearly broken down?

Mr. Hurd: We need first to re-establish control in the prisons. After that, the question of morale becomes very important.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): I know prison officers well, because there are many of them in my constituency, which has one of the biggest prisons in the country. Does not the Home Secretary agree that they play an important role in maintaining law and order, and are dedicated to doing their job in the interest of the community as a whole? Should not the Home Secretary and the Government listen to what they say? They are on the spot, and have full responsibility for looking after the prisoners. Over the years, particularly in the past few years, they have warned that the situation was becoming critical. Is it not time that the Government decided to begin serious discussions with them instead of adopting the rather arrogant attitude that some Ministers have taken on the radio? Will the Government conduct their discussions properly so that a settlement can be reached and the problem can be solved as quickly as possible?

Mr. Hurd: I have twice had serious discussions with the POA. I agree about the importance of the work that prison officers do.

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow): I am sure that my right hon. Friend will agree that the vast majority of prison officers are honourable and decent men and women who are deeply shocked by what has happened this evening. I suspect that they will be utterly horrified to learn of the Opposition's cynical manipulation of events for party political reasons.

Mr. Hurd: The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) should not have leapt into his usual act without being in full possession of the facts.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): Whether the Home Secretary likes it or not, he is the Minister responsible. When something for which he is responsible goes wrong, we are entitled to question and criticise him, if that criticism is justified. Given all that the Prime Minister, the Home Secretary and their colleagues have said over the years about law and order, did he ever think that he would be standing at the Dispatch Box at 10 pm on a Wednesday night to tell the people of this country that the prisons are on fire and the prisoners are running riot? What sort of law and order society are the Government trying to cultivate?

Mr. Hurd: Of course I accept that I am the Minister responsible. If I did not accept that, I would not be standing here or volunteering a statement. If this debate is to do any of us any credit, its level must rise above that of rhetorical questions.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): Does my right hon. Friend agree that those who are faced with the difficult task of restoring order in the prisons will not thank any hon. Member for making their task more difficult by stoking up the emotions? [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: In so far as the police become involved, will my right hon. Friend ensure that they have all the necessary resources of mutual aid if that becomes necessary? Would not the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) have done better to appeal to that small minority of prison officers who are taking industrial action to go back and do their work quickly?

Mr. Hurd: I agree with my hon. Friend. I am in touch with the Sussex police about mutual aid.

Mr. Robert Kilroy-Silk (Knowsley, North): While in no way wishing to endorse the policies, some of the working practices or actions of the POA, is it not true that if the Home Secretary and some of his immediate predecessors had heeded the sensible and serious proposals put forward for some years by hon. Members on both sides of the House and by members of the public for a substantial reducion in the prison population without endangering the public, we would not be in such a dangerous position? Inmates, staff and the public are all in danger. In that sense at least, are not the Home Secretary and the Government fully culpable for the crisis that now exists?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman knows a great deal about the subject and has consistently advanced the view that, in some way which is not clearly specified, we should prevent the courts from sending to prison people whom they think should be sent there. [Interruption.] That is a fair summary of the hon. Gentleman's clearly held and consistently expressed view. I understand the reasoning behind it, as he has expressed his view clearly, but I do not think that that is a possible course.

Mr. Mark Carlisle (Warrington, South): To the extent that the present problems are created by overcrowding in our prisons, does my right hon. Friend agree that the answer is not to change our penal policy but to accept that much of the responsibility falls on the Opposition because of their cut in the prison building programme?

Mr. Hurd: The fact is that there was no prison building programme when the Conservative party came to power. My predecessor before last instituted a programme which has been carried on steadily ever since.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): Does not the gravity of the situation demonstrate all too clearly how dangerous and foolish it was for the Government to break off negotiations this weekend in the face of an offer from the Prison Officers Association to suspend its action?

Mr. Hurd: That offer was not honoured. The industrial action continued. I gave an account of those proceedings to the House yesterday. I believe that the stance I took at that time was reasonable.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Home Secretary said that he would make a further statement tomorrow. I shall endeavour tomorrow to call those hon. Members who rose this evening but were not called.

Public Order Bill

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

10.22 pm

Mr. Giles Shaw: In responding to the debate initiated by the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge, I was making the point that, in the Metropolitan police district, static assemblies and meetings contributed substantially to the severe public disorders between 1974 and 1980. I deduce from that that the House would be extremely foolish to accept the advice of the Opposition that clause 14 should be deleted from the Bill.

I remind the House that, in extending to assemblies the proposals contained in the 1936 Act, the Government did not act in a fit of pique or a sudden thirst for additional powers. We acted on the advice of the Select Committee on Home Affairs. We acted with care and had discussions. We acted in a way that was consistent with the Government's purposes without ensuring that an advance notice requirement in respect of assemblies should be undertaken, but that a power to ban should not.

The police already maintain a presence at most demonstrations or pickets. They do so to fulfil their paramount duty in maintaining the Queen's peace. Clause 14 will not require the deployment of more officers or the wasteful use of police resources which might be more profitably employed in fighting crime. It will give the police effective powers to prevent crime by preventing disorder.

The rights to assemble, to picket and to demonstrate are not absolute rights. They should never be an excuse for intimidation or disorder. Every citizen has a right to live his life in peace and the right to protection under the law.

I said in Committee and to the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge, who referred to it in his opening address, that I would advise police officers, in the circular on the Bills provisions, that they should bear in mind the traditional rights of protest and the traditional freedom of assembly which have been so widely observed for many years when they interpret their obligations under the provisions of clause 14. I should like to place that undertaking which I gave in Committee on the record.

In part answer to the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery, I must say that there will be, although not in the statute, a clear expression of the rights to protest which people have traditionally enjoyed conveyed to officers as part of the context in which they execute their duties.

Clause 14 confers no power to ban assemblies. That is a most important point for the House to recognise. The Clause contains powers to enable major mischiefs to be avoided — to avoid serious public disorder, serious damage to property, serious disruption to the life of the community and intimidation of individuals. Do the Opposition seriously believe that the civil liberties of pickets and the right to demonstrate include the right to cause such evils? Surely not. Do they believe that the police should have powers to prevent these evils? Surely they do. Or is the Opposition's new-found, late interest in the problems of crime and of law and order, which is of such concern to the people we serve, a vote-catching operation, carefully timed for individual elections?

The Government believe that the merits of the clause and the bankruptcy of the Opposition's argument are in complete contrast. The Government believe in a balance between the right to assemble and the right of the individual to go about his business in peace, and so do the British people. They will take note of the Opposition's claim that to question the rights of a picket to intimidate or cause disorder is authoritarianism, and they will support our attempts to provide additional protection for the individual citizen from the bully boys and the thugs on the picket lines or elsewhere. I commend the clause. It should remain in the Bill as a cardinal principle of public order.

Mr. Clelland: I remind the Minister that we have seen more lawlessness and disorder under this Government than under any other Government in living memory. The clause does not seek to improve law and order. It will not prevent one riot or many of the problems to which the Minister drew attention. It will restrict the individual liberty and freedoms of people who want to protest against the type of policies pursued by the Government. We shall vote against the clause.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Amendments made: No. 43, in page 10, line 25 leave out 'any conditions which prescribe' and insert 'such conditions as to'.

Clause 16

INTERPRETATION

Mr. Giles Shaw: I beg to move amendment No. 47 in page 11, leave out line 26 and insert 'In this Part'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to consider also the following: Amendment No. 49, in page 11, line 32, leave out 'a public' and insert 'any'.

Government amendments Nos. 50 and 52.

Mr. Shaw: I should like to deal briefly with the Government amendments before considering amendment No. 49. Government amendments Nos. 50 and 52 bring the definition of "Public place" in clause 16 into line with the wording of section 1(1)(a) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. The other amendment makes minor drafting changes.

Mr. Lyell: I am grateful for the opportunity to speak to amendment No. 49 in my name and the names of my hon. Friends.

The purpose of the amendment is to extend the provisions of the Bill from public places as defined in the Bill to any place which is open to the air. The sound reasons for doing that become immediately apparent. We agreed when we discussed the previous clause, and the House decided, that it would be a valuable power for the police to be able to get a demonstration likely to cause serious public disorder, serious damage to property, serious disruption to the life of the community or intimidation to people, to move to a more suitable location, or to stand back from the gates of the work place where the demonstration may have arisen, or to stop blocking the highway or snarling up the centre of the community in which it was taking place. Unfortunately, as the clause and the Bill are drafted, that applies only to what is a public place within the definition of the Bill. In a great many communities, public places and private land are almost inextricably inter-mixed. Therefore, the good effects of the clause could be made unworkable.

I should like to explain that in relation to the problems that arise in rural communities. These problems can be categorised as those involving the so-called "Peace Convoy"; and the problems caused by the large numbers of albeit sincere people who descend on communities like Greenham common and Molesworth. There are also problems involving animal protesters, some of whom are sincere and who arrive in large numbers but who are all too often accompanied by militant animal rights protesters who might invade a factory farm. There are also problems with the large demonstrations of the type witnessed at Orgrave or Wapping, involving industrial disputes.

It is important that the police should have effective powers, and not powers the ambit of which depends on whether the public assembly takes place on a highway or in a public place, which is defined in the Bill as land to which the public have access either on payment or by express or implied permission. The powers of the police must not be frustrated by the public being allowed to move on to what becomes the Tom Tiddler's ground of private land.

I can illustrate the point by citing Molesworth or some factory farm. For example, a large number of people may have appeared to demonstrate in a narrow country lane near to Molesworth. These people may have snarled up the entrance to the village or completely swamped the local community, who all too often regard themselves as second-class citizens in their own homes. The police may want the demonstrators to move to the village green or to an open space which is more suitable for the demonstration, but some of the demonstrators may decide, because they know the law—and that is a good thing—to cross a fence into a farmer's field. As soon as they do that, the excellent power provided by clause 14 immediately disappears, as the assembly ceases to be in a public place in the context of the Bill.

Let us consider the case of a large number of demonstrators arriving at a factory farm—say a broiler house farm—demonstrating against the treatment of the chickens that we eat in such large numbers. The demonstrators may get on to the farmyard, and some of them who are of violent intent will use the presence of the others to provide cover enabling them to commit criminal damage, or to terrorise the people on the farm. One of the examples given by Ministers of the good sense of the clause is that the police will be able to tell the demonstrators to stand back by the farm gate if the demonstration is blocking the road. However, as soon as the people get on to the farmyard, or the farmer's land around the buildings, the powers under the clause disappear, and the ability of the police to make good use of these preventive powers has gone.

The powers under the clause can be considered in the wider context of the serious problems of the peace convoys and of major, and perhaps hippy-type, demonstrations which I know are a matter of great interest to many of my hon. Friends, who may catch your eye in this short debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I see my hon. Friends the Members for Salisbury (Mr. Key), for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory), whose constituency includes Glastonbury, and for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley), who is with me on this clause, and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence).

The peace convoy, which has little or nothing to do with peace, tends to descend on a whole community—in the case of Salisbury, in several hundreds — and completely disrupt the life of the area. Immediately round Stonehenge, to which the public have access as of right or invitation, these powers will apply, but as soon as large groups spill over on to farm land or private land, the powers of the police to say, "Move on", or, "Stand back" disappear.

This is illogical in the context of the Bill, because the other useful powers of this valuable Bill—whether the major powers on riot, unlawful assembly and affray under clauses 1, 2 and 3, or the other powers under clauses 4 and 5, on what used to be called conduct likely to cause a breach of the peace, and is now conduct likely to cause violence and disorderly conduct—apply both to public and private land regardless, and rightly so. There is no logical distinction that should prevent these prophylactic powers from also so applying. The object of the powers under clause 14 is to be able to say to the demonstrators in number, "Stand back" and to prevent a clash from happening in the first place. Although it would not solve the peace convoy or the Molesworth problems, that is a valuable power in the hands of the police.

I thank the Association of Chief Police Officers for its helpful discussions, but I disagree with its objections to this extension. The police are anxious that they should not become the bailiffs of every private landlord, a point with which I wholly agree, but there is no real danger that they will. The powers in clause 14 are wholly discretionary, at the instance of the senior police officer present, and can only be exercised, quite rightly, in the circumstances of serious disruption of the community, serious public disorder or serious damage to property. I can say with confidence that there would be no question of the operational decision of a senior police officer as to whether or not to use such powers being capable of being challenged by mandamus in the High Court. There is no question of the courts forcing a police officer to use his powers in a particular instance, and I can say that with some confidence as a matter of the law.

Nor do I believe that there is any danger of chief constables being browbeaten into using these powers. I have the highest respect for the chief constables with whom I have had the privilege of working as a Member of Parliament, and I have not found them to be men who were likely to be browbeaten by any landowner or farmer if they believed that the course of action which they were invited to take was unwise. They are, on the contrary, strong and robust men, as we would expect them to be, and they are well capable of protecting themselves against undue pressure.

I test this valuable power against what happened at Orgreave. Let us suppose that there is a large crowd of demonstrators, most of whom wish to be peaceful, but some of whom might be militant and might be jostling and pushing, and the police can see that there is likely to be major turmoil outside the gates of a workplace, preventing those who, in the normal life of the community, wish to pass and repass to go to work, from doing so. If, as I believe happened at Orgreave, and certainly happens at other work premises, the road that leads to the gate passes through private land as opposed to a public place, the prophylactic powers of the police to say, "Stand back", would not apply, and they would have to fall back on common law powers or into that difficult area where sometimes the police are forced to stretch their powers, albeit with the right motives, to achieve the right solution.

It is wrong to put the police into that position. The extension of the powers to public and private land without distinction, simply on the basis that they are properly to be used for public order purposes, would be the wiser way to proceed, and I commend that route to my right hon. and hon. Friends. I recognise that it may not be easy to deal with the amendment tonight, but I ask them to discuss the matter further before the Bill concludes its passage in another place.

Mr. Chris Smith: I oppose the hon. and learned Gentleman's amendment and urge the Minister not to accept it too readily. Although I appreciate the hon. and learned Gentleman's motives, the effect of his amendment would be to create a criminal offence of trespass in the open air for persons entering private land for purposes completely other than those which he mentioned when introducing the amendment. My anxiety relates to groups of people out for a country walk, who could be caught under the clause if the amendment were accepted. I know that that is not the hon. and learned Gentleman's intention, but it would undoubtedly be a potential effect of the clause if the amendment was accepted. I am worried that legitimate purposes of open-air recreation might be endangered if the clause was amended.

The anxiety of many hon. Members, especially Conservative Members, about what happened with the so-called peace convoy last year—the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) is in the chamber—is beginning to resurface as we approach consideration of what might happen this year. With or without the Bill and the amendment, unless sensible and practical discussions continue about what is likely to occur when the convoy attempts to hold a festival at Stonehenge, I fear that there is likely to be trouble. That is something that we would all wish to avoid.

The hon. and learned Gentleman's amendment would run the risk of turning the police into the patrolling bailiffs of privately owned land. That is not something that Opposition Members wish to see.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): This amendment, so eloquently moved by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell), which I support, addresses itself to the false distinction between public and private land for the purposes of public order. In general, the civil law is powerless to deal with incursions on to private land before they have happened, where there is no event or festival to ban and where no one knows the identity or whereabouts of the potential trespassers. This is deeply unsatisfactory. The landowner, whether public or private, simply has to wait for trespass to occur before being able to act. The number of trespassers can grow by many hundreds in the course of a day, so, however speedy the lawyers or the courts, the problem by then has become severe, something that we all wish to avoid.

Although the provisions of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 which came into force on 1 January this year will make any mass invasion of, for instance, my constituency by the peace convoy and others quite different from last year, this Bill, unless it is amended, will do little to remedy the defects in the law which make flaming June such a misery for so many in south Wiltshire. It will, however, I suspect, help with the problem of illegal hare coursing.

For example, the National Trust and English Heritage and most local farmers will seek injunctions in the High Court, banning the so-called Stonehenge free festival. An injunction is a fine remedy, but one must be able to identify the trespasser in advance, be able to serve him with proceedings and have enough evidence that he intends to trespass. Furthermore, summary possession procedure — that is, order 113 — is slow and cumbersome, and will always suffer from the disadvantage that plaintiffs are usually too late to prevent damage and to stop large numbers arriving, as at the white horse in the neighbouring constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters).

Also the procedure takes at least a week. It is very expensive. It allows defendants to take advantage of their wrongful possession by dreaming up technical points of law. And, of course, judges are ever vigilant on behalf of unrepresented defendants, many of whom are intelligent and well educated but whose case has no legal merit whatever. The judge is assiduous to make sure that the landowner has dotted the i's and crossed the t's, to the extent that the lawful owners of the land are frustrated.

[Mr. Robert Key]

This means that in too many cases unmeritorious and unwelcome squatters can stay beyond any reasonable time, and trade on it. In short, the law is not simply an ass, it is ridden on by such people, who plan their activities accordingly.

This amendment also addresses itself to a consequence of the false distinction between public and private land, the problem of criminal trespass, referred to by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith). The whole matter was lengthily debated by the Law Commission and the Law Reform Committee before the passing of the Criminal Law Act 1977. Section 7 of the Act brings residential premises into the ambit of the criminal offence but omits non-residential premises. If trespass were a criminal offence, the concept of deterrence would be introduced.

It could be fairly argued that Stonehenge, the white horse, Savernake and all squatting activities of a similar kind in recent years demonstrate how unfortunate it was that in 1977 Parliament, against the Law Commission's recommendations, decided to exclude non-residential premises from section 7.

The amendment has deterrence value. The whole country is anxious to avoid scenes such as those witnessed at Cholderton near Stonehenge last year when about 500 hippies, determined to break a High Court injunction, chose to confront the police and precipitated the much-reported fight that led to mass arrests. We all wish to avoid a repetition of such scenes. By amending the clause to include an assembly in any place, whether publicly owned or privately owned, we shall remove a contentious distinction that perpetuates the notion that public order should be different on opposite sides of the same fence.

The Bill is about preventing violent clashes and violent behaviour and about coping with disorders, but there is also an important moral dimension to it, which I draw to the attention of the House in support of the amendment. Without the amendment, those wishing to hold an assembly in a private place will continue to exert some kind of moral blackmail over those who wish to enjoy their own land in peace. This will focus, in my constituency, on Stonehenge. However, the Bishop of Salisbury, Bishop John Baker, a former chaplain to Mr. Speaker and best known, perhaps, for his moral judgments on nuclear issues, said, with reference to the so-called Stonehenge free festival and the mass trespass by those assembled there:

"The experience of years proved that the event was a major social and human evil. The great majority of people living in nearby communities hated the event, and wish it to cease. The Church cannot and must not support such an event in any way . . . it does not. We do support the local communities in their desire to go about their lives in peace. We do support landowners, both private and corporate, in their legal right to refuse the use of their land, and in their moral right not to be pressured into conceding it. We do support the police in their duty to uphold the law of the country. The way to prevent violence and confrontation this summer is for those who are thinking of defying that law to stay away . . . They have no encouragement of any kind from our Church to do otherwise."

I support the amendment, which would contribute to the peace of our community.

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): I shall be brief, because my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell) and my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) have already gone over the course. The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) said that one of the grounds upon which he would object to the amendment was that it could catch those people who went out for a country walk. Before any offence would be committed under clause 14, the police officer must reasonably believe that what is happening may result in serious public disorder, or serious damage to property, et cetera. I do not believe for one moment that by blurring the distinction between public and private property, as the amendment tries to do, we should catch those people who go out for a country walk.

Mr. Chris Smith: The hon. Gentleman conveniently omitted from his list of reasonable grounds that a police officer might have the crucial phrase

"serious disruption to the life of the community."

That is the contentious point, as we saw in our debate on the clause relating to assemblies, and it might well form a point of contention between a group of people with legitimate open air interests and a landowner.

Mr. Alexander: I did not refer to those words, because I was absolutely certain that no couple who went out for a private walk could possibly come within the hon. Gentleman's description.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister of State will accept the amendment. If it is not accepted, there will be a loophole in the law and we shall do a disservice to those innocent people whose lives over so many years have been disrupted by protesters and disrupters who care nothing for other people's property. Those innocent people expect this Bill to protect them. As it stands, all it does is to provide a loophole for sophisticated protesters who know what they are doing, and it leads the police to pass by on the other side. I urge seriously a change of heart on this amendment.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): I also would like to bring home to Home Office Ministers just how strongly we feel about this issue in the countryside. The improved definition offered by amendment No. 49 would be beneficial and strengthen the arm of the law in maintaining the peace and quiet that we expect. We believe in harmony in the countryside, not confrontation.

I am a member of the Nature Conservancy Council, so it is obvious that I am keen on conservation and the use of the countryside for formal and informal recreation. It is time that we tried to limit the disruption which sometimes occurs. The militant demonstrator and other protestor is quite out of place in the countryside, and the sooner that there is more discipline so that everyone can enjoy the countryside, the better. This small but important amendment would be a major step in the right direction.

The amendment would be especially helpful to some farms that have been attacked by those who want to release animals. Sometimes, they are foolish enough to release mink, which cause infinitely more damage and cruelty to other animals than they suffer in farms. Such people's objectives are ill thought out. The National Farmers Union and the Country Landowners Association are anxious that we should strengthen the law in the interests of their members.

Farmers, whether they be owner-occupiers or tenants, and landlords would feel that they were getting support from a Conservative Government if the Home Office felt able to accept the amendment. I give it my warm support.

Mr. Warren Hawksley (The Wrekin): I support amendment No. 49. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell) covered most of the ground, but my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) mentioned Stonehenge. The peace convoy decided to separate and go north, and it has caused great problems in other parts of the country. I feel sorry for my constituents in Shropshire who have suffered the problems caused by people who have moved into the area, and continue to move from site to site to keep ahead of the landowner, whether it be the National Coal Board or the district council. They seem determined to keep one step ahead of the law.

I hope that the amendment will be accepted. I believe that our constituents expect us to deal with a problem that is causing them great anxiety. They are entitled to peace and quiet at home. They should not be subjected to such noise and disturbance. They are confused, to say the least —they cannot understand why the police, to whom they turn, are powerless.

Is it possible to speed up the procedure of getting orders? One of my parish councils has suggested that registrars might be allowed to deal with such requests. That council, the district council and the development corporation find that it takes a long time to get the necessary orders. Meanwhile, the people concerned have moved to other land. I hope that, if my hon. Friend the Minister cannot accept the amendment, he will at least be able to offer the possibility of registrars issuing orders, so that the problems can be dealt with. If he cannot do that, I shall feel inclined to support the amendment.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): I rise to support the amendment. My constituency includes Glastonbury, which is famous for its Arthurian legends and, like Stonehenge, attracts an annual influx of hippies, itinerants, travellers, whatever one may like to call them. Some of those groups pose a serious threat to public order. I know that I am not alone in this, because similar problems are encountered by my other hon. Friends in Somerset and Avon, especially my hon. Friend the Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Boscawen), who is in his place tonight. He is urgently dealing with a number of constituency cases now.

Those problems are becoming more difficult because of the attitude of the alliance, which is not represented in the Chamber at present. Somerset is temporarily controlled by a Lib-Lab pact, and there is no doubt that the alliance opposition to the Bill is sending entirely the wrong signals to potential troublemakers who are now making their summer plans about whether to visit Somerset and create local disorder.

I am not saying that the majority of visitors are necessarily violent and unwelcome. The majority are peaceful. They may create an annoyance, but it is part of the English tradition to deal with them in a spirit of give and take, live and let live. However, there is a minority of people, who should be dealt with by this clause, who take drugs and drive vehicles which are untaxed and unlicensed. They are not all from the same group; they are certainly not all members of the peace convoy. They go by a number of different names. In my constituency we have had the mutants and the chaotics and a number of other anarchist groups who think that they are outside the law and outside society, except when it comes to drawing social security. That creates local resentment. Those people are prepared to take social security, clothes, food and medicine from society when they need them, but they put very little back into society.

It is when large numbers of that significant minority camp and gather in Somerset that they can be a real threat to the local community. I have witnessed some of the incidents. Hedges can be pulled up for firewood or used as public lavatories, which creates a health hazard, roads and lanes can be blocked, buildings can be vandalised and residents and shopkeepers can be threatened. There is a general feeling among my constituents that the existing powers in the law are inadequate to cope with the growing problem.

We have the law of trespass. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley) pointed out, that can be extremely slow and cumbersome. Many members of these groups know how to circumvent the law and move down the road to different land if faced with a possession order where they are camped. Many of them have access to very good legal advice. Perhaps some of them are lawyers who put on their beads and headbands when they go on holiday, who knows. I know that I have spoken to many of them who are far from being poor and in need of these camps. It is a summer activity and we should have much less sympathy for them than is sometimes shown by the Opposition.

All I want to do is give the police additional reserve powers that could be used if necessary. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell) is right to say that this is not a bailiffs' charter. The police are reluctant to move or evict people unless there is a serious disruption and that may be the basis of their opposition to this amendment.

However, there is a growing problem. The Bill provides an opportunity, perhaps the last opportunity for some years, to respond to this problem. Certainly large numbers of people in the Wells division are looking for a positive response from my hon. Friend the Minister.

Mr. Cash: I wish to endorse most of my hon. Friends' comments. Together we have managed consistently to fight the battle against the peace convoy over a period of months, since the peace convoy came to our respective constituencies. I would like to thank the Home Secretary and the Minister for the courtesy and time they have given to us on a number of occasions and the good advice they have been able to offer. I would also like to mention the Association of Chief Police Officers which has also given its time and has provided advice while we have been discussing this matter. The Country Landowners Association and the National Farmers Union have been equally helpful.

The peace convoy arrived in Staffordshire and caused £85,000 of damage. That was an intolerable incursion. The anxiety and fear that were caused to my constituents, and the damage, dereliction and chaos that those people left behind, were intolerable. I cannot believe that the Labour party can resist this proposal, which would deal effectively with the problem. I would go further and say that, to its credit, Staffordshire county council, which is Labour controlled, did what it could to impress upon

[Mr. Cash]

Labour Members the fact that it wanted their help. The council is not receiving it, so Labour Members should be condemned by their own people.

The lawful enjoyment of rights by all is the essence of proper public order policy. The peace convoy and similar people operate in an environment and in a way that is totally contrary to the reasonable behaviour of ordinary civilised people.

We have to deal with the problem. It is a serious matter. The problem is escalating, and I thoroughly support the Government's efforts to deal with it in the Bill. Clause 14, in conjuction with clause 5 and other provisions, go a long way in dealing with that serious problem.

11.15 pm

Sir Eldon Griffiths: The police have raised some objections to what is proposed. They do not want to criminalise trespass. They do not want to be turned into the surrogate gamekeepers of private landowners. They feel that clause 14 is quite a lot to swallow and that adding this amendment to it would make it even more difficu[illegible] But in this case, I believe that the police are wrong. It is best that I say so plainly.

There is a tendency to think that the public disorder problems are an urban phenomenon. Of course, most of them take place in the big cities, but the fact is that we are in the presence of increasing public disorder problems in the rural areas. My hon. Friends have all mentioned examples in their constituenies. The Committee discussed the matters in detail. In my constituency this summer, when it is proposed to hold the annual Mildenhall air show, there is not the slightest doubt that large numbers of people, peaceniks or others, will gather on private land. They will cause immense problems. There will be great concern among my constituents, and among the supporters of my party, if we say that we have put on the statute book a new Public Order Bill, yet it becomes clear that we have done nothing effective to deal with the problem. If that happens, I have fear that there will be considerable disenchantment with what we have done.

When he replies, my hon. Friend the Minister will fairly say that just as clause 5 as redrafted and agreed to by the House earlier can apply in a number of circumstances, for example in dealing with noise, so too, it can apply in this case. I agree that there is some evidence that it might, but it will be marginal. It will not tackle the problem. It will not prevent large hordes of troublemakers proceeding to occupy private land. It will not help the police get them off without pitched battles. None of us wants that to happen.

Therefore, I urge my hon. Friend, who has been so resaonable and sweet a Minister throughout the Committee and Report, to listen to the views of the House. With the exception of the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), whose arguments I understand, we are in possession of a virtually unanimous request to the Government.

Mr. Key: Does my hon. Friend agree that when we discuss issues of police manpower and police budgets in counties, and when many of the counties about which we are speaking are controlled by a Liberal-SDP faction, it is intolerable that not one alliance Member has been present to debate this particularly important matter?

Sir Eldon Griffiths: Alliance Members are undoubtedly absent proclaiming their commitment to rural policy in west Derbyshire. We also encountered that phenomenon in Committee.

Mr. Alex Carlile: The hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) was most unfair to give that description to the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths). I apologise to the House for my temporary absence, but I can assure the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds, as he should know from reading our Committee proceedings, that my hon. Friend the Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) shares our great interest in the affairs of rural areas. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the problems to which the hon. and learned Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell) eloquently adverted are not only encountered in Shropshire, which the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley) mentioned, but across the Shropshire-Welsh border, and that I share the concern expressed?

Sir Eldon Griffiths: Sometimes we extend the courtesies of the House too far.

My hon. Friend the Minister has heard what has been said. He knows, as I know, the technical problems and the reservations of the police. It remains his job as a Minister to overcome them. I hope that he will take account of what has been said, and one way or another give hon. Members, who have spoken with experience, knowledge and foreboding of the consequences, if we fail to act, the comfort of words that will at least open the door to some action being taken in the other place on what is a genuinely serious problem.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The amendment moved by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell) and supported by my hon. Friends the Members for Newark (Mr. Alexander), for Salisbury (Mr. Key), for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro), for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley), for Stafford (Mr. Cash) and for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) has provided a debate of some significance. I am not a bit surprised at that because in Committee, as the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) knows, my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire gave us a substantial piece of his substantial mind on the issues relating to the law on trespass and the inadequacies of this clause.

All hon. Members, whether in government, on the Back Benches or, I suspect, in Opposition, share the feeling that the problems caused by groups, such as the peace convoy, have brought great distress and misfortune to our rural communities. There is no question but that we wish to find ways and mans of reducing that distress and misfortune.

Dr. Alan Glyn (Windsor): Will my hon. Friend include the actions of Hells Angels, who have been of considerable inconvenience in Windsor, as he knows, and of whom Mrs. McSorley is the victim?

Mr. Shaw: My hon. Friend is right. Other groups, of which Hells Angels are one, cause substantial distress.

In Committee, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary said that such groups were the equivalent of mediaeval brigands. Wherever they have gone, they have shown a blatant disregard for the rights and the peace of the local inhabitants. We may also add to our condemnation of such activity those groups of so-called animal rights protesters who, by trespassing on farm land and engaging in violent and threatening behaviour towards farmers and their families, are of genuine public concern.

In considering in Committee what best we might do, we undertook to have further discussions with the police and other interested parties. I know that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire and other hon. Friends have had similar discussions, which have been referred to this evening. My hon. and learned Friend will be aware that, although chief constables are not unanimous, the views of the Association of Chief Police Officers are such that it is clear that it is not persuaded of the need for an extension of the new powers under clause 14 in the way that my hon. and learned Friend proposes. The police remain of the view that their existing powers to deal with criminal damage and breach of the peace, together with the offences in clauses 1 to 5, should be sufficient to cope with any real mischief that is likely to arise.

I think that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire underestimates the powers that will be available to the police. I remind him that the powers in the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 were not available during the disturbances which occurred with the peace convoy a year ago. Those powers came into force on 1 January.

Under the existing law, under the new offences and wider powers that are proposed in the Bill, and under the PACE powers, the police have power to enter private land and make arrests if there is a breach of the peace. Under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act, they have powers to arrest anyone who has committed an offence if service of a summons is impracticable because of difficulties in establishing name and address. The Act gives the police powers to enter land to prevent serious damage to property. Under the Bill, all the public order offences which the House has been considering tonight will apply to both public and private land. We have deliberately extended the scope of clauses 4 and 5 to private land to catch the sort of behaviour in which peace convoys and other such groups indulge. Once the Bill is in force, anyone on private land who threatens violence or who behaves in a disorderly manner, or who is likely to cause alarm, harassment or distress, will commit an offence under sections 4 or 5, as they will become.

It follows that with this wide range of powers—the police have told us that this will follow—the police should be able to deal with the real mischief, which lies in criminal damage, threatening behaviour and intimidation by those who happen to be trespassers. The only offence that they will not have the power to deal with is simple trespass. The police are most emphatic that they do not want to become involved in the enforcement of private rights. I recognise the overall conclusion of my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds that the police are wrong in the general stance that they have taken, but my hon. Friend recognised that involving the police in a greater extension of services to private landlords might well cause them substantial difficulty.

I think that we all recognise that the complaint of simple trespass remains a matter for the civil law. Equally, I think that we all recognise that the root of the problem facing landowners whose land is invaded by the peace convoy is the slow enforcement process of the civil law. I say to my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin, who raised the matter specifically, that discussions that we have had with colleagues recently have convinced us that we should seek to make representations to my right hon. and noble Friend the Lord Chancellor to ensure that he is fully aware of the strength of feeling on this issue. I remind my hon. Friends that in discussions previously the Country Landowners Association agreed to provide further information of instances where it has found the enforcement of the civil process both slow and inadequate to deal with the offences with which it has been concerned. I hope that it will respond and provide all possible evidence to enable us to discuss with the Lord Chancellor's Department what might be done to speed up and improve the process.

I reassure my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire and my hon. Friends generally that we do not have a closed mind about the adequacy of the law to deal with groups like the peace convoy. All we are saying is that we should not rush into further legislation until the new police powers to which I have referred have been tried and tested. The police believe that the totality of powers available to them will be sufficient. We are not in the business of heaping extra powers on the police, for their own sake. We have been concerned throughout the discussion on the Bill to identify the powers that will be of practical value to the police.

I must take note of the strength of feeling which hon. Members have expressed. I shall discuss the debate's conclusions and the unanimous view expressed by Conservative Members that further action is required in this direction. I shall consider the requests put to me by my hon. Friends, which were summed up by my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds, for further action during the passage of the Bill.

However, I stress that a major change to the law on trespass is not something which we are presently minded to contemplate. We are prepared to consider the views expressed by hon. Members about their constituents' fears and their doubts that the laws we have already enacted and those we are in the process of enacting may not be sufficient. That is a state of mind which my hon. Friends have made very clear. I trust that it is not a state of the law which we can allow to remain for much longer.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 50, in page 11, line 34, leave out 'includes' and insert 'means'.

No. 52, in page 11, leave out lines 37 to 39 and insert—

> (b) any place to which the public or any section of the public has access, on payment or otherwise, as of right or by virtue of express or implied permission.'.—[Mr. Giles Shaw.]

Clause 17

PUBLISHING OR DISTRIBUTING

Amendment made: No. 53, in page 12, line 5, leave out from 'if' to end of line 7 and insert

'—

> (a) he intends by the publication or distribution of the matter to stir up racial hatred, or > (b) having regard to all the circumstances racial hatred is likely to be stirred up as a result of the publication or distribution.'.—[Mr. Giles Shaw.]

Mr. Lawrence: I beg to move amendment No. 55, in page 12, line 7, at end insert—

'(1A) The authority responsible for maintaining any public highway or passageway shall remove any such written matter from the public highway or passageway or the curtilages adjacent thereto within fourteen days of receiving notice of the existence of such matter'.

Clause 17(1) makes it an offence for a person to make a threatening sign, writing or visual representation. I take it—perhaps the Minister will confirm this—that the use of devices such as spray paint and graffiti is threatening, abusive and insulting if the user intends hatred against a racial group. There is no point in making that an offence if the writing remains on the wall. If the person responsible is charged, convicted, fined or sent to prison, but what he wrote on the wall is still there and will be there until the cows come home, we will not have achieved a great deal.

My amendment would place on the local authority responsible for the highway, the passageway, the curtilage, the fence or the wall abutting the highway, the duty to remove the offensive material within 14 days. The suggestion is so eminently sensible that my only surprise is that it is not already in the Bill. I ask my hon. Friends to support me. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will note the strength of that support and acceded to my sensible amendment.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I recognise, and welcome, the suggestion of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) that local authorities should remove graffiti. I think that even he would argue that it would hardly be right to enter a new phase of conferring further statutory duties on local authorities, however admirable his amendment might be. Local authorities already have many statutory duties, and it is not part of our policy to create new ones, unless it is absolutely necessary. I do not see that the imposition of such a duty is a necessity. I hope that all local authorities, as a sensible part of good housing management policy, could be persuaded to take the kind of action that my hon. and learned Friend seeks. If such a duty were imposed, there must be some doubt whether it would be enforceable. I am not minded to ask the House to accept my hon. and learned Friend's amendment, but I understand why he proposed it.

Mr. Soley: The hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) is right. It does not do the Government any credit to say that they are not prepared to impose these extra duties on local authorities. They spend so much time taking away duties and powers from local authorities that it is no wonder that racialist graffiti is left in decaying urban areas. The Government ramble on about law and order policies, but they cannot keep areas, especially inner-city areas, clean and decent places in which people can live and walk. The Government have no right to talk about law and order, even if one ignores the mess that they have made of it generally.

There is a strong case for imposing on local authorities a duty to clear up racialist graffiti, precisely because we know that it is given such a low priority by so many local authorities. The Government have said that part III is an important part of the Bill, and I agree. I have already commented on the Minister's abilities — he has been very good in this respect. The Government give part III a high priority but say that is does not matter if the offending words and phrases remain. Such words and phrases are sufficient reason to bring a person before a court and, in certain circumstances, to send him to prison. The Government say that we need not do anything about it. That is virtually a contradiction.

Why do we take such action against the individuals who write that graffiti if we are not prepared to ensure that it is cleared up when the culprit cannot be found? Are we just to leave the graffiti there to be offensive? The Government have a double standard on law and order. They want all the good things. They go on about law and order being necessary, but take all the action that makes a breakdown in law and order highly likely. This is yet another example in which the Government make no effort to maintain standards in decaying and rundown areas where racialist graffiti is a major problem and in other areas where it offends the many people against whom it is directed. The hon. and learned Member for Burton was right to draw our attention to it.

Mr. Lawrence: Although I reject the intemperate accusations of the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) against the Government's law and order policy, I am grateful to him for his support for my amendment. I am not pleased with my hon. Friend the Minister. He said how sympathetic he was, but talked of how impossible it was to dc anything about the problem.

If the Home Office is not minded to put some pressure on a department somewhere to do something about the problem, nothing will be done. I should like to be able to say that the writing is on the wall if the writing is not taken off the wall by the Government. Some action is necessary. My hon. Friend's answer was not, with the greatest respect, convincing or satisfactory.

Of course I appreciate the difficulties involved in pressing the amendment, but I should like my hon. Friend to reconsider. I hope that the other place will see fit to put more pressure on the Government than I have managed to do, with the welcome assistance of the hon. Member for Hammersmith. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 16

INTERPRETATION

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I apologise to the House for missing out amendment No. 48. We shall take it now.

Mr. Clelland: I beg to move amendment No. 48, in page 11, line 31, leave out '3' and insert '20'.

In Committee my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) argued, strongly and with his usual eloquence, that three was far too small a figure to define an assembly for the purposes of the Bill. The Minister said that he agreed that the base should be shifted upwards. He said:

"I shall consider the hon. Gentleman's arguments with care and I shall consult further on the matter. I accept that, if a number can be found that is sensible in terms both of policing and of definition for the kind of offences that we are discussing, that number should be in the clause. I have accepted the principle and indicated at least that my starter is for 10."—[Official Report, Standing Committee C, 13 March 1986; c. 789.]

As no Government amendment to increase the number has been tabled and as the Minister has said that he accepts the principle that the number should be increased, I am left with the assumption that he looks favourably on the amendment tabled by my right hon. and hon. Friends. Therefore, I shall waste no more time but shall await the Minister's favourable response.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland) has chosen his moment and his amendment well and has presented a good case for excluding small assemblies of fewer than 20 persons from the scope of the clause 14 provision. The case is of such quality that its author must be a great man. We discussed this matter at some length in Committee and I accepted then that there was a case in principle for excluding small assemblies. We consulted the police and they are content with a cut-off point of 20 and I am happy to say that the Government are prepared to accept the amendment and I advise the House so to do.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 17

PUBLISHING OR DISTRIBUTING

Amendment made: No. 56, in page 12, line 19, leave out

Clause 27

EFFECT OF ORDER

Mr. Giles Shaw: In the absence of my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes), I beg to move amendment No. 81, in page 17, line 6, leave out from 'may' to end of line 8 and insert 'arrest him without warrant'.

May I suggest that with this amendment it will be convenient to take amendment No. 82, in page 17, line 9, leave out subsection (5).

We are minded to accept the amendments. They have the effect of substituting a power of arrest for the power of expulsion presently in the Bill, which is exercisable when a constable reasonably suspects that a person is in breach of an exclusion order. Representatives of the Association of Chief Police Officers pressed for a power of arrest when I saw them a month or so ago. I am willing to accept the amendments and commend them to the House. In most circumstances, the power of expulsion together with the power of arrest under the Police and

[Mr. Giles Shaw]

Criminal Evidence Act would suffice. Under section 25 of that Act the police can arrest a person who is in breach of an exclusion order if, for example, service of a summons is impracticable or inappropriate, because the police have grounds to believe he may cause injury to others or damage to property after being expelled from the football ground, or because the name and address of the suspected offender is not known and cannot readily be ascertained.

These powers would suffice in most cases, but I accept that there may be cases in which an offender is apprehended at a match and the police have no grounds for believing he will cause injury or damage, but believe that he will attempt to re-enter the ground. That is the point I undertook to cover and which it is correct to present to the House in the form of an amendment. I hope the House will agree to accept it.

Mr. Hayes: May I wholeheartedly and unreservedly apologise to the House for not being present when these important amendments were put to the House. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on his swiftness of foot and for the co-operation of Opposition Members. My hon. Friend has made it clear that the Government have taken a sensible approach to the Bill. Clearly, the Government understand, in the way that we in Committee, in a sensible and amicable way, understood, that the most important point is that football must be a decent family game, and one in which we want to prevent the thuggery and the violence that takes place. We must give the police the proper powers to enforce the exclusion orders. I am most grateful to the Minister for adopting this sensible and reasonable approach.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I thank my hon. Friend, because this will avoid obstreperous football fans who have been expelled making a fool of policemen who are trying to do their job properly. This is a good example of the Government listening to the views of the police service, and I am grateful to my hon. Friend for accepting the amendment.

Mr. Kaufman: Brisk and bizarre proceedings have been known in the House of Commons before, but this beats a lot that I have seen in 16 years. For an hon. Member to fail to move an amendment, and for a Minister to accept it in the absence of that hon. Gentleman, is a new level in the responsiveness and accountability of Her Majesty's Administration to the House of Commons. I very much trust that it will set a precedent for the future, based on telepathy.

The Opposition will not oppose the amendment. After reasonably assiduous attendance in Committee, the hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes) has now managed to get a bit on to the statute book. Without in any way detracting from his moment of glory, I must tell him that I believe that the use of this power will be extremely rare, for the very reasons that we gave when we discussed the exclusion order procedure in Committee. In our view—and also in the view of the Police Federation—the exclusion order procedure will be difficult to assert. I do not believe that adding a power of arrest to something that is very difficult to enforce will make it any easier.

The Opposition have made it clear throughout that, despite our doubts about the efficacy of this procedure —which doubts are shared by the police themselves— we hope that it works. We believe that stringent action to deal with hooliganism at football matches will, provided it works, can only be to good of the public order and the game itself. Now that those who are subject to exclusion orders—thanks to the responsiveness of the Government —include racists, we hope that they will be caught by this as well.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 82, in page 17, line 9, leave out subsection (5).—[Mr. Giles Shaw.]

Schedule 1

Sporting Events

Mr. Giles Shaw: I beg to move amendment No. 87, in page 22, line 29, at end insert—

'Private facilities for viewing events

5AA.—(1) In relation to a room in a designated sports ground—

(a) from which designated sporting events may be directly viewed, and

(b) to which the general public are not admitted, sections 2(1)(a) and 3(1)(a) of this Act have effect with the substitution for the reference to the period of a designated sporting event of a reference to the restricted period defined below.

(2) Subject to any order under subsection (3) below, the restricted period of a designated sporting event for the purposes of this section is the period beginning 15 minutes before the start of the event or (if earlier) 15 minutes before the time at which it is advertised to start and ending 15 minutes after the end of the event, but—

(a) where an event advertised to start at a particular time on a particular day is postponed to a later day, the restricted period includes the period in the day on which it is advertised to take place beginning 15 minutes before and ending 15 minutes after that time, and

(b) where an event advertised to start at a particular time on a particular day does not take place, the period is the period referred to in paragraph (a) above.

(3) The Secretary of State may by order provide, in relation to all designated sporting events or in relation to such descriptions of event as are specified in the order—

(a) that the restricted period shall be such period, shorter than that mentioned in subsection (2) above, as may be specified in the order, or

(b) that there shall be no restricted period.

(4) An order under this section shall be made by statutory instrument which shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may take Government amendment No. 88.

Mr. Shaw: We now come to a significant amendment, which has been pressed upon me by both sides of the House. It relates to the exemption included in the Sporting Events (Control of Alcohol etc.) Act, which was passed last summer and applies to all parts of grounds which have bars, with the exception of the sponsored boxes which were built facing the pitch. I am glad to say that in general —I hope that the House will concur—the police believe that the Act, as well as other things that have taken place since last season, is helping them to combat hooliganism.

During the proceedings on the Bill considerable concern was expressed about the effect of the Act on the revenue that clubs derived from the leasing of executive boxes. I therefore undertook to monitor the situation, and the Football League has supplied us with information that shows that clubs are projecting considerable losses. In Committee I said that the Government would be working on an amendment to relax the controls without abandoning them altogether, and the result is before the House this evening.

The amendments establish a new regime for the sale and possession of alcohol in executive boxes and restaurants. The sale and possession of alcohol in such rooms will continue to be prohibited for a period lasting from 15 minutes before a match until 15 minutes after a match. Outside that dry period, box occupants will be able to possess alcohol, and it can be sold to them as long as a normal justice's licence has been obtained.

The amendments also make provision for the dry period to be reduced, or indeed removed altogether, by order. I should make it clear that we have an open mind on whether, and if so when, that power should be exercised, and we certainly do not intend that it should be exercised before the 1987-88 season, at the very earliest.

Under the arrangements, the role of the magistrate will be limited to the usual licensing role. We concluded that it would not be appropriate or sensible to attempt to devise a new form of procedure for boxes similar to the exemption order arrangements under the 1985 Act. Many boxes are paid for by companies, which take clients to matches and provide them with drinks at no charge. We could not easily extend the present exemption order scheme, which applies only to sale, to those cases. It would be equally difficult to graft on to the 1985 Act a new exemption order scheme which applied to possession as well as to sale. Accordingly, the amendments are formulated on a different basis, with a central dry period, but with a substantial reduction in the period of control.

I know that the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) was especially concerned about the equity of the whole operation of the 1985 Act, and about the equity to be included in any amendments that we brought forward. I believe that we have incorporated as much equity as is reasonably possible in the circumstances, without undermining the controls generally. Clearly, during the period when clubs are not enabled to serve or to sell alcohol in boxes they will be in the same position as people on the terraces and in the stands, who will not be able to possess alcohol in any place from which the pitch may be viewed direct. They can go to behind the stands areas to buy a drink if an exemption order for sale has been granted by a local magistrate.

We have initially set the dry period to cover the period of the match and 15 minutes on either side and I would judge that that 15 minutes on either side is the time when the vast majority of spectators enter or leave matches and is accordingly the period when the need for equity is at its greatest.

In addition, the relaxation is framed in terms of rooms from which the pitch may be directly viewed and to which the general public are not admitted. The relaxation would therefore apply to any room (for example a supporters' club clubhouse) to which the general public are not admitted. There is nothing to prevent a club from developing such a facility and thereby taking advantage of the relaxation that we have in mind. In many ways we would welcome developments of membership card schemes in this way to provide facilities which are not for general public use but which are for club members only.

These proposals represent a significant degree of relaxation for the clubs, while keeping intact the general thrust of the 1985 Act. Under the present controls, alcohol may neither be sold nor purchased in boxes for a period lasting from two hours before a match until one hour afterwards, a total period of four hours 40 minutes. Under these proposals this "dry period" will be reduced to two hours 10 minutes. Sponsors will be able to entertain clients for a meal with a drink before the match, and if developments in the game are encouraging there is provision for further relaxation in subsequent seasons.

I conclude by saying that in dealing with the issues of football hooliganism and the management of clubs we have provided arrangements for an exclusion order scheme and for an arrest power to go with that. We have provided proposals for containment of the sale of alcohol, yet with a relaxation, significantly, for the provision of alcohol in sponsored boxes.

I wish that clubs would give more commitment to installing membership schemes in order to control those whom they wish to attend their games, and in that way do more to fulfil their side of the bargain, because I believe that if the House accepts these amendments we shall be delivering our side of it.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I am sorry that the Government felt compelled to make these further concessions to those who want to earn the money for football from booze. It is a pity that our national game is so unimaginative in its approach to fund raising that it has to persuade the House that football will not be able to survive unless drinking in directors' boxes is allowed. That is a shameful admission.

I have had some responsibility for sport. I have had the opportunity to see how other countries handle the financing of it, and most of the great European football clubs arrange their business rather better. They have multisport facilities. They have arrangements whereby they get income from many activities that attract more customers, including families. Regrettably, in Britain we appear to be accepting the view that unless the directors' guests can do more drinking in the boxes, football will collapse. I do not believe that.

It would have been far better to make football face up to its responsibilities, widen its market and use its facilities better. It is a national disgrace that we have come to the situation that, although Parliament has had to take action to prevent drink generating violence, we are now under pressure from the clubs who say that we must change what we did. I do not think that the initial Act—the Sporting Events (Control of Alcohol, Etc.) Act—was any good, and I do not think that this Bill is any good. We have arrived at this pass. There is nothing to be done, but somebody should have the guts to stand up and say that football does itself no credit if it finances its future on booze.

Mr. Tom Pendry (Stalybridge and Hyde): I declare my interest in that I am chairman of the all-party football committee, and the House may know that, along with my colleagues, I have argued for this change. It is no secret that on the Second Reading of the Sporting Events (Control of Alcohol, Etc.) Act, I said that I felt that both the Government and my Front Bench had overreacted to the terrible tragedies at Brussels, Birmingham and Luton. The proposed amendment is a recognition by both the Government and the Opposition that my colleagues and I had a rather more valid line of argument than they thought.

This is not time for self-congratulation. The feeling is probably best summed up by Luke, chapter 15:

[Mr. Tom Pendry]

"joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just persons, which need no repentence." In this case we have two, in the shapes of the Minister and my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). I congratulate them because, following the promise that we obtained from the Minister on the Second Reading of the Bill—that he would monitor the effects of the Bill on football clubs—both the Minister and my right hon. Friend took that promise seriously. They both visited football clubs, looked closely at the problems, and monitored the Football League, and the reactions of the all-party football committee. As a result, we have today's amendment.

I disagree with the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths), because he misunderstood the Act on Second Reading last year, and he still misunderstands it. He spoke about the guests in directors' boxes, but that has always gone on because the boxes do not overlook the pitch. We are not talking about them, although the hon. Gentleman keeps getting this mixed up. I agree with him in part about continental clubs, but they have always had such a facility, for which we have argued, and which is returning through the amendment. His contribution was neither weighty nor relevant.

There is no doubt—it has been recognised by the Government and by Opposition spokesmen—that clubs such as Manchester United, Spurs, Leicester City and many others would have been hit drastically next season were it not for this proposal. There were signs of that this season. My right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton asked for equity. Unfortunately, the flow of money from executive box holders, which would enable clubs to do all the things that the Prime Minister and the Minister of State wanted, including improving safety standards, was drying up fast. But at the same time, the person who had his drink out of sight of the pitch could still enjoy that facility. The amendment would make the position more equitable for executive box holders, many of whom may not support the Labour party. But as an egalitarian, I believe that they should be given a fair chance if they are genuine football supporters.

12 midnight

I welcome the proposal, as does the Football League. Indeed, Jack Dunnett told me yesterday that he was grateful for small mercies. He hopes that the Minister will widen the concessions, if not next season, the season after. I hope that the Minister will give a guarantee that he will not stop the monitoring exercise. I hope that the Government will continue to examine the effects of the legislation, even as amended, to ensure that football can prosper and do all the things that we wish our national game to do. We must rid ourselves of the hooligan element that has attached itself to our national game. They are not genuine football supporters. I have not argued against membership cards. There is room for an experiment in that area. The committee which examined the matter argued that, given modern technology, football clubs should try to move towards the Government's position and at least conduct an experiment with the object of introducing a membership card system that would go some way to alleviating many of the problems.

I congratulate the Minister of State and my right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton on accepting the main thrust of our arguments. They will also wish to thank Paul Bobroff of Tottenham Hotspur, Marting Edwards of Manchester United, Jack Dunnett and many others who participated in the monitoring exercise and turned this proposal into a reality. The Minister would be well advised to continue the monitoring exercise, because it has been a true exercise in democracy. The football clubs must also accept that many hon. Members genuinely feel for the game and wish to assist them to get rid of the problems which neither they nor we want. I welcome this modest move in the direction for which we argued last year.

Mr. Michael Carttiss (Great Yarmouth): I agree with the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) and disagree almost totally with the observations of my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths). Although I had not intended to speak in the debate, in welcoming the Government amendment I declare my interest as a long-standing supporter of Norwich City football club. I recognise that my hon. Friend comes from a county whose football team is not so good on the field, although its supporters' standard of behaviour is equal to that in Norwich. I invite him to visit Norwich City football club next season to see the new stand, erected after the old one was burnt down because of an electrical fault. There he will see the membership card scheme applied to about 2,000 occupants of the stand. Norwich City has made the positive initiatives for which my hon. Friend the Minister of State called. I welcome what the Government have said tonight in respect of this. There is still room for further movement in the direction of relaxation.

I reject the notion that football is any more dependent on booze than the Barbican theatre, the Royal Opera House, the ballet or any other place where people drink at very high prices, which all helps the profits of those theatres and enables the pastimes to be enjoyed at perhaps a slightly lower cost. There is nothing wrong with drink. It is like everything else — it needs to be done in moderation. The move that the Government have made to relax the controls will be welcomed, will result in a positive approach and, of course, has nothing to do with the provision of hospitality by directors, as the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde underlined. It has to do with companies ploughing back into sport their funds from their other activities, entertaining their customers, the people with whom they deal throughout the year, and at the same time helping to bring football grounds generally into the 21st century, which many of our Continental neighbours have already done.

I welcome the amendment. I hope that we shall see an even further relaxation in the season after next, in the light of the experience of the coming season, which I am sure will show football clubs to be responsible in dealing with what I acknowledge to be a complex matter when one talks about equity.

Mr. Hawksley: I welcome the amendment. It is a response to the long debate in Committee in which I put down an amendment which would have allowed local magistrates to decide what restrictions, if any, they wished to put on such boxes. I still cannot understand why the Minister cannot go the whole way in agreeing to that being enforced because, under this proposal, he is agreeing to a certain relaxation while keeping to himself the possibility of further relaxation later. I hope that he will use that power, because when we debated this we argued that no hooliganism that we had ever heard of had started in or been caused by actions in the boxes. I hope that the Minister will respond to local needs. That is why I argued in Committee that it should be the magistrates, who knew the area, who should decide. I hope that when the Minister replies he will agree to listen to representations made by hon. Members representing areas, when they ask him to relax the order, as this amendment allows him to do.

Providing the Minister gives the House an assurance that he is prepared to consider such representations, I am very pleased to support the amendment, which goes a long way to meeting the needs expressed to us by the Football League, which envisaged the loss of a large amount of income. We are right to try to help it on this occasion.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): Many years ago there was a film in which Charlie Drake took the part of the triangle player in an orchestra, every other member of which he also played. The whole film consisted of his being almost ready to strike the note on the triangle and, in the end, failing to do so at the appropriate time. I wondered whether it would fall to my lot to do that, having sat patiently not just in Committee but also through the whole of today's debate; but at last we arrive at my role in this process.

I am now a revisionist on the matter of alcohol at football grounds. The Minister has heard me express the view in the past that I did not agree with controls on the introduction of alcohol, because I did not think that they would prove effective. Having taken soundings among those who run football grounds and the police, who have had 12 months' experience of controlling alcohol, I must confess that I have been converted to the view that control has a beneficial effect. There is no doubt that what the police are telling us, not just in my area but up and down the country, is that the crowds have been easier to control. There was a sense of revulsion following the disgraceful and tragic events of 12 months ago. Control over the sale of alcohol at football grounds means that spectators have been more amenable and that the police have been able to persuade them to behave in a manner that is in the interests of all those who are present at football matches.

The experiment has helped to reduce hooliganism at football grounds. The clubs have put forward very powerful, although self-interested, arguments about the way in which the controls bite. It is a tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) and the all-party football committee that pressure has been brought to bear upon the Minister and his colleagues to consider a relaxation of the rules.

During the debate in Committee it was accepted by most of those concerned that the Minister faced a most difficult job in trying to recognise the real needs of football clubs which, despite the comments of the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths), have suffered financial penalties. I sympathise with his argument that football clubs should not have to depend upon alcohol as a source of club funds. Nevertheless, it is a legitimate part of the social scene in this country.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: Why not allow them to sell cocaine?

Mr. Lloyd: I do not believe that the hon. Gentleman seriously advocates the provision of cocaine by football clubs.

Inability to sell alcohol in the executive boxes has cost the clubs dearly, not because of the loss of sales but because of the potential loss of users of those boxes. The Minister has gone some way towards meeting the needs of the clubs and has also recognised the need for equity within football grounds. In Committee the Opposition said that it is necessary to recognise that football, as a game, is operated in the interests not just of those who sit in the executive boxes but of all those who go to football matches.

The amendments go a considerable way towards alleviating the difficulties faced by clubs. However, football clubs and their supporters are still on probation. It is possible that there will be further relaxations if their good record continues during the next and following seasons. Therefore the Opposition give a guarded welcome to the amendments. They try to strike a balance between the conflicting needs of football supporters, whether they sit inside or outside the executive boxes, the more general needs of the public in and around football grounds, and the needs of the football clubs.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.—[Mr. Giles Shaw.]

12.14 am

Mr. Kaufman: We have now arrived at the final stage of the Bill, after long consideration. We have had a Second Reading and a Standing Committee stage which lasted 34 sittings and about 80 hours, and we have had another long day today.

I should like to thank my hon. Friends who have participated in the work of the Standing Committee and who made a significant contribution to our debates. I should also like to thank my hon. Friends who did not take part in those debates but who participated on Second Reading and on Report. It would not be proper for me to allow this final stage to be completed without thanking the Minister of State for the way in which he has responded to our arguments.

There was a time early on when, for reasons of propriety, we regretted the absence of the Home Secretary. I do not criticise his absence from this debate, as I know the reasons for it. It has to be said that he did not take the role in earlier stages of such a major Bill that we would have expected. We did not miss the Home Secretary, however, because the Minister responded, although not always favourably, to our amendments after proper consideration.

There is no doubt that the Bill is different in substantial respects from the one which the Opposition opposed on Second Reading. That is not to say for a moment that the Bill is to our liking in several parts. We still dislike some of part I, and especially some of part II, considerably. I give notice to the Minister and his officials that an incoming Labour Government after the general election will repeal most of the cotentious aspects of part II and consider part I.

I should like to itemise those parts of the Bill which we still strongly dislike. Despite an improvement that was made today, we still believe that the offence of disorderly conduct in part I is too vague and could turn louts and larkers unnecessarily into criminals. We do not believe that it is satisfactory that the use of words alone, even words on a badge, can generate an offence under what will be section 4, with the possibility of six months in prison.

Despite the considerable changes that we have achieved in part II, the police are being given new and unprecedented powers over marches and open-air meetings. They will be a burden to the police when dealing with the real law and order problems of today. The powers are based on vague and sweeping criteria, especially the criterion of serious disruption to the life of the community, to which we have taken exception throughout.

There is no recognition in the Bill of the right to demonstrate peacefully. There is no adequate remedy for citizens against mistaken or perverse use of the powers that part II confers on the police. There is still a threat to criminalise demonstrators for failure to comply with the directions of the police.

In part III, we regret that the Attorney-General's consent for prosecution in race hatred matters is still necessary. We believe that it will weaken the force of the new protections against racial hatred which have been written into the Bill.

As I said during the debate, we still regard part IV as irrelevant in many ways. We still believe that the exclusion orders, although we hope that they will work, are impractical. The Government have failed to demonstrate how the exclusion orders can work or to satisfy the doubts of the police. We still believe that it would have been a good idea to seek to take action over hooligans who go to matches overseas; therefore, we still have the most serious objections to every single part of the Bill.

I repeat what I have said throughout, on Second Reading and in Committee, that the Bill brings a new risk of conflict between the police and the community, puts new burdens on the police and is irrelevant to the crime wave we are suffering—3,600,000 serious offences last year and only about 1,000 public order offences. To have spent three months of parliamentary time on a Bill which touches only the edges of the real and frightening law and order problem in this country seems to be a misuse of the time of the House of Commons.

However, it has to be said that, after these debates, we have achieved considerable and important changes in the Bill. On the public order offences in part I, we have ensured that the use of words alone will not constitute a major offence or riot, violent disorder or affray. The offence of threatening or provoking violence has been made tigher and related more closely to the presence of an intended victim or target. The Government have agreed to reconsider removing the life sentence as a penalty for the technical offence of riot and I hope, after the events of next month, they will move towards that in an amendment in the House of Lords.

The part of the Bill dealing with racial hatred has always been welcomed by the Opposition. That part of the Bill is now stronger that it was before and in many respects it will provide some of the strongest statutory provisions ever against the promotion of racial hatred. The amendment we proposed and which the Government accepted, whereby for the first time the police are to be given a power of immediate arrest for offences involving racial hatred, will have a real affect on these matters.

We are pleased that the Government have accepted, within the exclusion order procedure, that the courts will be given power to ban people who commit offences involving racial hatred from attending football matches. I have discussed with the football authorities and with a number of football clubs the ugly presence and menace of racial louts at football matches. It is agreed on all sides that they make a sinister and ugly contribution to hooliganism at football matches. It is satisfactory that, as a result of amendments we tabled and which the Government have accepted, for the first time the law will address itself specifically to the problem of racist troublemakers who attach themselves to sporting events and spoil and make horrible those occasions.

We are pleased that the Government have accepted our proposition that the stirring up of racial hatred should be a criminal offence, not only in public places but in private places, other than domestic dwellings. We are pleased that we have secured a commitment from the Government to consider urgently the need for new legislation to deal with racist videos; we are also pleased to have secured a commitment from them to hold discussions with us on the case for new legislation to deal with offences of racial harassment. Indeed, only this evening, I received from the Home Secretary a letter inviting Her Majesty's Opposition to take part in discussions with him on the possibility of us agreeing in further legislation to consider an offence of racial harassment.

There was a great deal of misgiving, after the Bill appeared—and indeed, to be fair, before it appeared—about what would happen under clause 5 as it was originally drafted. We criticised it strongly on Second Reading. The Home Secretary at that time invited us to debate in Committee amendments to the Bill that would seek to negate the possibility of the new offence of disorderly conduct being turned into a resuscitated sus law. The Government acknowledged right away, when we began debating the matters in Committee, that they did not want a resuscitated sus law, and they moved considerably along the road that we asked them to travel along, when they accepted the necessity of a victim for that offence. We believe that the acceptance of a victim assists in transforming the offence from an almost certain resuscitation of the sus law into more of the sort of offence that many of our constituents wish to see when they are harrassed on their estates and in the areas in which they live.

Although, as I have made clear, we still do not regard the new formulation as entirely satisfactory, and although we believe that there are dangers in it, we also believe that, following the case that we made in Committee, the new clause will be less unsatisfactory and may even be positively of value because a real victim will have to be present, the victim must be one likely to have suffered alarm, distress or harassment from the offenders' words or conduct, and a person will not be guilty if he had no reason to believe that he was being watched or heard by a likely victim.

When we saw the new clause, we were still worried that it would be usable as a new sus law, and would therefore not only mean harassing youth and possibly particularly black youth, but would bring the police into conflict with the community. We believe that the changes that have been made mean that the new offence is much less likely to be brought into use at pickets or demonstrations. The Government responded to the new amendment that we moved this evening, saying that the Minister will issue guidance to the police on the way in which the offence is enforced, and will write to me and publish that letter so that we can monitor the proper use of the offence and ensure that it is not misused to harass boisterous youth or others whose behaviour should not be turned into criminal offences.

Of course, the heart of our opposition to the Bill has been that we were extremely concerned, and remain concerned, at the controls that it contains on marches and demonstrations. Here again, we may say that we have achieved major changes, possibly the most important changes in the Bill. The amendment moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland), which the Minister accepted, is perhaps the single most important amendment that has been incorporated in the Bill. It increases the definition of an assembly from three to 20. The idea of an assembly of three not only meant that the police could disperse any group of people numbering more than two on the grounds that they could be a disruptive or disorderly assembly, but that peaceful small-scale picketing, which was not even potentially unlawful under the Employment Act 1980 and which was within the TUC codes of picketing, could have been turned into a criminal offence.

We were extremely worried about the infringement of the rights to assemble and to picket caused by this narrow definition, and we are gratified that the increase to 20 removes a great many misgivings. Nevertheless, we remain wholly opposed to the provision itself, and a Labour Government will repeal the whole provision relating to the control of and conditions on assemblies.

Despite that opposition we believe that the change from three to 20 will be of value, and that the Government's agreement to issue a circular reminding the police in considering the use of their powers over assemblies and processions of peoples' rights to assemble and to demonstrate peacefully is an important innovation. It is the Government's public acknowledgement of the right to assemble and picket. The circular will be published, and will be an important document, although we still wish that it was a statutory provision. Nevertheless, we welcome it as likely to have an important influence on the working of the provision.

We are also pleased that, as a result of our proposals, the six days' notice to the police of any planned procession will not now be required, if it is not reasonably practicable to give advance notice. We are pleased that a procession is more tightly defined, although we are not wholly satisfied with the definition. We are pleased that notice of a procession will be accepted by post, and need not require a personal application, as was originally provided in the Bill.

We are glad that the Government have acknowledged and accepted amendments to the effect that, regarding assemblies and marches, arrests may by made only be a constable in uniform. The activity of police who did not appear to be police during the miners' strike and some of the events that have taken place at Wapping in recent weeks have caused grave disquiet. This new provision will be an improvement, and will ensure that only acknowledged police are active.

We are glad that directions regarding conditions on planned assemblies or processions must be given in writing, rather than verbally, by a chief constable or a metropolitan commissioner. We are pleased that the application by the police for banning a procession must now be based on reasonable belief of disorder, rather than merely belief. That change will make it easier to apply for a judicial review of a ban.

Some of those are small mercies and some are large changes. They do not make the Bill palatable to us in many of its provisions. They do not reduce our utter determination to rid the statute book of all its parts which are objectionable to civil liberties.

We are able to say, however, that during the months which we have spent considering the Bill, the parliamentary Labour party has been active and vigilant on behalf of the civil liberties of our people. In the House, we are massively out-numbered in voting terms by the Government, but we have been able to make changes which all who care about civil liberties will welcome as progress, although they will not be fully satisfied until we have a Labour Government who reassert in statutory form the right to freedom of expression, assembly and procession of our people.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) spoke at length, and I think that on no fewer than 25 occasions he said that he was pleased, which is commendable. I, too, believe that the Bill is a civil liberties measure, for the most important civil liberty of all is the liberty of our people to live in peace; not to be intimidated, not to have their lives disrupted, not to be made the victims of violent men who go rampaging round the country, not to be made the victims of rat packs on our great housing estates, and not to be intimidated, as the right hon. Gentleman fairly said, by racist gangs. The Bill is indeed a civil liberties measure, in the sense that it provides proper protection for individuals against collective violence.

I join the right hon. Member in saying that I think that the clause providing exclusion from football clubs is something of an irrelevance. I am with him in welcoming what the Government have been able to do in the interests of racial equality. I hope that it will never be said of the Conservative Government, or the Conservative party, that we have done anything other than massively assist the cause of racial equality. It is much to the credit of the Government that that has been done.

The main drive of the Bill—this follows from the White Paper and the studies of the Select Committee on Home Affairs—has been to move to the rescue of those who live on our great housing estates and who have been grossly abused. I believe that the Bill will give material assistance to the police in helping the poor, the elderly, the lonely, those who are set upon and those who are assaulted and vandalised. It is to the Government's credit that by the Bill they have gone to the assistance of those people.

The House has worked hard on the Bill, and the members of the Committee achieved considerable harmony. At the end of the day, I believe that they will wish to congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Department. I have had the doubtful pleasure of serving on about 20 Committees which have considered Bills of various sorts, including many which have been directed to the police and public order. I know of no Minister who has brought to a Committee the degree of patience, good humour, sweet temper and constructiveness that has been demonstrated by my hon. Friend. Whenever he undertook to assist the Committee, he did so. He has not delivered in every respect in a manner that has been wholly satisfactory to me, but he has won the great admiration of those who were members of the Committee, both Government and Opposition Members.

When the House has released the Bill and it has passed through another place, it will fall to the police service to implement it. I hope that no hon. Member who has played his part in getting the Bill through the House will wash his hands, walk away from the problem, and return to the ordinary parliamentary dialectic of bashing the police whenever possible. We lay heavy burdens upon the police. We have asked them to undertake an immensely complicated task and we have not helped them by adding to their paperwork. Nevertheless, I am sure that the police service, as it always does, will do its utmost to make the Bill work. I hope that it will have the practical support of hon. Members on both sides of the House in seeking to do so.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): We should remember why the Bill is before us and why we have considered it in preceding months. It was born out of industrial chaos caused by the Government. The Government caused chaos by putting millions of people out of work.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I remind the hon. Member that on Third Reading the House considers what is in the Bill. The House does not have as wide a debate as is conventional on Second Reading.

Mr. Skinner: I shall explain why it is important to oppose the Bill.

The Government chose deliberately to cause chaos. As a result, they had to introduce a Bill to try to remedy that chaos. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) on some of the changes that have been made, minor though they were. It is important to remember that the Bill would not have been drafted had it not been for certain incidents, such as the miners' strike and other industrial disputes, which arose because of Government policy. The Bill would not have been introduced had there not been massive cuts in public expenditure. There has been a series of attacks on local government expenditure. Inner city areas have been allowed to run down. There has been a failure to build houses and bungalows for the people who need them.

The Government caused chaos in both industrial and economic terms. As a result, they came along with another piece of the jigsaw—in the form of this legislation—to try to control law and order. For those reasons, it is important that the Labour party is seen to be opposing the measure to the bitter end. I am pleased that my right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton said that parts of the legislation will be repealed by a future Labour Government, because the legislation attacks civil liberties.

In 1979 the Government claimed that they would set the people free. They talked about law and order and said that they would impose a short, sharp shock on those who were supposed to be upsetting society at that time. After seven years, the Government have not set the people free. After all the chaos caused by the Tory Government, we find that today, of all days, on Third Reading, the Government have set the prisoners free. We shall vote against the Bill.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I thank the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) for his extremely courteous remarks at the outset of his speech. I recognise, as he does, that during the many sittings of the Committee we endeavoured to achieve major changes in the Bill for the betterment of public order. I thank all my colleagues who served on the Committee and helped to make the Bill possible.

I refer also to the substantial effort by my staff in the Home Office in helping members of the Committee and helping to maintain an orderly flow of information on this major undertaking. I refer to the chairmanship of the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Leadbitter). His benign chairmanship ensured that we did not descend into the acrimony that a topic of this order could easily attract. A number of changes have been made to the legislation. The right hon. Member for Gorton catalogued the for the House.

This is a major Bill about public order. Its genesis was not the miners' strike, despite the efforts of the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) to make it appear so. Its genesis was a major review of the law on public order based on the 1936 Act undertaken by the Law Commission. It will now stand as a major modernisation and codification of public order law, together with the additional powers it conveys on certain aspects on which the Committee spent much time.

The Bill's major contribution is in the context of public order law. I dismiss the views of those who seek to belittle the importance of the measure or seek to deny the importance of its roots and antecedents.

We have worked together in a genuinely constructive spirit in providing a parliamentary process. I suspect that the way in which the Bill has emerged is a credit to that process. Of course there have been profound differences of opinion, and those differences remain, but we respect the views of those whose ideas differ from the Government's. Equally, we are determined to look after the community we serve. It deserves and demands an effective and measured response from the Government to the growth of violence and disorder in society. That is what the Bill sets out to do.

We have applied a consistent test to our proposals to give the police only such powers as are necessary and effective in helping them to avert disorder and to protect the rights of the citizen. On Second Reading, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary stressed that it was all too easy to talk of worries in isolation and in absolute terms.

The Government staunchly defend and protect the rights of free speech, assembly and demonstration. They are all of fundamental importance in a democratic society. As a member of a Government who have their roots deep in the traditions of our nation and the defence of individual liberty, I take ill lectures from any quarter about the importance of sustaining and nurturing the British people's historic freedoms.

Where we differ from the Opposition in presentaton and perhaps in substance is that we insist on keeping firmly in view the fact that these rights must always be balanced against the rights of others to live their lives peacefully, free from intimidation and violence and free from deliberate disruption by those who want to force their views upon them.

We recognise, therefore, only an equality of rights. We reject the notion that, because a person forms part of an organised group—whether a picket, demonstration or protest march—it confers special privileges upon him. It would be wrong for the law to give such a person greater protection than the individual who does not want to picket, demonstrate or do any such thing.

It is not the Bill that weakens the responsible and peaceful exercise of democratic freedoms — on the contrary, it strengthens them. Rather it is those who misuse and twist such rights and their apologists who hide tyranny behind a mask acclaiming liberty who are the enemies of our traditional freedoms.

In short, we like to stress that rights carry responsibilities and that the right to demonstrate cannot be used as an excuse to deprive the rest of us of the right to live our lives in peace. A prerequisite for the exercise of rights is the existence of order. Public order is the most fundamental common good and, in helping to prevent disorder and thereby to provide greater protection for the citizen, the Bill is a timely and important piece of legislation. I commend it to the House.

Rotherham Health Authority (Chairman)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

12.58 am

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): I shall not detain the House for too long in discussing the position of the Rotherham health authority. The authority is in perhaps a unique position in Britain in that it does not at present have a chairman.

Hon. Members will know that the Government introduced new faces into the National Health Service looking for what could be described as the "myth of the market". The Government are trying to create a market, but it is a myth to think that that will be beneficial to the National Health Service.

The structure of management in the National Health Service has been altered, and hon. Members will recall that that was started by the Griffiths report. At the same time, the Government decided to replace some chairmen of district health authorities. In Rotherham, they decided not to re-appoint Mr. Vernon Thornes who for a long time had been chairman of Rotherham health authority. The decision not to re-appoint Mr. Thornes caused anger and shock in the area. It angered me when I heard about it.

Vernon Thornes wrote to me and to two other hon. Members in June 1985 a confidential letter in which he said he had heard about some intrigue over the appointment of chairmen of district health authorities. He said why he believed that Rotherham was a target, and that that might mean that the chairman would be replaced. I discussed the matter with a Minister, but he did not agree with my analysis of the non-appointment, or sacking, of Vernon Thornes.

One of the prime motivations behind the non-appointment of Mr. Thornes is the stand taken by Rotherham health authority against privatisation. The authority has issued tenders and has gone along with Ministers, but it has said on all tenders that the people tendering must fulfil obligations on the protection of earnings of people who work for them. Those obligations are on the hourly rate, the sick payment rates and holiday benefits.

The Minister knows that his Department has not looked favourably on any health authority that has taken such a stand. For a long time, the Department through the regional office has advised the health authority to withdraw the clause about working conditions on contracts going out to tender. The Department has told the authority to play the game and to stop telling people that they must pay certain wage rates and offer certain protections to people who work for them.

Rotherham health authority took advice on the matter and found that the requests from the Government, made through the regional office, were not legally binding. The authority's advisers said there was nothing illegal in what the authority was doing. Perhaps the Government thought it was immoral to have such clauses in the tender forms. Wage rates are sometimes less than £2 per hour, and there is nothing immoral in the authority trying to protect people.

Mr. Thornes appears to have been victimised because of the stand taken by Rotherham health authority on privatisation. If that is the case, it is unfair because, like any good chairman, he was merely carrying out the wishes of the representatives on the health authority. He has an outstanding record in Rotherham in the National Health Service. One of the ironies of the case is that in a letter that he received from the chairman of Trent health authority on 18 March this year, shortly after that chairman had told Vernon Thornes that he would not be re-appointed, he was assured of:

"our sincere gratitude for all you have done for the Health Service for the last twenty-two years. Your contribution to the development and organisation of Health Services in Rotherham has been exceptional. I can say quite unreservedly that largely due to your decisive leadership, great skill and extensive personal involvement you have been able to carefully and effectively steer the District through two major reorganisations. I know also that your personal initiative and sustained efforts have played a significant part in the development of the District General Hospital."

That is a glowing tribute and one that most of those who have come in contact with Mr. Thornes would say was well deserved. It seems to many people that what has happened to him recently under the directorship of the Secretary of State has been a shabby farewell. The vast majority of the people in the Rotherham area feel that Vernon Thornes should not have been treated in this way.

The Minister received a letter dated 13 March 1986, from the Rotherham health authority, signed by Mr. Terry Sharman, who is the vice-chairman of the health authority, and the mayor of the Rotherham borough council. In the letter, which was drawn up after the meeting of the Rotherham health authority, on that day, the council said, for three reasons, that it wanted Vernon Thornes reappointed for the next two years, until someone could be trained into the position of chairman of the health authority. The reasons were:

" Vernon Thornes has been an outstanding Chairman and has acquired considerable experience of the health care needs of the Rotherham people over the last thirteen years.

2. He has the total confidence of the professions within the health service in Rotherham and of the Rotherham community.

3. The Authority has, at the moment, a number of projects that have not yet been brought to fruition that need Mr. Thornes' personal guidance in seeing their successful completion; furthermore, we feel, most strongly, that Mr. Thornes is given an opportunity to see these projects through."

It is right that that should happen. Mr. Thornes has indeed seen the health authority through two major reorganisations, and the latest is not yet complete.

The council said that it would like to bring a delegation to see the Minister if it would do any good, to bring further pressure to reinstate Vernon Thornes. I understand that the Secretary of State is about to appoint a local business man to the chair of the area health authority, and if my information is correct, the business man has no dealings with the NHS, and certainly none with the Rotherham health authority. In those circumstances, it would be better all round that Mr. Thornes should be appointed for a further two years, so that, on his retirement, somebody with experience of the NHS in Rotherham can take over.

I have had conversations with the Minister and the chairman of the Trent regional health authority, both of whom gave different reasons why Vernon Thornes was not reappointed. I still believe that I have been given no good reason why he should be replaced in this way. Even at this late stage, I ask the Minister to reconsider his position, and reappoint Vernon Thornes. As everyone in the Rotherham area has always said, he has done first-class work for a long time. He has served the NHS 22 years in south

Yorkshire, and his reappointment would be the best thing for the Rotherham district health authority, and for all concerned in the area. Of course, in two years' time he will be replaced because Vernon has already said that he wishes to retire after 24 years caring for people in the NHS in our area.

1.9 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) for giving the House the opportunity to consider this matter — because it caused much anxiety in the Rotherham health authority area — and for the opportunity to put the facts on the record. May I make some general points before dealing with the specific issues relating to Mr. Thornes.

When talking about the Government's approach to the National Health Service, the hon. Gentleman used the words, "the myth of the market". We are trying to ensure that the huge public resources which are devoted to the Health Service — resources which have been increased by 24 per cent. in real terms since the Government came to office in 1979—are used most effectively. Therefore, we must find every way to ensure that the resources are used to best effect. That is not the myth of the market; it is sheer common sense, and anyone who knows what is happening in the Health Service will accept that that must be the way forward.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the altered structure of management. He is right to do so, because our new approach of focusing responsibility exactly where it should be centred is producing good results in the cost improvement programmes and, therefore, the release of additional resources which can be used for health care and the continuing improvement of the Health Service. I hope that the hon. Gentleman accepts what is happening.

The appointment of health authority chairmen is an extremely important and difficult exercise, as any issue of this sensitivity must be. District health authorities are an important undertaking. Typically, a district health authority will have a budget of about £50 million and a work force of about 5,000. The provision of the necessary leadership and direction to an undertaking of that size is a considerable task. In making the appointments, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State must seek candidates of the highest calibre. Not least in the considerations that must weigh with him is the fact that the district health authority is, in many respects, the local face of the NHS, and its members will be drawn from the locality that it serves. This provides the means for local views on the quality and organisation of services to be made known.

The chairman must be sensitive and responsive to those important matters, as well as having the experience and ability to enable him or her to direct the affairs of an organisation that touches the lives of most people within its boundaries and that is often the largest employer in the district.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, the exercise to find the chairmen for most of the 191 district health authorities was launched by an announcement in the House on 18 April last year by my predecessor, the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Mr. Patten), who is now the Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction. The results were made known on 17 March this year when my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health announced the names of about 170 chairmen appointed to those important posts.

In launching the exercise in selection, my predecessor invited hon. Members to express any views on existing chairmen and to submit nominations to us by 3 June 1985.

When we undertook that consultation exercise, we took advice from a number of sectors but, within the National Health Service, the advice of regional chairmen was particularly relevant and valuable. We sought to take account of the advice and views of those hon. Members who responded, and consulted further with them, where necessary, throughout the year-long exercise. There were inevitably some areas where very finely balanced decisions had to be made, and either my right hon. Friend the Minister of Health or in some cases, the regional chairmen on our behalf, approached individual hon. Members to clarify or discuss their views. It is true to say that every effort was made to involve hon. Members in this decision-making process. At the same time, however, it must be made quite clear that these appointments are made at the sole discretion of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and that there was no question of clearing these appointments with hon. Members or, for that matter, with anyone else.

Having said that, I want to stress that in the case not only of Mr. Thornes but of very many others the question of non-reappointment was in no sense a condemnation or an expression of loss of confidence in a particular individual. One of the factors was inevitably the question of age. The average age of the new chairmen appointed in this round is something of the order of 54 years, which compares favourably with the average of 62 of the retiring chairmen.

I would like to reiterate what has been said by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health and also by the chairman of the Trent regional health authority, that Mr. Thornes has given exceptional service to the National Health Service. We pay a great tribute to his dedicated service in the Rother Valley district for no less than 22 years. Rather than this being seen as an attack on Mr. Thornes or an attempt to embarrass him, I hope that the hon. Gentleman and everyone else will accept that this was a job well and truly done, and that it was perfectly reasonable, after 22 years, that some new blood here, as in many other districts, should be sought.

It is always a question in such cases of keeping a balance between the need for stability and continuity and the need to introduce new blood, and to have fresh insights and ideas and contiruity in the longer term. For those reasons, something like one third of the appointments that we have made were new ones. That was also the case in Rother Valley.

As it happens, the decision left Rother Valley without a chairman, due to an unfortunate but unforeseen series of events. A letter of invitation was sent out on 19 February to a new chairman who had, I understand, already indicated his willingness to serve, and a letter accepting the appointment was sent by the prospective chairman on 24 February, only to be followed two weeks later by a further letter, regretfully declining the appointment, due to the already heavy demands on his time. As I am sure the House will appreciate, this further letter coming, as it did, out of the blue meant that we had to reconsider an appointment that we had had every reason to believe had been settled. There may have been other reasons of which we were not aware, but this was accepted by the new appointee.

I am glad, however, to be able to tell the House that, as I think the hon. Gentleman is aware, a new appointment has now been made. Mr. A. G. Baker, a local man, has accepted my right hon. Friend's invitation to serve as the new chairman of Rotherham health authority. We have every confidence in him and wish him well in this new and challenging post.

I repeat that there was no question of intrigue—one of the words used by the hon. Gentleman—or of any lack of confidence in Mr. Thornes, and there was certainly no question of what the hon. Gentleman referred to as privatisation but which more correctly should be called competitive tendering. The competitive tendering approach is precisely to ensure that Health Service resources are used in the most economic and effective way. We are looking for laundry, catering and cleaning service arrangements that will provide services of the right standard at the most economical cost. Most of the competitive tendering exercises result in the success of the in-house tender. There was no problem about competitive tendering.

The position adopted by the district health authority on the fair wages clause was contrary to the advice given by the regional health authority and the Department. By stipulating such matters, the district health authority may find that it results in an effect that is detrimental to the competitive tendering process in general. More specifically, it may deny the district health authority the opportunity to maximise savings in order to provide the maximum resources for health care. My understanding is that the former chairman, Mr. Thornes, advised members of the authority against retaining the fair wages clause. Ministers still hope that the district health authority will remove the clause.

I emphasise that Mr. Thornes has given very fine service for 22 years to the Health Service. There should be no interpretation of intrigue, or political manoeuvring, or lack of confidence. The decision was taken against the background that I have described. The Government should always be sensitive and responsive to the legitimate interests of hon. Members——

Mr. Barron: The Minister asks me to believe that, but in reality it is very difficult to make, in relation to Mr. Thornes, the argument about age, since a person of 65 has been reappointed for a two-year period in the neighbouring Sheffield district health authority. I can only assume that the district health authority wants to introduce new blood. The Minister said that a Mr. Baker has been appointed as chairman of the Rotherham health authority. I hope that Mr. Baker will be as successful as Mr. Thornes. The appointment has been made, and we shall all work together with the new chairman of the Rotherham health authority to try to improve the services provided by the National Health Service in the Rotherham area.

The Minister referred to the fair wages clause that is included in the tenders submitted by the Rotherham health authority. What will happen if the new chairman is instructed, as Mr. Vernon Thornes was instructed, by the health authority to continue to include it in the tenders? I presume that he will be so instructed and that there will, therefore, be no change.

Mr. Whitney: It would be wrong to go into too much detail about competitive tendering and the fair wages clause now, but the fair wages clause is contrary to the policy of the regional health authority and the Department. We spend £1 billion nationally on catering, cleaning and laundry services, and the objective must be to provide proper levels of service at the proper cost. That is generally accepted. Perhaps only three out of 191 health authorities are having difficulties. The interests of the patients must have priority.

As for the age of a chairman, it would be wrong for me to go into individual cases, but I hope that the hon. Gentleman accepts the general approach of introducing new and younger blood. I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman welcomed the new chairman and I hope that Mr. Baker's stay is profitable and helpful and that it will further promote the development of health care in the hon. Gentleman's constituency.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

NORTHERN IRELAND

Unemployment

1. Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about unemployment in Northern Ireland.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Dr. Rhodes Boyson): At 6 March 1986, the latest date for which figures are available, there were 124,403 unemployed claimants in Northern Ireland. The unemployment rate was 21·4 per cent. I announced, in March, a £20 million package of enterprise and unemployment measures, which is expected to create up to 3,500 extra jobs in its first year of operation.

Mr. Brown: Was not John De Lorean responsible for making many people unemployed in Northern Ireland? Will the Minister take steps to ensure that that individual is extradited to this country and placed on trial? Will he contact the American President and put that view to him, remembering, after the sordid Libyan affair, that one good turn deserves another?

Dr. Boyson: That was an interesting question, and one that I had not expected. Last July, when there was a debate on the De Lorean affair, we said that the Government would do all that they could to bring De Lorean to trial if he ever touched down in the country. I take note of what the hon. Gentlman says, and undoubtedly other Ministers and Members will have heard it as well.

Mr. Robert Atkins: Would not unemployment be assisted far more greatly in Northern Ireland if the example set by companies such as Shorts, and Harland and Wolff, which do so much to provide jobs for people in the Province and exports to the world, were emulated by others in the Province?

Dr. Boyson: I entirely recently agree with my hon. Friend. Last year Shorts brought out the Tucano plane, recently there were sales of aircraft to British Midland Airways Ltd., and the contract for the auxiliary oiler replenishment vessel went to Harland and Wolff last week. We trust that other firms in Northern Ireland, with the same enterprise and backing of the work force, will gain such contracts here, in Northern Ireland, and throughout the world.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: Let us see whether the Minister expects this question. In considering the factors that are likely to have a favourable effect on employment in the Province, will the Government not overlook the importance of transport action between the Province and the mainland, particularly the urgency of ensuring that use is made of the roll-on/roll-off facilities for transport in the port of Warrenpoint?

Dr. Boyson: I know that the right hon. Gentleman is rightly concerned about Warrenpoint and its facilities. I also know that, in so far as we are on the periphery of the European market, we require all the transportation if we are to sell goods, particularly heavy goods, in the question of that market. I take totally what the right hon. Gentleman has said.

Mr. Skinner: The hon. Gentleman will never make Secretary of State for Education and Science with grammar like that.

Dr. Boyson: I am glad that I have at least one supporter.

I have another point to make. At 2 pm today, unfortunately for Northern Ireland, Rothmans announced that it is pulling out of everything but cigar manufacturing there, which means 800 more unemployed. I know that that will be deplored throughout the House.

Mr. Michael Brown: On that point, does my hon. Friend agree that that makes so important the representations that we made to the Treasury about the level of tobacco taxation, because we foresaw what eventually could occur as a result of the increase in tobacco duty?

Dr. Boyson: My hon. Friend's point was mentioned in the press releases issued by Rothmans and by the Department. There has been a fall in the demand for tobacco because of the social and health consequences of smoking. There has also been an increase of imports into the United Kingdom market.

Mr. Mallon: Can the Minister give any assessment of the damage that has been done to employment prospects for the people of the north of Ireland by the recent form of Fascism centering on a new approach—a Bible in one hand and a petrol bomb in the other?

Dr. Boyson: There is no doubt that the hon. Gentleman's point is highly relevant to employment, and even more so to unemployment in Northern Ireland. Anyone considering investing there or expanding his factories would be worried about the political climate. The best thing that could be done for industrial advancement in Northern Ireland would be to achieve a political settlement, especially in relation to the hon. Gentleman's point, so that people can come to the Province knowing that there will be continuity of production.

Mr. Archer: Given the further likely effects on unemployment of the Rothmans' decision, remembering that the Anglo-Irish accord has been operating for nearly six months, and that one of the topics promised for consideration by the conference was the economic and social development of areas that have suffered most severely, what measures have resulted from the accord? If the answer is none, when may the unemployed expect to see such measures?

Dr. Boyson: After the accord, America promised extra help and investment to provide jobs on both sides of the border, especially in difficult areas. Conversations have continued since the accord, but the Americans have not yet reached a final decision. If America agreed to help industrial advance on both sides of the border, it would be of great help.

Enterprise Ulster

2. Mr. Cash asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if, following the recent review, he will make a statement on the longer-term future of Enterprise Ulster.

Dr. Boyson: The life of Enterprise Ulster is being extended for a period of five years, subject to its achievement of agreed reductions in average job costs. Its performance will be considered in periodic reviews which are undertaken of the programme of labour market intervention measures for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Cash: Will the improvements in cost-effectiveness expected of Enterprise Ulster have any effect on its ability to undertake major projects in the future?

Dr. Boyson: I am glad to reassure my hon. Friend on that matter. Enterprise Ulster is highly regarded by all communities in Northern Ireland. It is one of the best links that we have to bring people together in Northern Ireland. There is no doubt that a major building programme such as that in the Belfast view—[Interruption.] The view is very nice in Belfast, but I meant to say "zoo". Enclosures and other buildings have been constructed at the zoo. Similarly, the Ulster American folk park has been built. Other building work will be carried out in the future by Enterprise Ulster.

Mr. Hume: In the light of the Minister's remarks about the outstanding record of Enterprise Ulster—a record commented upon favourably by many independent organisations, including the European Commission—does he not believe that, with so much unemployment in Northern Ireland, there is a strong case for expanding the role of Enterprise Ulster?

Dr. Boyson: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman. I shall contact Enterprise Ulster to see whether the scheme can be expanded. The previous agreement was for a three-year period. In this case the period will be extended to five years, which shows the Government's confidence in the organisation.

Paramilitary Organisations

3. Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is his assessment of the scale of Loyalist paramilitary organisations and the danger they represent.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Nicholas Scott): The Government and the security forces keep under careful review all organisations which are paramilitary in character or associated with the use of violence. The security forces will continue to deal even-handedly under the law with threats to security or public order from all such organisations.

Ms. Short: I am sorry that the Minister has not answered my question, but has merely said that the Government will keep everything under review. Is he aware that Northern Ireland is massively armed—overwhelmingly so in the Loyalist community—with gun licences approved by the British Government? Will the Government undertake to review the many gun licences that are issued and call in some of them?

Mr. Scott: Firearms, shotguns, and, indeed, air rifles are under much stricter control in Northern Ireland than in Great Britain. If the hon. Lady has any particular suggestions for further restrictions in the law I shall obviously look at them, but at the moment we seek to exercise tight control in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hayes: Will my hon. Friend pay a particular tribute to Sir John Hermon for a courageous and sensible speech last week, when he made it clear that he and his officers will deal ruthlessly with that tiny minority of officers in the Province who behave in a party political manner?

Mr. Scott: I echo my hon. Friend's remarks, but the grounds for praising Sir John Hermon go much wider than that. He is a splendid leader of the Royal Ulster Constabulary and has been largely responsible for the progress that it has made in recent years.

Mr. Duffy: Does the Minister agree that if Unionist parliamentary representatives do not stand up to their back-room gunmen, the shameful statement of the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) outside Belfast city hall on Easter Monday, that democracy has been done to death, will indeed be fulfilled, not, as he went on to say, by Margaret Thatcher in Downing street, but in Northern Ireland by Unionist parliamentary representatives?

Mr. Scott: I regret all such actions and statements that seem to encourage unconstitutional or unlawful action. However, with the prospect of talks between my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State with Unionist leaders, I hope that constitutional action will now be pursued.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Does my hon. Friend agree that to deal effectively with the paramilitary organisations it is essential to have an effective extradition treaty with America? Does he also agree that for America to reject the new extradition treaty would be to deal a body blow to Anglo-American relations and call into question whether that country is seriously interested in suppressing terrorism?

Mr. Scott: The Government are bending every effort to secure the passage of the supplementary treaty on extradition with the United States. I do not believe that either the House or British public opinion would understand a failure to deliver that treaty through the Senate.

Assembly Elections

4. Mr. Bell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he proposes to announce the date of the Northern Ireland Assembly elections.

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Tom King): We want to discuss the future of the Assembly with the Northern Ireland political parties. In reaching a decision on new elections we shall clearly have to consider whether the Assembly will serve a useful purpose.

Mr. Bell: I note the Secretary of State's remarks, but why are salaries continually being drawn by those elected to the Northern Ireland Assembly and those elected to take their seats in that Assembly when no work is being done, not even the scrutinising of legislation by way of Orders in Council for this House? Is that in the interests of the people of Northern Ireland and in the interests of democracy in Northern Ireland?

Mr. King: The frequent complaint that is delivered by some of the absentee Members of this House is that the voice of Northern Ireland—or the Unionist voice—has not been listened to, and that is at the very time that they are failing to discharge their proper functions and to use one of the vehicles that could be most effective in enabling them to put forward their views. I note what the hon. Gentleman said. There is obviously great force in what he has said, and we are looking at the matter carefully.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson: Does my right hon. Friend agree that there is little purpose in holding further elections if the SDLP fight those elections but refuse to attend the Assembly? As they have already achieved the Anglo-Irish treaty, does it not behove them now to assist in the internal government of Northern Ireland? If they refuse to come to the Assembly and to give a promise that they will come to the Assembly, will my right hon. Friend dismiss from his mind any thoughts of calling any further elections?

Mr. King: My hon. Friend will have listened carefully to my original answer. As the Assembly will reach the end of its natural life in mid-October, there is no point in perpetuating that, or even continuing as long as that, if it is failing to fulfil any useful function. Therefore, I agree with my hon. Friend's other comment about the position of the SDLP. I wish that the Unionists would put the SDLP to the test, pick up the remarks of the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume), challenge him with that, and then see whether it is possible to obtain a new Assembly on a proper basis.

Mr. Flannery: It is not a political reality that the monority community has no faith in the Assembly? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the disucssions that will take place there will be with people who, for endless years, and in the future if they can, will carry on discussions which will keep them permanently in command and leave nothing for the minority community?

Mr. King: That is the gospel of despair that will lead the Province nowhere. The Government are determined to build on common ground between men of good will. If the hon. Gentleman believes that that is impossible, the future is bleak for the Province. I believe that effort must be made. The Government are determined to see whether it can be achieved, but obviously it needs considerable co-operation for it to be possible.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: Does my right hon. Friend accept that some of us were disappointed and disturbed by his first answer? If we are at all serious about devolving powers to Northern Ireland, as the Assembly represents a good spectrum of elected opinion in Northern Ireland, should he not continue his efforts to make it work and make the parties participate in it?

Mr. King: I know that my hon. Friend will be aware of some of the behaviour that is currently taking place within the Assembly and the fact that it is failing to discharge its proper functions. I would certainly agree wholeheartedly if we could achieve a basis on which the proper objectives of the Assembly could be achieved.

Mr. Mallon: Will the Secretary of State confirm that among those who have found it impossible to continue to attend the Assembly are his predecessor, now the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and the alliance party, and that non-attendance is not confined simply to the SDLP?

Mr. King: I am not clear about the hon. Gentleman's first point. My right hon. Friend did attend the Assembly, and Ministers were always ready to attend. The hon. Gentleman will appreciate—his hon. Friend the Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) made this point clear as well—that my understanding is that his party is prepared to become involved and would wish to take part in the new Assembly.

Tourism

6. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the response from the tourist industry to the announcement of the revised accommodation grant scheme in February.

Dr. Boyson: There has been an excellent response from the industry. As at 25 April 1986 there were 176 applications for grant-aid, which include proposals for the upgrading and improvement of 435 hotel bedrooms, and the construction of six new hotels, 21 new guest houses and 21 self-catering developments.

Mr. Leigh: How many jobs will be created by the scheme?

Dr. Boyson: While that building is taking place, I would estimate that about 200 people will find extra employment in the construction industry. When the hotels are completed there will be about 100 more people employed and there will be a spin-off for all the shops in the areas around.

Political Parties (Talks)

7. Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what action Her Majesty's Government propose to take in the light of correspondence between the Prime Minister and Northern Ireland political parties to hold round table talks with them.

Mr. Tom King: We hope that it will be possible shortly to start exploratory discussions with the two Unionists leaders to see whether a framework for dialogue can be established as suggested by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in her letter of 16 April.

Mr. Alton: I welcome the Secretary of State's answer. Does he not think that, given the willingness of the SDLP and the alliance party of Northern Ireland to enter into discussions without pre-conditions, the time has come to fix a date for those talks to begin?

Mr. King: In view of the position in which the two major Unionist parties find themselves, the first objective is to see whether it is possible for such a framework to be established. Obviously, thereafter, it becomes a question of the involvement of other parties in possible further discussions.

Lignite

8. Mr. Jackson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when work under the lignite prospecting licences announced in 1985 is likely to begin.

Dr. Boyson: Legal formalities for the issue of the three licences should be completed shortly, and I understand that the companies hope to start work this month.

Mr. Jackson: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. Will he expand on the benefits of lignite development for Northern Ireland?

Dr. Boyson: I hope that there will be benefits from what we are doing. The immediate advantage is that it will cheapen electricity production. That is why we are considering building a lignite-fired generating station at Crumlin. It should make electricity costs for industry and for homes in Northern Ireland equal to the lowest in this country and in Europe.

Mr. Foulkes: Will the Minister tell the House what effect the development of lignite will have on the supply of Ayrshire coal to power stations in Northern Ireland? In particular, will he confirm that it is planned that the Kilroot power station will continue to burn Ayrshire coal? Will he also tell us why the decision has been made in the short term to burn oil at the Belfast West power station—a very unwise decision—when the supply of Ayrshire coal can be maintained and guaranteed in the long term? Will the Northern Ireland Office hold discussions with the Coal Board about the use of Ayrshire coal in Northern Ireland and the devastating effect it would have on Ayrshire if the supply of coal to Northern Ireland were not continued?

Dr. Boyson: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's concern about coal sales from Ayrshire to Northern Ireland. The conversion of Kilroot from oil to coal burning is going ahead. The contract has been given to the NEI. We shall have to weigh the question of conversion at other power stations. Much depends upon the price at which coal can be bought. Electricity prices in Northern Ireland have continually been among the highest in the United Kingdom. As the price of oil is falling, and if coal is to be bought for Northern Ireland, we shall have to consider the price at which it can be bought from the Coal Board.

Mr. Hume: Is the Minister aware of the public concern that has been expressed by many residents in the Lough Neagh area about the possibility of damage being done to the environment by lignite mining? As the environmental quality of that area is the highest in Europe, does he not think that a public inquiry is necessary before a licence to mine lignite in the Lough Neagh area is granted?

Dr. Boyson: This is one of those times when I can answer yes. I agree entirely with the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume). We have granted a prospecting only licence for two years. There is no guarantee that a mining licence will follow. I have met objectors from East Tyrone in my office in Northern Ireland and I have read all the material that they have published. We have given a straightforward commitment—which has the agreement of my hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for the environment in Northern Ireland — that if a mining application is made by any company, a public inquiry will be held.

Mr. Archer: Does the hon. Gentleman appreciate that the danger envisaged by the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) applies to the prospecting itself? As Lough Neagh is listed in the Ramsar Convention on Wetlands as a site of international importance, have the Government given notice of their proposal to grant licences for prospecting, and have they made any assessment of its effect upon wildlife?

Dr. Boyson: Before we were prepared to give the three licences for prospecting, we took advice from wherever it was available and we listened to all the objections. I have been assured that prospecting can go ahead without any damage to the East Tyrone area or to the level of Lock Neagh. If prospecting had been a threat to the level of Lock Neagh, or to its boundaries, we should have had to think very deeply before granting the licences.

Security

9. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about the security position.

15. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the current security situation.

Mr. King: Since I last answered questions in the House on 27 March, two civilians and two members of the security forces have died in incidents arising from the security situation in the Province. The efforts of the security forces are continuing to yield results. Since the beginning of the year, a total of 264 people have been charged with serious offences and 95 weapons, 10,500 rounds of ammunition and 2,460 lb of explosives have been recovered. The House will wish to note that seven of these weapons and 1,240 lb of explosives have been recovered in the last six days.

Mr. Yeo: I am glad that my right hon. Friend is able to report such progress. Will he take this opportunity to make clear to the House, and above all to those extremists in Northern Ireland who are resorting to violence in their efforts to undermine the Anglo-Irish agreement, that the Government have no intention of being deflected from their purposes in signing that agreement, even if there were to be a regrettable, temporary deterioration in security?

Mr. King: One of the criticisms by some Unionists about the Anglo-Irish agreement that I find least acceptable is the implication that in some way the security forces will lessen their determination to fight terrorism. The figures that I have given to the House and the evidence of the last few days should make clear to everybody our determination to root out terrorism from wherever it comes. Yes, we have had successes in the last few days, but those very successes and the amount of bombs involved show clearly the scale of the threat that we still face.

Mr. Proctor: In order to reduce tension and improve security in Northern Ireland, will my right hon. Friend put intense pressure on the Government of the Republic of Eire to include in their forthcoming referendum on divorce a question about the repeal of articles 1 and 2 of the Republic's constitution? Will my right hon. Friend accept that it is no answer to say that we should not interfere in the internal affairs of the Republic?

Mr. King: I must admit that there is so much talk about articles 2 and 3 that I cannot remember what article 1 is about. I think my hon. Friend means articles 2 and 3. [Interruption.] I shall certainly study his request about article 1. I shall need to refresh my memory on it. I am on record publicly as saying that articles 2 and 3 do not contribute to better relations between the Republic and Northern Ireland. I hope that it will be possible at some future date for changes to be made. I certainly understand why my hon. Friend raises the matter.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: How is the security situation in Northern Ireland helped by the availability of kidnap insurance? I have here a letter written by Sedgewick UK Ltd., a City of London insurance company, offering kidnap and extortion insurance to a prominent citizen in Northern Ireland. What does the Secretary of State intend to do about that sort of thing? Does he intend to turn a blind eye, or, if he is committed to the restoration of peace in Northern Ireland, does he accept that he has a duty to intervene and prevent the sale of these policies on the open market?

Mr. King: I would be grateful if the hon. Gentleman would send me a copy of that letter so that I may study it. He knows that it is not an offence in the form of insurance, but it is an offence in Northern Ireland to pay ransom money to any proscribed organisation. This matter goes much wider than the question the hon. Gentleman asks. The whole question of rackets, of extortion, of protection is something on which we should take the strongest possible action.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my right hon. Friend accept that Protestant—originated violence in Ulster is relevant to Scotland, where there is a lot of sympathetic support, where caches of weapons have been discovered on numerous occasions and where many prosecutions have taken place? If he does accept that, what consultations is he having with the Secretary of State for Scotland to ensure that the violence does not come across to Scotland?

Mr. King: On these issues I keep in close touch with my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. The points made by my hon. Friend are correct, but perhaps he will forgive me if I do not go further into the matter at this stage. I assure him that his point is well taken.

Mr. Soames: In the light of the Anglo-Irish agreement, has my right hon. Friend noticed any improvement in cross-border security?

Mr. King: My hon. Friend will have noted recent events. I do not wish to go into detail about them, but I am satisfied that we are progressively developing closer co-operation on security and that this will undoubtedly be to the benefit of all those who wish to see a reduction in terrorism and its eventual elimination.

Anglo-Irish Agreement

10. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will make a statement on the operation to date of the Anglo-Irish agreement.

11. Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on meetings with the Government of the Irish Republic which have occurred arising from the Anglo-Irish agreement.

18. Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about progress in implementing the provisions of the Anglo-Irish agreement.

Mr. Tom King: Since the Anglo-Irish agreement came into force on 29 November, the Intergovernmental Conference has met four times and there has been one meeting of the legal sub-group. A joint statement was issued after each meeting, which gives an account of the issues discussed. I have placed these in the Library.

Mr. Latham: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. I wish that there was more than one Ulster Unionist here to listen to it. Is my right hon. Friend aware that since we live in 1986, not 1689, many of us hope that more could be done by the Churches to promote intercommunal reconciliation, which is implicit in the Anglo-Irish agreement?

Mr. King: I endorse to the full my hon. Friend's opening comments. It is a tragedy that Unionist Members of the House of Commons are not present to play their part, with the exception, to which I pay tribute, of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell). I certainly do look to closer co-operation between the Churches. Undoubtedly many Church leaders play an outstanding role in that respect. I should like to encourage that process even further.

Mr. Winnick: Is it not important for the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister to make it absolutely clear that, no matter what sort of intimidation there is in the Province, and what action is taken by the bully boys and the rest, the Anglo-Irish agreement will stand? If that is made clear, perhaps the time will come when the Unionist Members of Parliament will return to their seats here.

Mr. King: The position has been made absolutely clear, by both my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and myself on several occasions. We remain absolutely clear about that.

Mr. Nicholas Baker: Is my right hon Friend aware that many of us who are strong supporters of the Union are also believers in the Anglo-Irish agreement? Does he agree that one of the prospects, if the agreement were to fail, would be an internationalisation of the Northern Ireland problem, which, with the greater interest of perhaps the United States in an adverse way, and the United Nations, would spell disaster for Northern Ireland?

Mr. King: If the agreement were to fail because of intimidation and the sort of violence and obstruction that we have seen in certain quarters, that would be extremely damaging to the Union and would be catastrophic for the image and prospects of Northern Ireland overseas. We face many difficult problems. My hon. Friend the Minister of State referred to the difficult economic news coming out of Northern Ireland today. In that situation, we need maximum co-operation among all the people there. I believe that the Anglo-Irish agreement can contribute to that, if only Unionists are prepared to give it a chance.

Mr. Mallon: Now that there is consensus across the board in Northern Ireland that the use of plastic bullets and of the uncorroborated evidence of supergrasses should be discontinued, would it not, in the Secretary of State's opinion, be advisable for the Anglo-Irish conference to deal with those matters?

Mr. King: The hon. Gentleman's first point will arise shortly through another question on the Order paper, and my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State will reply. With regard to the second point, the use of accomplice evidence is under discussion at the moment. My right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General has commented on that practice. I understand the concern about it, but when we face terrorism there are real difficulties in making sure that we deal as effectively and fairly as we can with terrorist crimes.

Mr. Gow: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that no date has been fixed for the next meeting of the Intergovernmental Conference at ministerial level? Will he explain to the House why he cannot say that future meetings of that conference will be held in London rather than Belfast, and why he considers it desirable that the secretariat should be sited in Northern Ireland and not in London?

Mr. King: The answer to the first question is yes, Sir. In respect of the second question, it is not the practice to disclose the location of the conference, for reasons which my hon. Friend may understand. As to the third question, it is my belief that the secretariat is most usefully located in Belfast in order to discharge the work that it does.

Mr. Alton: Will the Secretary of State make it clear to those in Northern Ireland who want to try to break the Anglo-Irish agreement that it is the democratic wish of all the major parties in the House that, however many marches, and however much intimidation or violence there may be over the next few months, we will not tolerate any watering down of the Anglo-Irish agreement?

Mr. King: I have made absolutely clear my support for the Anglo-Irish agreement, but at the same time I have made it absolutely clear that this agreement is not designed to exclude the voice of Unionists from involvement in and contribution to the affairs of Northern Ireland, and that is what I wish to see.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Now that we have the Anglo-Irish agreement, what additional measure does my right hon. Friend propose to protect the members of the RUC, their families and their homes from the attacks that they have suffered? What can he do to stop a number of members of the RUC requesting transfers to return from Northern Ireland to the rest of the United Kingdom?

Mr. King: In respect of the latter point, I have to say that there is no evidence of this happening. I know that the RUC collectively is determined to combat and defeat attempts at intimidation. I know that the whole House will pay tribute to the courage of the RUC in the present difficult situation. I know also that the Chief Constable and the associations involved in representing members of the RUC are determined to stand together and take all necessary measures to defeat intimidation against them.

Plastic and Rubber Bullets

12. Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people have been killed or injured by the use of plastic or rubber bullets in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Scott: Since the introduction of rubber baton rounds in 1970, and plastic baton rounds in 1973, 15 people are believed to have died as a result of their use by the security forces in Northern Ireland. Since 17 March 1981, when records were first collated, 326 have allegedly been injured, all by plastic baton rounds.

Mr. Canavan: Bearing in mind that most of the victims were children or young people, many of them innocent bystanders, who were killed, blinded, paralysed or suffered brain damage, and now especially since the tragic death of Keith White, the use of such lethal weapons has been rightly condemned by many people of the Unionist tradition as well as people of the Republican tradition, will the Government support my Bill next Wednesday to abolish this barbaric practice for ever from the whole of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Scott: I shall certainly not support any legislation which takes away from the security forces in Northern Ireland a means of protection against the sustained and vicious rioting which they have had to endure over the period of these troubles. It may also be worth mentioning that the European Court of Human Rights has found that the use of baton rounds in Northern Ireland constitutes reasonable force.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson: Can my hon. Friend say what other form of defence would be available to the security forces if baton rounds were eliminated?

Mr. Scott: The short answer to my hon. Friend's question is that I know of no other means of protecting the security forces against rioting that would be as effective. Water cannon and CS gas have both proved to be ineffective. I know of no alternative to baton rounds at present.

Mr. Parry: My question No. 27 on the Order Paper is similar to that of my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan). I agree with the points that he made about the killing of innocent children and women, particularly the tragic death of Mrs Nora McCabe, and I fully support any demand in the House for the banning of these bullets.

Mr. Scott: I regret every death that takes place in Northern Ireland. It is worth reminding the House that well over 2,000 people have lost their lives in the course of the troubles over the last 16 to 17 years. I think that it is up to those who complain about the use of baton rounds and who wish to have them removed to come forward with an alternative that would be as good and as effective in protecting the security forces against rioting.

Long-term Unemployed Persons

13. Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what new measures are being introduced in Northern Ireland for the long-term unemployed.

Dr. Boyson: On 26 March I announced a package of enterprise and employment measures for Northern Ireland, all of which, I hope, will be helpful to the long-term unemployed. These will include individual in-depth counselling interviews, short restart courses, a £20 weekly jobstart allowance and extra job places available in Enterprise Ulster and action for community employment schemes.

Mr. Hamilton: My hon. Friend will agree, I am sure, that everybody who has the economic wellbeing of the Province at heart will welcome this imaginative package of measures. Can my hon. Friend give us any indication of how many job vacancies are filled every month in Northern Ireland?

Dr. Boyson: I believe that about 9,000 people every month get jobs in Northern Ireland — coming from unemployment or from full-time education — and that something equivalent to the total number of long-term unemployed are placed in jobs every four months.

Political Parties (Talks)

14. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what discussions he has had with political leaders in the Province since the signature of the Anglo-Irish agreement.

Mr. Tom King: I have met all the leaders of the major constitutional political parties in Northern Ireland at least once since 15 November—on a number of occasions in company with the Prime Minister. At all those meetings I have made it clear that the Government would welcome discussion about political development in Northern Ireland.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: What are the Government doing to regain the consent of the governed? Since adequate pre-existing machinery for Anglo-Irish co-operation and consultation is present, would not a protracted period of silence from the Intergovernmental Conference be most welcome and helpful?

Mr. King: My hon. Friend will be aware that in answer to an earlier question I said that I hoped there would shortly be discussions to see whether a framework for talks was possible. That is the most positive way forward, to see whether we can at last start talks to help regain the confidence to which my hon. Friend referred.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 1 May.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House, I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I shall be leaving for Korea and for the economic summit in Tokyo.

Mr. Banks: On this glorious international day of Labour, will the Prime Minister find time to study the terms of the petition presented at No. 10 Downing street last Saturday by Labour council candidates from the London borough of Newham? The petition showed that this year £5·5 million of rate support grant has been taken from Newham, making a total loss of £74 million since 1980, plus £11 million for the cost of the abolition of the Greater London council. Newham is the second most deprived local authority area in England, so why do the Government refuse to give us partnership status? When the Prime Minister returns from Tokyo, will she accept an invitation from me to come to Newham and see the effect of Government policies on the real East Enders of London?

The Prime Minister: London as a whole will benefit enormously from the abolition of the GLC.

Q2. Mr. Latham asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 1 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Latham: At the Tokyo summit, will my right hon. Friend press for the fullest possible co-operation and for the pooling of all scientific knowledge between East and West which will help to prevent any further disaster, such as that at the Russian nuclear reactor? Will she say that the only way to build confidence in the verification of nuclear weapons disarmament is if we deal effectively with civil catastrophes?

The Prime Minister: I agree wholeheartedly with my hon. Friend. These matters go way beyond the borders of any country, and must be dealt with on a global scale. I hope that all the details of that terrible accident at Chernobyl will be reported to the International Atomic Energy Agency so that we may all profit from it, and that inspectors will be able to go in to deduce precisely what happened. I also agree with my hon. Friend's deduction on the other point. Knowing something of what has happened in the Soviet Union and how difficult it is to get facts and assessments, it should make us wary in any arms control negotiations that we must be absolutely meticulous to get specific, practical and strict verification of any agreement.

Mr. Kinnock: Now that the prison officers have suspended their industrial action, thereby giving further evidence of their good will and sense of responsibility, why are the Governmet adding stubbornness to their original folly by refusing to engage in talks with them?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman knows that after questions there will be a statement on this matter. I am pleased that the prison officers have called off their action. Many of us were appalled that they ever took it, and I think that it has been salutary for them. I should like to thank the governors who stood at their posts, the police officers who also stood at their posts, and the police, who backed up the whole service.

Mr. Kinnock: Is the Prime Minister aware that the governors have strong sympathy with the conditions and difficulties which the prison officers face daily, and that the rise in the number of prisoners vastly exceeds the rise in the number of officers — [Interruption.] Yes. The ratio is 5,000:2,500. I know the figures. Is the Prime Minister aware that, unless the Government show a more rational attitude, what we have seen thus far, as a consequence of industrial action, will in any event come about simply because of the pressures in the prisons?

The Prime Minister: May I point out to the right hon. Gentleman what the Government have done to increase the facilities of the prison service. We implemented the report of the May committee on the prison service, which was established by a Labour Home Secretary. We ended the Labour Government's neglect of prison buildings by instituting the largest prison building programme in history. Spending on prison buildings is up by 400 per cent. We have increased spending on the prison service by 85 per cent. in real terms. On the specific point that the right hon. Gentleman made, and made wrongly, we have increased the number of prison officers by 3,000—that is 18 per cent.—at a time when the number of prisoners has gone up by 12 per cent.

Mr. Kinnock: Following that litany, can the Prime Minister tell me why Mr. Sidney Powell, the secretary of the governors' organisation, should say that the 12 per cent. population increase mentioned by the Prime Minister meant an additional 5,000 prisoners, and that the 18 per cent. increase in staff was about 2,500 officers? Will the Prime Minister come clean at least on this?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman confirms my assertion that the ratio of prison officers to prisoners has greatly improved.

Mr. Nicholas Baker: At the Tokyo summit, will my right hon. Friend impress upon Japan the importance of her undertaking and maintaining a greater share of responsibility towards the Third world than she does at present?

The Prime Minister: Yes, but we shall also be pressing upon Japan the fact that when she competes for contracts in the Third world she must also compete on a fair basis, and on a fair basis for credit as well.

Dr. Owen: Will the Prime Minister ask Sir Frank Layfield, who is currently writing his report on the Sizewell inquiry, to take full account of the disaster that has occurred in the Soviet Union? We have waited many years for this inquiry, and it would be very helpful for making final decisions if Sir Frank Layfield was able to take as much evidence as possible from the Soviet Union.

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman will be aware that the report of an inquiry is the report of the conclusions from the evidence given at the inquiry, and it cannot go further and include matters which have arisen since the inquiry. He will be the first to be aware that the reactor in the Soviet Union is totally different from any kind of reactor here. He will also be aware that the record of safety in design, operation, maintenance and inspection in this country is second to none. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will think it right to support the furtherance of such an excellent nuclear industry.

Mr. Viggers: Is my right hon. Friend aware that we are proud of the fact that she will be this country's representative at the Tokyo summit? Does she agree that the greatest single boost to world trade would be a reduction of trade barriers and a promotion of genuine free trade throughout the world? Does my right hon. Friend further agree that the reduction in oil prices provides a good background for such a new initiative, and will she propose such an initiative in Tokyo?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend that we need to reduce trade barriers. Between a third and a half of world trade is subject to some form of protection. For some time many of us have felt that it is time we had a new GATT round so that we can jointly get rid of or reduce some of the barriers. This is meeting with a good deal of hostility in some quarters, but we shall nevertheless continue to persevere with that line, both at the Tokyo summit and beyond.

Q3. Mr. Pavitt asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Pavitt: Is the Prime Minister not concerned and distressed by the fact that, as a result of her policies, we now have a record number of over 100,000 homeless people? Last year, an extra twist in the spiral meant a further 13 per cent. In the Conservative-controlled London borough of Brent my ratepayers are now paying £5,400 a day, week in, week out, for bed and breakfast and temporary accommodation, and taxpayers are paying a further £5,400 through the DHSS. Will the Prime Minister follow the good example set by one of her previous Ministers, the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), and spend three hours with me looking at the tragic families living in sleazy conditions so she can see for herself what is happening to family life in my area?

The Prime Minister: May I point out to the hon. Gentleman that there are 100,000 empty council houses in England and Wales, and that more than 30,000 of them are in London? A considerable number of these have been empty for over a year. It might be a good idea if some of them were brought back into use. Then there would then be less need for bed-and-breakfast accommodation.

Q4. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 1 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Atkinson: Has my right hon. Friend seen yesterday's ruling by the European Court of Justice against the price fixing of European air fares? Does that not at last pave the way for competition to reduce the level of fares to the level long enjoyed in the United States of America? Will the Government hold discussions with Lord King about the lead that British Airways should set?

The Prime Minister: We were very pleased with the decision of the European Court of Justice yesterday. It confirmed the view that we have held for a long time, which is that competition also applies to air fares. The people of this country owe a debt of gratitude to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport for his strenuous efforts, which have already reduced air fares. It is further backing of our belief in competition instead of rigging the market.

Q5. Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 1 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Lady to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. Dunwoody: As the amendment on the Order Paper concerning carers, which stands in the Prime Minister's name today, is almost identical to that tabled by the Opposition, would she be kind enough to tell us why it omits only two points? I refer to cash to support the carers and any mention of invalid care allowance.

The Prime Minister: I would be glad to place this Government's record on caring beside that of the Labour Government at any time, and I shall be especially glad to do so when the time comes.

Sir Bernard Braine: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, despite the lack of information from the Soviet Union about the disaster that has seriously affected its nearest neighbours, the Poles at least are taking all sorts of measures to protect their children? Will my right hon. Friend ensure that if any request for help with medicaments and special foods comes from that country, we will not hesitate to give it urgently and without any conditions?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for raising that point. If any requests come we shall, of course, look at them with the greatest sympathy and do our level best to get help there as soon as possible. We have offered the Soviet Union help on all technical aspects connected with the accident, but so far it has not seen fit to take it up.

Q6. Mr. Rogers asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 1 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Rogers: On 14 April the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy said that nuclear energy was the safest, cleanest and cheapest form of electricity generation. Which of those criteria does the Prime Minister believe to be the most important?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman knows —he must be struggling very hard for a question—all those criteria are very important. I hope that he is proud of the record of our nuclear industry and of those who operate it.

Mr. Onslow: When my right hon. Friend is invited to draw comparisons between Western and Soviet technology, will she bear in mind that the fact that the Russians failed to create their own Concordski does not mean that Concorde is unsafe?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend's question demonstrates most neatly the difference of approach between the two countries. We place great stress on the need for safety in the latest technology.

Q7. Mr. Winnick asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 1 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Winnick: Can the Prime Minister give any explanation of why 1986 has been such a wretched year for her? I am afraid that there is far worse to come.

The Prime Minister: I am still smiling and looking forward to my seventh anniversary, which will be about a halfway house.

Mr. Greenway: Does my right hon. Friend agree that what is lacking with civil nuclear power installations is an internationally accepted safety standard? Will she seek to encourage such a standard and its application in Russia, Great Britain and everywhere else in the world?

The Prime Minister: The accident in the Soviet Union has stressed that safety must be an international matter. We shall pursue this vigorously through the appropriate agency.

Mr. Lofthouse asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 1 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Lofthouse: Is the Prime Minister satisfied that a nuclear accident similar to that which occurred in the Soviet Union could not occur in this country? If not, will she assure the House that the Government will discontinue their interest in pressurised water reactors?

The Prime Minister: No, I can give no such assurance. I know that the hon. Gentleman has a specific interest in coal, but there are other people who work in the electricity and the nuclear industry, and who work very effectively. The industry was started in this country. It was one of our own technologies, and I would have thought that the hon. Gentleman, too, could be proud of its safety record and the way we have handled our nuclear industry, in terms of safety and economy.

Business of the House

3.31 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): May I ask the Leader of the House to state the business for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

TUESDAY 6 MAY—Until Seven o'clock, there will be a debate on the situation in Her Majesty's prisons on a motion for the Adjournment of the House. Consideration in Committee of the Finance Bill.

WEDNESDAY 7 MAY—Consideration in Committee of the Finance Bill.

Remaining stages of the British Shipbuilders (Borrowing Powers) Bill.

THURSDAY 8 MAY—There will be a debate on crime prevention on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 9 MAY—Private Members' Bills

MONDAY 12 MAY — Until Seven o'clock, Private Members' motions.

Motion on the Hong Kong (British Nationality) Order.

Mr. Kinnock: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. Will he ensure that the House is kept fully informed of any further details which the Government obtain about the consequences of the Chernobyl disaster? I am sure that he agrees that it would be appropriate to have a debate in the near future on the issues raised and highlighted by this most serious incident.

I thank the Leader of the House for responding constructively to our representations for an early debate on the Government's dispute with the prison officers. In the light of the emergency debate next Tuesday, will the right hon. Gentleman undertake to ensure that there will be discussion about the manner in which the orders for the Finance Bill are taken? When is the defence White Paper likely to published? Will the right hon. Gentleman provide time for the debate on foreign affairs which I have requested on several occasions?

I welcome next week's debate on crime prevention and express the hope that the Home Secretary will come forward in that debate with proposals for aiding elderly and poorer people with the cost of making their homes more secure and, similarly, for supporting local authorities which wish to make additional provision for crime prevention in their streets and housing estates.

I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman and all hon. Members would wish to pay tribute to Miss Roseanne O'Reilly, who retires today after working for almost 40 years in the Library. As the right hon. Gentleman is aware, for a long time she has been a most devoted servant of the House and has given Members of every party the most valued service in their requests for information.

Mr. Biffen: If I answer the questions in reverse order, I shall have the opportunity to open with my congratulations to Miss O'Reilly on her retirement and to echo what I am sure is the feeling throughout the House that she should have a most happy retirement, knowing that she will take with her the good wishes and appreciation of hon. Members.

As to next Thursday's debate on crime prevention, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department is in his place and will have heard the comments on the matters that may be canvassed during that debate. I accept that we need to turn to foreign affairs for a debate. I hope that that matter will be considered through the usual channels in the reasonably near future.

I understand that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence intends to publish the defence White Paper on 12 May.

Of course, I understand that the rearrangement, at late notice, of the business for the Committee stage of the Finance Bill puts a question mark over the order that had been chosen. It would be appropriate if that matter were considered through the usual channels.

I take note of what the right hon. Gentleman said about the importance of keeping the House informed of any consequences of the nuclear power station disaster in the Soviet Union. That is what we shall do.

Sir Fergus Montgomery (Altrincham and Sale): I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to the points put to him last week by the Leader of the Opposition about trying to attract American tourists to Britain and their anxieties about terrorist attacks. Is my right hon. Friend aware that, apparently, some people have been told by the State Department that they should not travel to Britain? Is not that a disgraceful line for that department to take? Exactly what have the Government done to impress upon the American Administration the safety of the Americans who come to this country? If that has not been done, why not?

On the debate on Monday week on the Hong Kong (British Nationality) Order, will my right hon. Friend say why we had such an unsatisfactory reply last week by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary? Is my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House aware that many of us are unhappy about the way in which the Indian minority are being treated in Hong Kong and that some of us are not prepared to support the Government on that issue unless changes are made?

Mr. Biffen: I simply do not accept that the reply which my hon. Friend found unsatisfactory was necessarily unsatisfactory to many of my other hon. Friends. That matter can be argued in substance when the motion is considered on Monday 12 May.

I have no knowledge about the United States State Department advising Americans not to visit this country. Of course, I shall refer the matter to my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary, because I agree with my hon. Friend that it would be most offensive if such assertions were made. My hon. Friend will have his opportunity on Wednesday, when my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary will be taking questions, to make his points directly to my right hon. and learned Friend.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Following the assurances that the right hon. Gentleman has already given, will he confirm that if there are any signs that the students who return from Minsk are adversely affected by radiation an immediate statement will be made to the House? Why were not the orders for the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive site laid during April? Will the right hon. Gentleman give an undertaking that there will be a full debate on the future of the nuclear industry in Britain?

Mr. Biffen: On the question about students returning from the Soviet Union, clearly my statement was a general one. The specific instances will be considered in the context of what I have said.

On the question of NIREX, it might be helpful if the hon. Gentleman recollected that I was pressed on that point last week by my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown). I have written to my hon. Friend saying that it will be the Government's intention to have a general debate on the policy of nuclear waste disposal. After that, the special development order will be laid before the House. If the order is prayed against, there will be a separate debate on that.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): As my right hon. Friend is always totally frank with the House and has a great understanding of European issues, will he confirm that our abatement is sacrosanct against the European budget and was agreed at Fountainebleau and that there is no requirement for the House to agree to a supplementary budget to ensure that we get it?

Mr. Biffen: I agree that I have a degree of innocence, but I hope that it is not carried to the extent suggested by my hon. Friend. Of course, I shall look at my hon. Friend's second point. I should prefer to make a considered judgment.

Mr. Leo Abse (Torfaen): I draw the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the early-day motion which has already been signed by more than 90 hon. Members on both sides of the House and which relates to family courts.

[That this House welcomes the establishment of the Family Courts Campaign to promote the early implementation of family courts, following the support for family courts recently expressed by the Law Society, the Association of County Councils, the Association of Directors of Social Services and many other bodies; welcomes the recommendations of the report of the Matrimonial Causes Procedure Committee, particularly those relating to the establishment of conciliation in matrimonial proceedings; notes with concern that the report by the Law Commission on Family Law, Illegitimacy, has yet to be implemented; further notes that the joint study set up in July 1984 by the Lord Chancellor and the Secretary of State for the Home Department to re-examine the idea of a unified family court, and study the resources implications in terms of finance, manpower and accommodation is due to be published shortly; regrets that this study has been so long delayed; and urges the Lord Chancellor and the Secretary of State for the Home Department to come forward with proposals for legislation at the earliest opportunity, following the publication of their report and their subsequent consultation on the most appropriate model for implementation.]

As it is expected that next week the Lord Chancellor will publish a report on family courts, may we have an assurance that we shall have a debate on the report so that the House can decide what its options are and so that the issue of family courts is not consigned as has happened to other reports, to the graveyard of Whitehall social legislation?

Mr. Biffen: I notice the anxiety of the hon. Gentleman. He will recollect that this matter was raised during business questions last week. I do not think that I can go beyond the answer that I gave then, but I take note of the hon. Gentleman's further comments.

Mr. David Mudd (Falmouth and Camborne): Will my right hon. Friend consider at a very early date instigating a debate on regional development grants in the light of the suggestion in today's edition of the Western Morning News that at the very least the Department of Trade and Industry has sought deliberately to misinterpret European Community policy in this matter; alternatively, has sought to use its presumed interpretation to swing support from the very needy areas such as Devon and Cornwall to the west midlands; or has actually used the new policy to cut back on aid to areas that most need it? I ask my right hon. Friend to consider this as a matter of urgency since one Cornish tin mine may well close tomorrow and the other four within three months from today.

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that my hon. Friend will understand at once that I cannot accept the interpretation of either the judgment or motive of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry contained in that important west country newspaper, but I understand the great significance of the issue, particularly in view of the current state of the tin industry, and I will draw it to the attention of my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): The Leader of the House will recall that on previous occasions I have asked for a debate on the standardisation and implementation of building regulations, particularly with respect to the use of glass in buildings. As these new regulations have not yet been published, and as it seems that we shall see no sign of them in the near future, perhaps the Leader of the House will find time for a debate in the House in order to bring some pressure to bear on the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Mr. Biffen: The most sensible immediate course would be for me to draw to the attention of my right hon. Friend the point that the hon. Gentleman makes, and this I will do.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): Since the Channel Tunnel Bill seems to have won the banana skin of the week trophy for violating the Standing Orders of the House, can my right hon. Friend shed any light on the Government's plans for this marooned item of legislation? In particular, can he indicate whether it is really wise to ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry or his parliamentary counsel to parade in front of the Standing Orders Committee, asking for a dispensation for the unfortunate errors that have occurred? Would it not be much wiser simply to give the petitioners of Kent adequate time within the original limits that should have been advertised, and an opportunity to present their submissions to the Select Committee?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend has had an entertaining week, but I do not think that there has been quite as much damage as he implies. The most helpful information that I can give is that we hope to arrange for the Second Reading of the Bill shortly.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): In view of the disastrous disposal of the George Brown collection from Newcastle university, will the right hon. Gentleman give us a chance to debate this matter, the disposal of objects from public and semi-public institutions, before more damage is done? Does he realise that in such a debate we could discuss the impending tragedy of the dispersal of the archive at Hersmonceux castle?

Mr. Biffen: What I can best do immediately is to refer these problems to my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Arts. Candidly, I see little prospect of a debate in Government time in the near future.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): Has my right hon. Friend taken on board the request for an early debate on the dangers resulting from nuclear disasters? If not, Her Majesty's Government will have to bring forward an alternative plan for preventing fallout from descending on those areas of the country, such as nuclear-free zones, that lack the civil defence resources for dealing with such a contingency.

Mr. Biffen: Many of these considerations, which derive from the unhappy incident in the Soviet Union, could well be encompassed in the foreign affairs debate that we will be having in the reasonably near future.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): I urge the Leader of the House to let the House have an early debate on the use of nuclear power, following the Soviet disaster. Will he bear in mind that, when we have the debate, it will be better if we do not have it on the Adjournment so that we can table an amendment on the lines of the policy statement that was carried by the Labour party conference calling for the phasing out of nuclear power? With a little luck, we might be able to get the Liberals to vote with us. I am not sure about the hang gliding party down the Gangway because when the wind blows that way, they might blow the other way.

Mr. Biffen: The experience of common voting between the hon. Gentleman's party and the other two parties of the Left will be a developing practice over the next few months.

As to the debate on nuclear power, there are aspects about the Soviet tragedy that can be related to the international spectrum, and so debated when we have the foreign affairs debate.

As to the wider issue, the House will shortly have a chance to debate the Government's response to the findings about nuclear waste disposal from the Select Committee on the Environment.

Mr. John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): Has my right hon. Friend noted from his postbag that the few complaints that Conservative Members have been receiving lately on such things as the US action in Libya, nuclear power, or even such matters as student grants, all seem to come from the more affluent section of society and not from the mass of the people? Could not we discuss this interesting phenomenon?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend is quite right to remind us of the limitations of postbag politics, and I shall judge the Shops Bill in that context.

Mr. Martin J. O'Neill (Clackmannan): Will the Leader of the House arrange an early debate on the contract that was signed between Vickers and the Ministry of Defence yesterday for the production of Trident submarines? It appears from what has been said that the Estimates will not be published until 12 May and that there is likely to be some delay thereafter. Can the right hon. Gentleman arrange for an early debate on a contract that is regarded as unique and by some of us as fettering a future Labour Government because of the terms of compensation, and on which we do not have even the prospect of scrutiny in the Library? Will he arrange at least that the contract is placed in the Library, and for an early debate on what is a constitutional outrage in the form of a contract?

Mr. Biffen: I shall look into the hon. Gentleman's request about the contract. As to the more general point, I shall take account of what he said, and I realise that for many Labour Members this is a matter of special significance to their future defence attitude. I cannot hold out much hope of a debate before the debate that we shall have on the defence White Paper.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Will my right hon. Friend arrange a debate next week about the meeting of the Finance Ministers in the EEC last Tuesday so as to enable my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to explain why he agreed first to a substantial supplementary budget, and secondly to having the figures massaged by moving much extra expenditure from 1986 into 1987?

Mr. Biffen: I cannot accept the situation in quite the way that my hon. Friend suggests. If I were now to disturb the business that I have arranged for the House next week, I should not be universally popular. My hon. Friend is an experienced parliamentarian, and will know that there are many opportunities outside Government time to make such points.

Mr. Ronald Boyes (Houghton and Washington): Does the Leader of the House recall that in a recent answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) he said that a Committee would be set up to review the opposed private Bill procedure? How far has he got on that? Will he give the House an assurance that no further progress will be made on the Channel tunnel until after the review is completed, which will allow for a more open and democratic decision-making process on that project?

Mr. Biffen: The establishment of that Committee is under consideration. I make it clear that its establishment will not result in our aborting legislation that is already in process.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): As we shall have a holiday on Monday and it is election day on Thursday, does my right hon. Friend feel inclined to act like the good headmaster that he is and allow us to have another two days off on Tuesday and Wednesday so that Opposition and Government Front-Bench Members can go out and discover what the people are thinking?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend should not offer that temptation. Nor should he give that general impression, as this is his last Parliament. He should be lingering here and savouring everything that it embodies, instead of which he is acting as though he had already retired.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Is the Leader of the House aware that, on Friday 11 April, a British citizen — an executive of the Bell Shipping Lines, which is a British company — was found at Dublin airport to have £300,000 in his suitcase? In so far as there is a connection between the transfer of that money and the operations of Control Risks Ltd., a London company which specialises in kidnap insurance matters, should there not be a full inquiry into the matter, and can that inquiry report to Parliament?

Mr. Biffen: I shall certainly look into the matter and refer it to whichever of my right hon. Friends is most relevant to deal with it.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): Is my right hon. Friend satisfied with the way in which the House discusses the grave events that occur day after day in Northern Ireland since, with one shining exception, the Ulster Unionists will not come to the Chamber? Since the Assembly is not working, is it not incumbent on the House to discuss the matters properly?

Mr. Biffen: The House continues to discuss the Province properly. It continues, traditionally, with Northern Ireland Question Time and it continues to deal with Northern Ireland orders as necessary. Whether hon. Members from the Province participate in our debates is essentially a judgment that they make having regard to their electorate.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): Does the right hon. Gentleman recall that, for two years, by means of petitions, early-day motions and questions, and by badgering him at business question time, I have tried to keep open the railway station serving Wembley stadium? May I thank and congratulate him, since last week he assured me that he would speak with great force to the Secretary of State for Transport, and yesterday British Rail decided that it would give in and not close the station at Marylebone.

Mr. Biffen: I do not deserve one shred of the hon. Gentleman's praise, but I happily accept it.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Will my right hon. Friend reconsider the request from hon. Members on both sides of the House for an early debate on the implications of the Chernobyl disaster? Will he give us an opportunity to consider the grotesque double standards of the anti-nuclear protesters who, when they wanted to demonstrate, chose as the first port of call not the Soviet embassy but the Department of Energy? Will he give the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) the opportunity to explain why he was with the protesters?

Mr. Biffen: As I have said, such a debate would be very educative, not least because it would enable us to have some insight into the motives of those who protest against civilian nuclear power. However, the House will have the opportunity in the near future to discuss nuclear power in respect of the Soviet disaster as well as our domestic nuclear programme. I hesitate to make any commitment beyond that.

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside): Will the Leader of the House ask the Prime Minister when she returns from her visit to the far east if she will make a statement to the House on democracy and human rights in South Korea and about the peaceful unification of the peninsula, which is official Government policy?

Mr. Biffen: It is the custom of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to make statements to the House following meetings such as the one in prospect. I shall draw to her attention the suggestion that she might cover those topics, among many others.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): May I invite my right hon. Friend to reconsider his advice that questions on the Russian disaster can be subsumed in a possible debate on foreign affairs? If that happened, there would be insufficient time for the House to consider our relationship with the United States, our relationship with Europe, the problems in the middle east and southern Africa, our relationship with the Association of the South East Asian Nations and human rights on an international basis, and the debate on foreign affairs would become a mockery. I ask my right hon. Friend to consider seriously having a separate debate soon on the disaster in the Soviet Union.

Mr. Biffen: My hon. and learned Friend makes a perfectly fair point, but, of course, it is a point that is frequently made about foreign affairs debates which, by virtue of their diversity, have to encompass a number of highly important topics. As I say, it is a matter for consideration through the usual channels and I do not want to raise expectations which I cannot fulfil.

Mr. James Callaghan (Cardiff, South and Penarth): The Leader of the House invites those of us who are retiring to linger and savour the atmosphere. Is he aware that the smell reaching most of us is that of the Government's decay?

Mr. Biffen: Well, it all depends where one sits.

Mr. John Watt (Slough): Will my right hon. Friend find time for a short debate on our policy towards bank holidays? In view of the Labour party's recent attempt to hide the red flag under the cloak of its new grey image, would it not be timely for the House to have the chance to consider scrapping the May bank holiday, which is an alien celebration of Marxist Socialism, and putting bank holidays on our national saints' days which can be days of patriotism?

Mr. Biffen: I just have a feeling that that is the kind of topic which, suggested tentatively and lightheartedly ahead of an election, causes more irritation than enough. I shall bear in mind what my hon. Friend is urging upon me, but I am not aware of any great public desire to see further change.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Has the attention of the Leader of the House been drawn to the allegations in The Guardian this week concerning the deaths of two British prisoners of war—a Mr. Fishwick, who died in a concentration camp, and a Sergeant John Dryden, who was handed over to the Germans and disappeared—and, in particular, the allegation that Dr. Kurt Waldheim was involved in those deaths? As it has proved impossible to obtain any information from the Government on that matter, will he be good enough to inquire from his colleagues whom one should ask about it; and, if no answer is forthcoming, may we have a statement or a debate on the matter?

Mr. Biffen: I see no particular profit in having a debate or statement on that topic or getting involved in the controversies that now rage between the World Jewish Congress and the supporters of Dr. Waldheim, but I shall consider the point that the hon. and learned Gentleman has made.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the staggering growth in driving licence abuse and that in 1984-85, 141,701 people were convicted of driving licence fraud? As more than 30 million driving licences are now in existence, none with photographs, will my right hon. Friend find time for the House to debate the urgent need to stop people who have been banned, are under age, or who do not even have the right to drive, from driving?—[Interruption.] This is a serious matter.

Mr. Biffen: Road accidents are undoubtedly a subject of the utmost seriousness, but I should have thought that at the moment the level of general controversy is at such a pitch that I would not willingly wish to add to it with the proposition of putting photographs on driving licences because that would lead to considerable public debate and acrimony. However, my hon. Friend has made a serious point, and I shall take it up with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): In view of the importance to our commercial success of matters relating to copyright and intellectual property, will my right hon. Friend consider arranging a debate on the White Paper on that matter?

Mr. Biffen: That is one of the many factors that I have to take into account when considering a forward programme. It is a most important topic. I only regret that I cannot offer a debate in the near future.

Prison Officers (Dispute)

3.59 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hurd): As I undertook in the House last night, I will, with permission, make a further statement on the situation in the prisons.

I reported to the House last night on events at Lewes and Northeye prisons. Disruption continued there during the night, but the situation has now been brought under control, though at both establishments, and particularly at Northeye near Bexhill, there has been extensive damage to buildings. Police intervention was necessary at Bristol to regain control of one wing of the prison, and at Erlestoke youth custody centre, near Devizes, some 40 trainees made a mass breakout and some 16 are still at large. The other serious incident was at Wymott, near Chorley, where there was a major disturbance but where staff gradually were able to regain control. A number of lesser incidents took place at 12 other prison establishments.

The situation in all establishments has now been brought back under control. I want to take this opportunity, as my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House did a few moments ago, to pay tribute to hard-pressed prison governors, those prison staff who remained at their posts, and the members of the police and fire services who have helped to restore the situation.

There will need to be an inquiry into these events. Its form and scope will have to be compatible with any police investigation into alleged offences, and I will keep the House informed.

I have taken immediate steps to try to ensure that, now that order has been restored, it can continue to be preserved. Prison governors are in touch with their local chief officers of police about the situation in their establishments. After consultation with me the acting president of the Association of Chief Police Officers has opened the national information centre at New Scotland Yard to collate and disseminate information relating to the police involvement in the prisons dispute. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence has ordered preparations in case military camps are needed to house prisoners as a result of the destruction of prison accommodation. Arrangements have been made to ensure a co-ordinated response by all Government Departments to the present difficult situation.

Although some of the violent action by prisoners may have been imitative, there is little doubt that the occasion for it was the overtime ban instituted by the national executive committee of the Prison Officers Association as part of its dispute about manning levels with the Prison Department. This both increased the prospect of trouble in the prisons and reduced the resources available to deal with it. I believe that not only the public but many members of the prison service, including many members of the Prison Officers Association, will have been appalled by the events of the last 24 hours.

I therefore welcome the decision of the national executive committee of the POA to suspend its industrial action to allow talks at the Home Office to take place. The POA asks in its statement for a reciprocal gesture, asking us to allow staff to work normally and to lift threats of suspension. There should be no difficulty about that. Staff temporarily relieved from duty, that is to say suspended, can lift their own suspension by agreeing to work normally. We cannot start substantive negotiations until the threat of industrial action has been removed. But I have invited the NEC to discussions at the Department with a view to the simultaneous calling off of the industrial action and the institution of discussions about the agenda for the future which I set out in my letter of 22 April to the POA general secretary, Mr. Evans.

The House will recall that this agenda involved: a rapid settlement of this year's pay claim, including the outstanding question of a reduction in the working week for prison officers; the immediate payment of tax compensation on housing allowance for 1985-86; and bringing forward as fast as possible—this is the crucial point—work on new shift systems and pay arrangements for detailed discussion with the POA, with a view to the new arrangements being in place by April 1987.

I very much hope that the national executive committee will respond positively and constructively to this package and that the talks I have set in hand will find a way through present difficulties. I shall do everything I can to ensure that the control which has been regained in our prisons is maintained and that a constructive way forward is found to settle this destructive dispute.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): The whole country has been appalled at the savagery of last night's events, their widespread nature and the anarchy which has prevailed. We deplore and condemn the violence and would like more information as soon as it is available about the report of two deaths at Northeye.

What we need and what the nation demands is an early resolution to this dispute. It is here that, especially after last night's events, which could and should have been foreseen by him, the Home Secretary has an inescapable responsibility. The Prison Officers Association has taken a constructive and statesmanlike step by suspending industrial action. Therefore, it is now for the Home Secretary to respond by facilitating discussions that could end the dispute. The right hon. Gentleman may not be aware that the national executive of the Prison Officers Association is not free unilaterally to abandon industrial action. A ballot was held under its own constitution, as well as under the Government's employment legislation, and a ballot is required for abandoning industrial action.

Following the last dispute in the prisons in 1980-81, when industrial action was taken, the court ruled that for industrial action to be abandoned the consent of the membership of the Prison Officers Association must be obtained in a similar way to which it was obtained when the action started. That was a ruling in the High Court by Lord Justice Browne-Wilkinson. Therefore, only the membership of the POA can remove that mandate for industrial action. For the membership to be able to do that, it needs to have a package from the Home Secretary placed before it for consideration.

I strongly urge the Home Secretary to instruct his officials immediately to get in touch with the NEC of the Prison Officers Association so that they can discuss the basis for a possible agenda for talks. Such a step might help to ease the way for the process that will end the dispute. I hope that the Home Secretary will take such constructive action urgently because a renewal of last night's arson and anarchy is too grim for anyone to contemplate.

Mr. Hurd: I welcome the change in the tone of the right hon. Gentleman's remarks since last night. He asked me a specific and serious question about reports of deaths at Northeye. He is perfectly correct: there were such reports. They came from a prisoner coming out. Since the authorities regained control at Northeye, they have made two thorough searches of the premises and have not been able to find anything to substantiate those reports. Obviously if there is any change it will have to be made known at once.

As I understand it, the right hon. Gentleman is completely accurate in the account he has just given of the requirements, not of the law of the land or the statute, but of the rules of the Prison Officers Association. That is a matter which can perfectly well be discussed in the procedural talks I have suggested.

I hope that the House and the right hon. Gentleman will understand why, in my view, it is not possible to start substantive negotiations until the threat of industrial action has been removed. On Monday I found myself in procedural discussions with the POA and there was talk of suspending action then. However, particularly dangerous action had got under way at Gloucester at that time and I have since learned that it was instigated by the POA. Therefore, at that time there was a strong feeling, which I shared, that one cannot have substantial negotiations under those conditions. That is why I have made the suggestion, which I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will recognise as having merit, of going for a simultaneous understanding for the removal of industrial action—taking account of his comments about the rules—and agreement on methods to start discussions of the agenda which I set out to Mr. Evans in my letter of 22 April.

Mr. Leon Brittan (Richmond, Yorks): Will my right hon. Friend agree that, in view of the vastly increased resources spent on the prison service by the Government, it is entirely reasonable to ensure that those resources are properly managed and not wasted on excessive overtime or unreasonable and unjustifiable working practices? Therefore, does my right hon. Friend agree that the POA is perfectly entitled to expect to take part in discussions on how that objective should be achieved and that the procedure my right hon. Friend has suggested is a proper way to do that?

Does my right hon. Friend also agree that, after what happened last night, the POA will forfeit the support of those most sympathetic to it unless the threat of industrial action is not just suspended but clearly withdrawn?

Mr. Hurd: I am most grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend. He has set out the position very succinctly, and I agree with all the points that he has made.

Mr. Roy Jenkins (Glasgow, Hillhead): Clearly, all right hon. and hon. Members wish the prospects for the talks well. Will the right hon. Gentleman accept that he was clearly right to stand firm on the position that it must be the prison governors, subject to the rules of the Home Office, endorsed by this House, and not the Prison Officers Association, who are responsible for running the prisons? However, will he also bear in mind that when he complains about the previous tone of comments from the Opposition and elsewhere there is one person, above all, who is responsible for the politicisation of the law and order issue, and that is the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, the chairman of the Conservative party? If the right hon. Gentleman cannot restrain his raucous colleague, he must expect the interchange to be both ways.

Mr. Hurd: I do not read my right hon. Friend's remarks in that way at all. My right hon. Friend is drawing attention to the results, in his view, of some of the social legislation that was introduced by the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins). I quite understand that the right hon. Gentleman may be sensitive about that, but I do not think that it has anything to do with this issue.

Sir Edward Gardner (Fylde): Will my right hon. Friend agree that this quite disastrous dispute has been brought about at a time when record sums of money have been spent by the Government on the prison service, that since 1979 the budget for the prison service has risen by 85 per cent., and that this enormous increase in money spent has been accompanied by an increase of 18 per cent. in the number of prison officers?

Mr. Hurd: Yes, indeed, and that at a time when the prison population has risen by 12 per cent. The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) was badly needed by the Leader of the Opposition a few minutes ago when the Leader of the Opposition produced, unwittingly, figures that showed that the ratio of staff to prison population had substantially improved during the lifetime of this Government.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Will the Home Secretary also agree that, if he were to cast his eyes back to the reply that he gave to me on Monday of this week with regard to the prison population, he would find that the number of persons on short-term sentences who have been paroled has risen by about 400 per cent.? Prison numbers as a whole have risen disastrously over the last few years, which in effect means that those being detained in prison are the longer serving prisoners for whom there is no hope of parole in many cases, as his predecessor indicated, in the long term. Therefore, will the Home Secretary agree that this has increased the pressures on the officers who have to guard these prisoners and look after their welfare? As a result of the absence of welfare services and recreational and other facilities, the POA has a perfectly credible case in seeking an increase in the number of prison officers in order to provide adequate and proper care for long-term prisoners that has been deliberately damaged by the policies of this Government.

Mr. Hurd: The balance of the prison population changes as we implement what seems to me to be the very sensible policy of keeping in prison longer those who have received particularly severe sentences for particularly heinous crimes. However, as the hon. Gentleman will know and as the figures show, the aim of our spending programme, as regards the increase in both prison places and prison officers, is not just to keep pace with the prison population but to tackle the problem of overcrowding.

Mr. Mark Carlisle (Warrington, South): In view of the fact that what happened last night in the prisons must have caused great concern not only to people in this country but to members of the Prison Officers Association, is it not best that we should all welcome the fact that the POA has decided unilaterally to suspend its action and wish well the talks to which my right hon. Friend has referred?

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend. I have tried to put forward a procedural suggestion, which is, I hope, in line with what he has said.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): I think that the Home Secretary is failing to take full responsibility for a situation that has been building up for a very long time. I invite him to visit Winson Green prison in my constituency and to take with him the Prime Minister, who clearly does not understand the situation either. No education classes have been held and no workshops have been open in Winson Green because of the strain and the pressure on the Prison Officers Association.

We cannot look simply at the rise in the prison population; we have to look also at the rise in the remand population. That requires far more work because of visits to court every day. The Prison Officers Association has appealed for months for the Home Secretary's support to reorganise the prisons so that the prison officers are able to work reasonably and so that conditions for prison officers and prisoners can be improved. These appeals have been rejected. That is the cause of the build up of this great tension. It will not be resolved without talks that should be entered into unconditionally.

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Lady is right when she says that the story goes back a long time. Indeed, it goes back to the time when no money was being spent either on staff or on prisoners. The situation was deteriorating, without any remedy being sought.

The hon. Lady is also right to draw attention to the problem of the remand population. She will know of the efforts that we are making to reduce the remand population —for example, by experimenting with time limits on trial delays. I am very conscious of that problem. We are anxious to discuss these matters, and proposals to deal with them, with the POA, but on the basis which the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) agreed —that we should consult, but that, if agreement cannot be reached, then management decides.

Mr. Charles Morrison (Devizes): My right hon. Friend will be aware that the situation at Erlestoke, in my constituency, would have been much worse if it had not been for the action and dedication of the prison governor, some members of the staff and police from Hampshire, I believe, as well as from Wiltshire. As prison officers are employed by the prison service, does my right hon. Friend agree that it is high time that they lived up to their sense of duty and responsibility and negotiated responsibly, particularly as their salary level, according to the national earnings survey, is now second only to that of newspaper printers?

Finally, in order to reassure members of the public who live in the vicinity of prisons, will my right hon. Friend review the provisions for security in prisons, in case of an emergency, so that the chances of future escapes are less likely? Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the troubles with some prisons — and this is true of Erlestoke—is that it appears to have been built for nice people but that some people inside it are very nasty?

Mr. Hurd: I agree with all of my hon. Friend's points. I certainly agree that the inquiry which, as I have said, will be necessary will have to encompass, in one form or another, his point about security in places like Erlestoke.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): As the Home Secretary has told us that it has been necessary for the police to be involved at several prisons during the past 24 hours, will he also tell us whether any of these police officers have been issued with guns?

Mr. Hurd: No, not to my knowledge.

Sir John Farr (Harborough): Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the most important statistics must be the relationship between prisoners and staff? How does that relationship today compare with the relationship in 1979? While my right hon. Friend is dealing with that question, will he also please confirm that the death at Gartree was in no way connected with the dispute?

Mr. Hurd: Yes, I can confirm, according to the information that I have received, that the death which regrettably occurred at Gartree last night had nothing to do with the prison dispute. I missed the crucial point of my hon. Friend's first question.

Sir John Farr: I asked my right hon. Friend about the relationship between staff and prisoners in 1979 and how it compared with the position today.

Mr. Hurd: The mathematical relationship has improved. I do not have the figures in the exact form that my hon. Friend wants, but it flows from the figure that has already been mentioned in the House: that during our time in office the number of prison officers has increased by 18 per cent. and the prison population by 12 per cent.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): Is the Home Secretary able to tell us whether governor grades, prison officers or prisoners were injured during the events of last night and this morning? Does he agree that the creditable decision by the Prison Officers Association to return to work is a sufficient gesture for talks to be resumed without any futher preconditions, and, if not, why not? Does he agree that it might be wise to approach the agenda for talks with a view to arranging a no-strike agreement between the Prison Officers Association and the Government? Will he take steps to review the prison building programme so that the building is carried out where it is most needed, because that is not happening at present?

Mr. Hurd: There were a number of minor injuries, but so far I know of no major injuries. It is something approaching a miracle that people were not badly hurt or worse during what happened last night.

I tried to explain why I used rather careful phrasing in outlining the nature of the talks that can now take place, and why it is not sensible to expose ourselves again to the sort of exchange we had on Monday about the relationship between talks and industrial action. I think it was on Tuesday that I answered a question by my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) about the possibility of a no-strike agreement. It would have to be by agreement, but many hon. Members on both sides of the House would be attracted by that idea.

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): Does my right hon. Friend accept that many people regard his handling of this dispute as positive and welcome the initiative for further dialogue with the POA? First, when he meets the representatives of the POA, will he remind them that the POA is a uniformed service of the Crown and its industrial behaviour imposes upon other services of the Crown, notably the police and perhaps the armed services, an obligation to pick up the POA's failings? Secondly, will he also remind them of the extent of investment in the prison service and especially about the prison building programme? After years of neglect by the Labour Government, that is an advantage not only to the prisoners but to the prison officers.

Mr. Hurd: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend's first point. He is a former prison governor and the point comes with particular force from him. I also agree with his second point. Five new prisons were opened in 1985-86 and 15 more are due to open by the early 1990s. Some 11,500 new prison places are being created. That is a substantial programme and it is in addition to refurbishment and the provision of sanitation. I do not agree with the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) that the prisons are being built in the wrong places.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): Does the Minister remember that yesterday a Conservative Member talked about prison officers earning £15,000 a year? The number of prison officers has been increased but not sufficiently. Is it not to be condemned that officers are working as many as 20 to 30 hours a week overtime? That is because there are insufficient prison officers to do the job.

Will the right hon. Gentleman take note of what my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) said about education? The Select Committee on Education, Science and Arts had on it some hon. Members from the Government side and it placed before the House a most important report setting out the cuts in education in the prison service. It showed that there were insufficient officers to escort the prisoners to classes. We had a debate on the matter but that got us nowhere, even though we warned about what would happen. When will the Government take note of that report and do something so that prison officers do not have to take action?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Member spoke about prison officers' salaries. The average pay is £15,000, and that includes overtime. Overtime is not compulsory and quite a number of prison officers do not work overtime. However, a good many work 20 to 30 hours overtime a week. That is thoroughly bad but, to a large extent, it occurs because of the working practices and shift arrangements. That is one reason why it is crucial for us to discuss and change these arrangements.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): Is it not the unpleasant truth that those who were properly sentenced to terms of imprisonment are now at liberty, and that substantial damage has been done to public property as a result of a breach of duty by the very people who have a special duty to protect the public interest?

Mr. Hurd: There must be widespread anxiety in the country and, indeed, within the ranks of the POA about the events of last night. They were appalling and must on no account be repeated.

Mr. James Lamond (Oldham, Central and Royton): Does the Home Secretary feel that he is assisted in any way in grappling with this great problem by hearing at Prime Minister's Question Time perfectly serious questions about the matter being greated by jeers and boos and shrieks of laughter from the Government side, led by the Prime Minister herself?

Mr. Hurd: I am sorry to return to the matter, but I think it may have arisen because the Leader of the Opposition thought he was making a case in support of his argument but was in fact, making a case against it.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): I fully support the action the Home Secretary has taken. Will he assure the House that contingency resources will be available speedily to restore order and security in the unfortunate event of a further outbreak of industrial unrest?

Mr. Hurd: I referred in my statement to arrangements involving the police and to arrangements between each governor and each prison and the chief officer of the local police forces. I also mentioned central arrangements involving the Government and particularly my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): What proportion of the governor grades and the management of the prisons in the Home Office are former prison officers? How does the figure compare with promotion through the ranks of the police?

Mr. Hurd: Obviously, the structures are different, but I shall let the hon. Gentleman have the figures.

Mr. Derek Spencer (Leicester, South): Leicester gaol has a special secure unit. Can my right hon. Friend reassure those hon. Members who have similar units in their constituencies that their special requirements have an appropriate high priority?

Mr. Hurd: I certainly give my hon. and learned Friend that assurance. As he will know, there was some trouble in Leicester prison last night. The problem is not entirely resolved in that my last report was to the effect that POA officers at the gate were still discouraging staff who turned up for duty. I hope that that problem has been resolved by now.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Would it not be advisable for the Prime Minister to abandon her jaunt to Tokyo in view of the fact that she is personally responsible for this trend in the breakdown of law and order which is a direct result of her Government's policies? If she does go, is it not a fact that nobody else in the Cabinet will be able to take any decision at all until she comes back?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Member is in his usual wild and flaming form. He seems to have very little notion about how these affairs are conducted.

Mr. Michael Marshall (Arundel): Will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to assure those of us who have open prisons in our constituencies, such as I have at Ford, that the experience at Northeye has not been the general pattern? We accept that the prison officers and the governor did a good job in keeping things normal.

Mr. Hurd: Yes. That gives me an opportunity to say that not only at Ford but at the great majority of prison establishments there was no trouble last night.

Mr. Ian Lloyd (Havant): The country will have heard with immense relief the Home Secretary's statement this afternoon. Before too many diverse and disreputable organisations seek to parade their spurious claims against society under the banner of "industrial action", will my right hon. Friend make it perfectly clear that industry is not involved in this? We are talking about not action but inaction, and what we are seeing is civil disruption. Can he make sure that in future that phrase is used to describe this kind of action against society when organisations, however various, parade their grievances in the street?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend is quite right. We have lapsed into this jargon but it is not accurate and can be unhelpful.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): Is the Home Secretary aware that Mr. Peter Clarke, the officially adopted Conservative candidate for my constituency who describes himself as a loyal Thatcherite, made a public statement last week describing the prison service as incompetent, inefficient, brutal and stupid. He went on to call for the privatisation of the penal system. Would the Home Secretary care to comment on those Tory policies?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Member seems to have a particularly enterprising opponent, and I look forward to the intellectual debate that will follow.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Is not my right hon. Friend currently undertaking a study into alternatives to prison and to the possibility of reducing prison population by that means? In his talks with the POA, will he give priority to getting prisoners to education classes and make that part of the future duties of prison officers?

Mr. Hurd: One of the difficulties about the present situation is that prison officers are caught up with other activities. As my hon. Friend says, they might be better employed escorting people to and from education classes.

My hon. Friend asks about alternatives to custody. He knows that we cannot in any way direct the courts about who should go to prison, but where the courts can be persuaded that there are tough and practical alternatives to custody for minor offences, I hope that they will take them up.

Mr. John Ryman (Blyth Valley): May I ask the Home Secretary two specific questions? Does he agree that one of the fundamental problems is that basic pay is far too low in the prison service, so that to make a living wage a prison officer has to work overtime? That is why a vast amount of overtime is worked—the basic pay is insufficient to live on.

Secondly, what does the right hon. Gentleman propose to do about the extraordinary circular with which he has been inundating the judiciary, telling them what they already know—that their sentencing powers are very wide? I suggest that it amounts to an attempt to interfere with the judicial process.

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman's second point is nonsense. I answered questions about that before. The circular strictly followed precedent and was issued with the agreement of my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor. I think that the hon. Gentleman asked me two identical questions last night. The answer to the first is the same as last night—that there is scope for negotiations between the Treasury and the Prison Officers Association on basic pay. The irony is that those negotiations were about to begin when the present dispute escalated. I hope that if the procedural talks that I have outlined are successful, the substantial negotiations between the Treasury and the POA on basic pay can start.

Mr. Kenneth Warren (Hastings and Rye): Will my right hon. Friend take account of and give praise to the excellent work of the Sussex constabulary in containing the problems at Northeye? I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Mr. Wardle) will want to refer to that if he catches your eye, Mr. Speaker. Will my right hon. Friend praise the police for the way in which they contained a serious situation and for looking after prisoners in my constituency?

Mr. Hurd: I have heard praise from all quarters for the work of the Sussex constabulary. It received small quantities of help swiftly from Kent and Surrey. Two prisons are involved — Lewes and Northeye. The constabulary has performed a necessary job skilfully.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Does the Home Secretary accept that it is important to try to reach a settlement before the weekend, because at the weekend, in Leicester and elsewhere, prisons are manned to a large extent by people working overtime. If overtime is not to be worked, deputy governors and others who have been filling in from one prison to another will not be able to do so because they will have to look after the places where they are ordinarily stationed. Has the right hon. Gentleman contingency plans, and, if so, what are they?

Mr. Hurd: The answer to the second question is yes, but I shall not tell the hon. and learned Gentleman what they are at this stage. The answer to his first question is that I hope that it is inconceivable that the action will be resumed between now and the weekend. That would be the height of irresponsibility.

Mr. Robert Atkins (South Ribble): Is my right hon. Friend aware that my constituents will be immensely grateful to the police from Leyland, who were called in to assist at Wymott prison, which is immediately adjacent to my constituency boundary? We are extremely grateful to them for what they have done. Is my right hon. Friend further aware that we on the Conservative Benches are getting a little sick of the sanctimonious claptrap from the Oppostion Benches, bearing in mind the Labour Government's irresponsible management of the prison service over the years compared to ours? We have caught more criminals, imprisoned more prisoners and are building more prisons.

Mr. Hurd: It is true that we have grasped and are trying to deal with the problems, which are much worse than they need have been because they were shirked by the Labour Government.

Mr. Ken Eastham (Manchester, Blackley): During this fearful and disastrous period for the Home Office, may I remind the Home Secretary that in the major cities we have the oldest, most overcrowded and worst prisons? This is causing great anxiety in built-up city areas. Will the right hon. Gentleman give an assurance that there will be no overspill of fear and disaster in communities in cities as a consequence of the disturbances?

Mr. Hurd: It is true that many of the Victorian prisons are in the heart of county towns and cities. It is an essential part of our programme to build new prisons, as in my own county, which will partly or wholly replace those prisons, or to refurbish them. They were extremely well built. If their design can be modernised, they still have a good deal of life in them, in many cases.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): Has my right hon. Friend taken the opportunity, in his talks with the Prison Officers Association, to remind it that this Conservative Administration not only say that they care about the prison officers' future and their working conditions, but, unlike other parties, have announced the biggest building programme in the history of the prison service? We have shown to the prison officers that we care about their future. I hope that in return they will help us in the fight to maintain law and order.

Mr. Hurd: I agree with the spirit of my hon. Friend's remarks. I hope that we can recover from this disastrous situation and, as my hon. Friend wishes, build up in the mind of the public once again the importance and necessity of the work that the prison officers do. We can all help in that.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to take into account the subsequent business before the House. This afternoon I have given precedence to those who were not called last night. I shall now endeavour to call all those who have been standing provided that questions are brief.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Now that the Home Secretary is almost halfway to getting his earhole belted by a group of trade unionists, will the settlement be of the "Solomon Binding" variety, or will it be in the upper quartile? Whatever course is taken, is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the British people will not be hoodwinked by the Government? The Government were elected in 1979 on a law and order ticket and promised a short, sharp shock for prisoners and to set the British people free, yet seven years later here we are with the Tory Government delivering a short sharp shock, not to prisoners, but to the British people and setting the prisoners free.

Mr. Hurd: That was not too subtle, and I disagree.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): I welcome the news that further talks are to take place, but does my right hon. Friend agree that the prison officers who took part in the action yesterday showed a gross and inexcusable dereliction of duty?

Mr. Hurd: I think that prison officers will want to reflect carefully on the action that they took in response to the request of the national executive of the POA, and will want to think carefully about the consequences which, in a minority of cases, flowed from it.

Mr. Robert Kilroy-Silk (Knowsley, North): Does the Home Secretary accept that for a long time many of us have opposed some of the abuses of prison officers, which are so detrimental to taxpayers, prisoners and their families, but those abuses should have been dealt with by himself and his predecessors a long time ago? They can be fairly dealt with only by patient and long negotiations, not by the seemingly provocative, confrontationist politics on which the right hon. Gentleman is embarked. Will he give an assurance that in any further talks not only will there be no preconditions, but that part of the package for ending the dispute will include proposals to reduce substantially the prison population, thereby creating a constructive and positive regime for prison officers and prisoners?

Mr. Hurd: I am in favour of patient discussion of those matters as long as there is progress. The trouble is that over many years progress in that area has been extraordinarily slow. It is not our action that has been provocative in the past few weeks. The hon. Gentleman makes his point again about reducing the size of the prison population. He knows that I have no direction over the courts in that matter, so what one is talking about is persuading the courts that, in certain cases, as I have said, there are tough and practical alternatives.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Does my right hon. Friend accept that the sit-in at Leicester prison during the night by 48 prisoners was peaceful only because of the able assistance given by five assistant governors? Will he join me in congratulating those assistant governors? Is he satisfied that there are enough assistant governors around to help? What will be done at the Old Bailey, which I understand had to be closed at 2 o'clock today because there were not enough prison officers to take the prisoners back to the remand centres?

Mr. Hurd: I shall keep an eye on the situation in Leicester to which my hon. Friend referred. I hope that the position in the law courts can revert to normal once the suspension of action takes effect.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Is it not true that overcrowding in Britain's prisons is now so severe that more than half of Britain's prisoners are still slopping out, in 1986? Is it not true also that, even after the implementation of the Government's building programme, by 1991 there will still be 24,500 prisoners slopping out and, even after the completion of the programme by 1999, there will be 18,500 of Britain's prisoners slopping out? How is it possible to get peace in the prisons until conditions are improved?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman should really be ashamed to make that point. What we are doing is retrieving a situation of scandalous neglect. It is not just a question of the new prisons, which obviously are built with new sanitation, but of the refurbishment of existing prisons which means that integral sanitation is being installed in 10,000 existing cells. That is quite a programme.

Mr. Tim Rathbone (Lewes): My right hon. Friend may be reassured to hear that I visited Lewes prison this morning and found that the governor and his assistant did a remarkable job last night. They are tired but in good heart today. The majority of the prisoners have behaved within all the rules of the prison. I believe that the majority of prison officers at Lewes prison would have wished to behave and to do their duty in the normal way. Unfortunately, there is a small coterie, both within the prisoners body and among the Prison Officers Association, which stirs up this trouble. This was illustrated in a response to the governor himself by one prison officer, who, when greeted, said with a threatening smirk, "Ah, but the day is not over yet." I hope my right hon. Friend will ensure that communications between all members of the Prison Officers Association will be as good as his communications with the officers themselves.

Mr. Hurd: I am glad that my hon. Friend visited Lewes prison this morning. The situation at Lewes was one of the most difficult, and there are still difficulties, as he has just told us. I have taken careful note of what he said.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): Is the Home Secretary aware that this problem will not be solved simply by negotiations or discussions between prison governors, assistant governors and the Association of Chief Police Officers, because one of the major problems in the prisons throughout Great Britain is that a prison officer cannot in any circumstances become a governor or an assistant governor, and most of the governors and assistant governors are direct entrants from the college at Wakefield into the prison system, without any experience of managing difficult prisoners, let alone short-term prisoners? This matter will be solved only through negotiations between the Home Office and the Prison Officers Association. Generous as I am at times, I must say that of the four former Home Secretaries still in the House of Commons, three would have resigned on this issue, and the right hon. Gentleman really ought to follow the example of those three.

Mr. Hurd: I think that it was one of the hon. Gentleman's hon. Friends who raised the question of the different structures of the two professions, the police and the prisons, and, of course, they are different. I have been very impressed by the high quality and sensitivity of prison management, and I believe, from what I hear, that there has been a substantial improvement in that quality in recent years.

Mr. Charles Wardle (Bexhill and Battle): I have reported to my right hon. Friend what I saw at Northeye last night and again this morning after the prison was retaken. Will he recognise that a potentially very dangerous situation was contained largely because of the courageous action of the prison governor and chief officer, and because of the prompt and highly professional support of the Sussex police? Will he accept that the unavoidable impression from what I saw last night was that the riot would not have taken place if there had not been an overtime ban? Will he bear in mind that the total and wanton destruction of Northeye should be contrasted with the recent completion of five new prisons, with 15 more prisons to be completed in the next few years?

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for passing on the news of his visit to his constituency prison. The two Sussex prisons were among the most difficult. My hon. Friend was in close touch with me last night, and I am most grateful to him for his efforts.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): Has my right hon. Friend heard the recent report from Bristol prison, with which I have been in touch all day, that that branch of the Prison Officers Association is still meeting to decide whether to obey the advice of its national executive and call off the overtime ban? If that report is correct—and I have no way of being certain about it—will my right hon. Friend join me and our hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of the Environment, who is also concerned with this issue, in calling upon the Bristol branch to take the advice of the national executive and contemplate the results of its inaction last night?

Mr. Hurd: I have not heard the report. Indeed, the report that I had from Bristol was rather to the contrary, that the local Prison Officers Association chairman, before the national executive decision, stated that staff would work normally there today, whatever the national executive decided. Obviously that needs looking into. If the situation is as my hon. Friend describes, I shall certainly agree with his appeal.

Mr. Kaufman: The Home Secretary, in response to his hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames), said that the prison officers' action had been taken at the request of the national executive of the Prison Officers Association, whereas the position is precisely the opposite, namely, that the national executive of the Prison Officers Association took the action on the mandate of its membership, who, under the Government's own legislation, took the Government's preferred course of a ballot, in which 78 per cent. voted. Of that figure 81 per cent. voted in favour of industrial action, which, as the Home Secretary has now acknowledged to me, under the ruling of the High Court cannot be abandoned, as he demands, without a further ballot. That being so, following his statement and his responses today he may be in danger of imposing requirements for talks which are too rigid and may lead to a breakdown. I therefore recommend that the right hon. Gentleman studies the words that I put to him—they were not phrased idly and they were not put to him idly—since that kind of approach could be a means of achieving talks that might end the dispute.

Mr. Hurd: I shall certainly do what the right hon. Gentleman said at the beginning. I accepted when he first made the point that, because of the nature of its rules and the legal decisions that have flown from its rules, the Prison Officers Association has a procedural problem. There was nothing in the law of the land that forced the association to decide to instruct its members to follow the particular form of highly damaging and destructive action that it took. There was nothing that compelled it to do that. Therefore, I stand by what I said, but I will, of course, study all constructive suggestions that have been made.

Opposition Day

[13TH ALLOTTED DAY]

Caring for the Carers

Mr. Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

4.47 pm

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): I beg to move,

That this House, noting that there are an estimated 5·5 million people from the age of seven to 70 years caring for disabled and elderly relatives at home, often for many years, pays the warmest possible tribute to those carers; and, further noting the research which shows that carers themselves suffer disproportionately from mental and physical illness, social isolation and poverty, calls upon the Government to take urgent action to improve their position, especially in view of the undoubted savings to public funds which flow from their commitment, and in particular to ensure that, in line with its stated policies on care in the community: (i) adequate respite care, both at home and in short-stay facilities, be assured by a considerable improvement in the level of support given to statutory and voluntary agencies, (ii) a flexible system of cash and other appropriate support services, such as home helps and home nursing, be available at times when the carer needs them and (iii) the invalid care allowance is made available to married women carers as recommended by the Select Committee.

Community care policies have been advocated now for a decade on the basis that it is much better for those who need support because of physical or mental infirmity to be cared for outside large institutions. It is now becoming increasingly recognised, however, that that policy has merely shifted the burden of care from the trained and supportive to the untrained and isolated in the form of the family. What started off as a policy of keeping dependent people out of institutions has backfired to the point where it has created more mentally and physicaly ill people—this time those who are supposed to be the carers.

At present, carers save the state over £5,000 million. That would be the cost to the state if it had to provide alternative institutional care. One would think that the state would aim to put back some of that money to support them in their invaluable role. Instead, the Government have been offloading responsibility on to their shoulders without even a sideways look at how they should be helping.

At present 5·5 million men and women are caring for an elderly or disabled friend or relative who could not live safely or comfortably without their help. They include about 1·25 million people who are caring for someone who is severely or extremely severely handicapped. I understand that as many as 100,000 of them have been caring for more than 10 years, and that thousands have been caring for as many as 30 years or more. Those figures give the lie to the myth that we are no longer a caring nation.

Today, far more people than ever before are making a major contribution to the physical and mental health of a family member, but they can maintain that role only if they have support. The Opposition have tabled this motion because of the absence of that support in far too many cases.

About two out of three carers are in poor physical or mental health at any one time. Recent surveys have shown that nearly half are at serious risk of mental illness. Nearly seven in 10 suffer physical injury as a result of their caring duties, because there is a great deal of single-handed lifting involved, unlike in hospitals where nurses are ordered to lift only in pairs or using the appropriate hoists. The position is made worse for carers when a back injury cannot be rested or a hernia repaired because there is no one to take over their caring duties while they are in hospital.

Carers suffer emotional and psychological stress from social isolation, when other family members flatly refuse to help, or when statutory services simply fail to materialise in support. The complete submersion of one's own needs and preferences in those of another and feeling wholly out of control of one's life are major causes of depression in carers. They suffer financial penalty because disability and frailty nearly always lead to reduced income and increased outgoings. The Government should not be so mealy-mouthed about that by altering the word "poverty", which we use, to "disadvantage" in their amendment. Carers suffer "poverty"—and we use that word advisedly.

Many entitlements to benefit are lost as soon as a disabled person moves in with a family member. An elderly disabled parent can no longer claim supplementary pension and will lose heating and diet allowances. Most important, carers' problems are often multiple, not of one type alone. Physical injuries, psychological stress, and financial hardship are often compounded. In addition, many carers have duties towards not only one single disabled, or extremely disabled, person, but to two, or even three. I could give many examples, but I shall cite one.

A woman of 50, whom I know, cares for her husband who is 20 years older than she is and is suffering from dementia. Her parents, who are in their 90s, and her mother's sister live with them. Both her mother and her mother's sister are physically frail, and her mother is also blind. She receives assistance only from a district nurse who comes once a week to give her mother a blanket bath. Such cases are typical. There is nothing exceptional about them.

All the evidence shows that the more handicapped and dependent a relative is, the less support a carer will receive from formal and informal agencies. That makes the cumulative burden all the harder to bear. The more disabled a relative, the fewer the people who are prepared to give the necessary assistance. It is because volunteers and neighbours are of little help when a disability becomes advanced, which is when help is needed, that statutory support is urgently required.

Above all, the debate centres on the unrecognised needs of women. More than one in eight women is a carer, and four out of five carers are women. Their position is much worse than that of their male counterparts because they are much more likely to have to give up their jobs. They have less money, experience more stress, and are less likely to receive support services. To add insult to injury, married and cohabiting women are denied invalid care allowance, which is the sole benefit paid to people who are prevented from undertaking full-time work because they are carers.

The problem will not go away. As the numbers of elderly people increase—that section of the population will grow fastest towards the end of the century—an increasing number of people will need assistance if they are to continue to lead independent, fulfilled lives. Our intention today is to make it clear that carers cannot and must not be expected to bear the full weight of the Government's community care policies unseen, unpaid and undervalued. That is the central theme of the debate.

I take this opportunity to pay the warmest tribute to the Association of Carers for its dedicated and tireless campaign to bring this vital issue to the attention of the nation.

At present, the position of carers is worsening. The Social Security Bill will leave carers entitled to long-term supplementary benefit worse off by £6·90 a week. In addition, they will have to pay the first 20 per cent. of their rates from that reduced income. The Government have refused to move on the European Advocate General's recommendation on the Drake case, made a week ago. They have talked of the money being spent on services instead of on invalid care allowance. The truth is that the allowance is not being paid and the services are not being provided. The Government failed to support the carers' clause in its original form in the private Member's Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke). Therefore, they have denied carers the right to be assessed for their ability to care or to continue caring, and that is extremely important to carers.

Even the Government's helping-the-community-to-care programme — I pass over its tiny £10·5 million budget — has been a wasted opportunity for carers, because almost none of the funding has been directed towards increasing statutory services to carers as a right.

Our motion calls on the Government to provide some real, substantial increase in support for carers in ways which they want. First, carers—who have often given up full-time work to undertake their caring role—want an income independent of those whom they look after. Following the clear prompting—I know that this is a recommendation — of the European Court, we in the Labour party believe that the Government have an undeniable duty to pay invalid care allowance to married and cohabitating women. I have received legal and counsel's opinion that if, in June, the European Court decide that the Government are discriminating against women, and if they do not pay invalid care allowance to every eligible woman, regardless of whether she has claimed it, backdated to December 1984, they will be acting unlawfully.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Is the hon. Gentleman prepared to say that any future Labour Government will immediately accede to any similar ruling, or, indeed, to any ruling, by the European Court of Justice? Is he now so enamoured of European Community institutions that that is his position?

Mr. Meacher: I believe that if a Labour Government had been in power for seven years, they would have paid the invalid care allowance to married women without waiting for a decision by the European Court. We do not believe in discrimination in social security matters. A British Government should not need external prompting.

It is no good the Government making noises about spending money on services. The fact is that invalid care allowance is an income replacement benefit. The Government have no more right to offer invalid care allowance or services to carers than they have to offer a state retirement pension or home helps and day centres to elderly people. Carers are entitled to income and to services. It is false economy not to provide this balance of aid. In the absence of both, many carers are forced to give up a role that they would otherwise maintain. The alternative, institutional care, is a far greater cost to the state.

Carers want access to respite care, both in the home and in a residential setting, which is of a quality acceptable to the carer and the dependant. Such evidence as we have shows that respite care is patchy. I am aware that some local authorities provide excellent respite care, but they are few in number and mainly Labour authorities. More Tory authorities should provide such care. The existing respite care, however, is patchy, inflexible, inappropriate and often directed at the dependant rather than the carer. All too often, carers are placed in an intolerable position when the person they care for refuses to go into respite care, or states that they do not need it because they have a daughter to look after them.

I know that it is invidious to pick out the name of a voluntary organisation, because there are so many performing an important role, but I think it is fair to pay tribute to the work of Crossroads and other care attendant schemes which seek to offer a multi-purpose, paid worker, round the clock, every day of the week. It is only such schemes which enable carers either to continue at work or to take time out from caring to meet their own needs. That is the right model for respite care. All the tasks of the carer need to be covered; otherwise breaks for more than a few hours from caring would be impossible.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that an important aspect in attempting to maximise the provision for respite care is flexibility? Respite care should be available at short notice as a support service within the home or a place suitably near to the home. In case of illness or emergency, respite care should be available immediately.

Mr. Meacher: The hon. Gentleman must be telepathic, as I was about to make that exact point. It is crucial that respite care is flexible enough to cover emergencies and unforeseen circumstances, as well as set and specific periods of care. That would enable the needs to be met.

Carers need advice and access to information. Many carers feel isolated. They do not know what, if any, services are available within the local community. At present, the vast majority of carers receive neither training nor support. There should be medical assessment of both the carer and the dependant. It is impossible to know what sort of services would be most suitable if neither the clinical condition of the dependant nor the medical capability of the carer has been checked. There should be a continuous back-up service and reviews so that help can not only be provided at times of crisis, but adjusted to match changing circumstances.

The Government in their amendment complacently talk about

"continuing improvement in the level of support given to statutory and voluntary agencies".

For millions of carers and dependants that is a cruel joke. The lie is proven by the pathetically low community care expenditure, the continued rate support grant cuts and the drastic cuts in the voluntary sector budget due to the Government's abolition of the GLC and the metropolitan counties.

[Mr. Meacher]

The Government are proposing a so-called social fund in the Social Security Bill. That fund will undermine community care policy and force many thousands of people into institutions. The Government have rejected the invalid care allowance for married women and revealed their true attitude to carers. On 28 January, the Minister for Health dismissed my plea for increased income support for carers on the ground that it would mean

"a great big nanny state".—[Official Report, 28 January 1986; Vol. 90, c. 779.]

We reject that nauseating disregard for those who have given unremitting care and support to the disabled and the elderly year upon year, without complaint and without any allowances. By contrast to that disregard, the Labour party pledges to extend the invalid care allowance to married and cohabiting women. We do not accept the Government's feeble excuse that they cannot afford the meagre benefit of £23 a week for 96,000 women, when the same Government can find the money to pay private nursing homes £250 a week to look after elderly people.

We will appoint a carers' liaison officer to each social services department to identify carers in its area and to assess how best to meet their needs. We will seek to provide respite care and a flexible system of support services for carers. It will take time, and the services will have to be phased in as our economy recovers. However, we acknowledge the objective and will not shirk that responsibility.

We do not accept the present position, whereby carers are presented with the stark choice of looking after a dependant with minimal support and at great, sometimes crippling, cost to themselves or of putting their relative into permanent residential accommodation. The vast majority of carers are devoted to looking after and keeping their relatives at home. To do so they need financial, social and practical support. If the Government will not provide that, we will.

5.6 pm

The Minister for Health (Mr. Barney Hayhoe): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'noting that there are a substantial number of people from the age of seven to 70 years caring for disabled and elderly relatives at home, often for many years, pays the warmest possible tribute to these carers; and, further noting the research which shows that carers themselves often suffer from mental and physical illness, social isolation and disadvantage, recognises the action already taken by the Government to improve their position, especially in view of the undoubted savings to public funds which flow from their commitment; and in particular welcomes the Government's intentions, in line with its stated policies on care in the community and the availability of resources, that: (a) adequate respite care, both at home and in short-stay facilities, be assured by continuing improvement in the level of support given to statutory and voluntary agencies, (b) a flexible system of appropriate support such as home helps and home nursing be available at times when the carer needs them and (c) any judgment which may be made by the European Court relating to the invalid care allowance introduced by the Labour Government in 1976, be carefully considered by the Government and made the subject of a report to the House.'.

This debate gives the House and myself a chance to pay a warm tribute to the role of informal carers. I certainly welcome that part of the speech of the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), which was otherwise characterised by pessimistic and exaggerated descriptions of these matters. I hope that his tribute to informal carers is echoed in all quarters of the House.

Last week The Sunday Times graphically described the pressures that a heavily dependent person represents to a family. The article explained that, even when practical help is provided to such a family, that help puts pressures on the family. I doubt whether there is any way of avoiding such pressures on informal carers, but without doubt all those concerned — the professionals, the voluntary agencies and the informal carers — who support such families need to work together to minimise the pressures upon carers.

The key significance of informal carers has, as the hon. Gentleman said, recently been referred to in our debates on the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Bill, introduced by the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke). I do not wish to add anything to what I said about that Bill on the Floor of the House and in Committee. I am glad that the Bill is making progress.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West made much of the invalid care allowance and married women. The Government have made their position perfectly clear. The cost of extending invalid care allowance to married women is estimated to be £100 million a year extra, net of savings on other benefits. Even if the resources were available, this should be seen in the context of priorities for social security spending as a whole. The present invalid care allowance arrangements were introduced by the Labour Government of 1976. I do not think that shone through the speech of the hon. Gentleman. This discriminatory legislation, which the hon. Gentleman derided, was introduced by the Labour Government. I am not sure whether he was a member of that Labour Government, but he was certainly a supporter of that Government. The judgment of the European Court as to whether the arrangements that were so introduced contravene the Community's directive on equal treatment is not expected until June. However, I repeat the assurance that it will be carefully considered by the Government and made the subject of a report to the House, as stated in the amendment.

Opposition Members are always keen to add to their list of promises to spend more and more. Indeed, I noticed that the hon. Member for Oldham, West was at it again today. I want to contrast their promises with the performance and record of this Government. For example, we have increased spending on benefits for the long-term sick and disabled by more than 50 per cent. in real terms. In cash terms, we have more than doubled the mobility allowance and taken it out of tax. We have ended some of the discrimination against women, which we inherited from the Labour Government, by abolishing the household duties test and introducing a new severe disablement allowance. We have also ended the invalidity trap—a move that helps 55,000 sick and disabled people.

Of course, there is no hon. Member who would not give high priority to support for the disabled and those who care for them, but we serve them ill if, as the hon. Member for Oldham, West has done, we make promises that it is beyond this country's capacity to fulfil.

Mr. Meacher: There have been no such promises.

Mr. Hayhoe: The hon. Gentleman's commitment to spend £100 million more on ICA seems clear. I assume that is on top of the £24 billion commitment that has already been made by the Labour party.

Mr. Meacher rose——

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman. I hope that he is about to explain how a Labour Government would fund that £24 billion of promises.

Mr. Meacher: Perhaps I can explain the canard of £24 billion that Ministers keep mentioning. Apparently, £2.5 billion of that sum is for equalising the retirement age at 60. Neither I nor anyone else in the Labour party has given that commitment. It simply shows what a total fabrication that total of £24 billion is. The Minister has mentioned the £100 million that the ICA would cost. My point was that there would be a net saving if more people were kept in the community instead of being put into private nursing or rest homes at a cost of £250 a week or more and at the expense of supplementary benefit.

Mr. Hayhoe: In effect, the hon. Gentleman is not promising to spend any more money. That contrasts with the attitude of some of his hon. Friends, who always want to know what extra money the Government intend to spend.

As the hon. Gentleman is in a mood to discard promises, perhaps he will turn his mind to the £4·5 billion commitment that he made last April, when he said that a Labour Government would pay a disablement costs allowance of nearly £60 a week on top of the existing attendance allowance. Does he stand by that commitment today, or does he wish to withdraw it? Disabled people and their carers have a right to know which of Labour's promises can be believed. Frankly, I think that they would be very unwise to bank on any of them being implemented.

As I have said, the Government fully recognise what families, friends and neighbours do in providing support within the community for the disabled and elderly frail. Real progress is being made, particularly in the provision of support for informal carers of heavily dependent people living at home. But that progress represents only part of the improvements made over the past six years in the health and social services generally.

Expenditure on the NHS has increased by about 24 per cent. in real terms between 1978-79 and 1986-87. In 1984, there were nearly 3,000 more GPs than in 1976, and as a result the average list size has been reduced. That is particularly important as the number of elderly people who require greater medical care is increasing. More than 3 million extra out-patient cases were dealt with last year compared with the year before we came to power. Community psychiatric nurses have increased in number. Indeed, the increase has been significant, as the number has more than doubled. Many more examples could be given, but I have quoted enough to show that on a range of measures significant improvements in the services available to patients have been made.

Progress has equally been made in the social services. We introduced the social services inspectorate in April 1985 to help to improve the quality and efficiency of services. The number of social workers has risen by 25 per cent., from 12,481 in 1978 to more than 15,600 in 1984. In the same period there was a 13 per cent. increase in the number of home helps, and we all know how important they can be. Expenditure by social services departments increased in real terms by 19 per cent. between 1978-79 and 1984-85. Those increases in resources have been matched by the action that we have taken to encourage collaboration between the different statutory services.

We have placed emphasis on the key enabling role of social services departments in mobilising all the sources of support available in the community. We have widened the membership of joint consultative committees to include representatives of the voluntary sector and of family practitioner committees. We continue to seek improvements in services that provide support to those in the community who need it, with the recent publication of the consultation document on primary care.

Mr. Roy Mason (Barnsley, Central): We estimate that there are 12,600 disabled people in the Barnsley area, which represents 7 per cent. of the population. Moreover, 7,000 of them are severely disabled and require constant care and attention night and day. The carers should clearly receive more financial recognition. In industrial towns, the number of disabled people is higher than average because of coal mines, factories, and so on. Local authorities in those areas would like to develop a much more comprehensive care and attendance service. What plans does the Minister have to assist local authorities to achieve that objective?

Mr. Hayhoe: I have already said that no hon. Member would fail to give high priority to the extension and improvement of services for the disabled, but such matters must be seen within the context of the availability of resources. Indeed, that is mentioned in our amendment.

I am talking about real improvements. I know that the hon. Member for Oldham, West may wish to concentrate on other areas. However, the imaginative proposals in the report of the review of the role of community nursing services, chaired by Mrs. Julia Cumberlege, which is now out for consultation, illustrate further ways in which services might be changed to meet better the needs of users, including informal carers. The crucial role of informal carers—families, friends and neighbours—who care for heavily dependent people living in the community should be much more widely recognised. They certainly need advice and information about how to cope, sometimes emotionally and often with practical problems.

Practical assistance can greatly help. I refer, for example, to the provision of bath hoists. We have already heard about the difficulties faced by elderly carers who have to do a lot of lifting. Moreover, the availability of some form of respite care can make all the difference. Being treated as a valued member of the team by those paid professionals helping to support the dependent person can also make all the difference. It was because the Government recognised that too often informal carers were ignored rather than supported by those providing health and social services that, during the past few years, considerable emphasis has been placed on the role of informal carers.

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): Is the Minister aware that in constituencies such as mine, where Winterton hospital cares for many psycho-geriatric patients, patients are gradually being released into the community? Is he further aware that that is causing tremendous problems for the families looking after them informally? The worst thing that could happen would be for the services provided by local authorities to be cut.

Mr. Hayhoe: I agree that the arrangements which are being made for people to move back into the community must be carefully considered and co-ordinated by all concerned. Generally speaking, the policies—they are not just this Government's policies, but they have been considered desirable for many years, as the hon. Gentleman recognised—are being pursued.

The DHSS has taken a variety of steps, some of them modest, which together add up to a significant programme of action. In 1983 and 1984, the Department's social work service ran a major national project to draw attention to the needs of informal carers and to encourage policy makers, managers and front-line workers to consider how support for a dependent person's informal carer could be made an integral part of the range of services needed for effective community care.

To continue the policy development beginning with that social work service project, several elements of the helping the community to care programme are specifically concerned with support for informal carers. The King's Fund is undertaking two projects. One is aimed at improving the quality and availability of information and training of use to informal carers about what services might be of help or about how to cope. The other, in co-operation with Age Concern, is to provide information and training directed at general practitioners and community nurses so that they are better equipped to advise carers of elderly people suffering from incontinence. A third element of the helping the community to care programme is the development of three demonstration districts—in east Sussex, Stockport and Sandwell — of voluntary sector services to support informal carers.

We have heard about the importance of respite care. It is right for dependent people to be cared for in their homes as far as possible, and I recognise the need for respite care in the interests of the dependent person and of his family or friends who support him. Respite care, as the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) said, is especially valuable when unplanned events or emergencies mean that the informal carer must give up his responsibilities for a time. Like many hon. Members, I know from personal contacts how valuable such respite care can be. I wonder whether full advantage is being taken of the variety of types of respite care provided through the voluntary organisations. This is being investigated in the demonstration districts that I mentioned, and there may be scope for advance in that area.

It is clear that there are hundreds of thousands of informal carers, but there has so far been no systematic information about their circumstances and numbers. The hon. Member for Oldham, West gave figures of 5·5 million carers and £5·3 billion. The latter, which is the amount alleged to have been saved as a result of existing policies, is a fanciful calculation.

Two major national surveys by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys will provide hard information. The general household survey has, for the first time, explicitly asked people whether they care for a dependent person, and those results should begin to be available at the end of the year. The major national survey of disabled people includes questions about who cares for the disabled person, and it will provide information early in 1988 about the services that families with a dependent disabled person receive. The information from those two surveys will enable planning for community care to take better account of the needs of informal carers.

The comprehensive statistical information that will be provided by the OPCS surveys will be complemented by a programme of research being undertaken by the social policy research unit of the Univeristy of York, funded by the DHSS.

The initial social work service project is being followed up with two national seminars — one in London last month and the other to be held soon in Leeds—about support for informal carers specifically directed at those concerned with community nursing services.

For several years, the Department has supported national voluntary organisations directly or indirectly interested in informal carers through its general scheme of section 64 grants. The major national voluntary organisations concerned with the needs of client groups of dependent people, such as Age Concern, MENCAP and MIND, receive grants under the scheme and take an interest in informal carers as significant contributors to the well-being of the client group concerned. Other national voluntary organisations more directly concerned with the needs of informal carers also receive grants from the Department.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West mentioned the valuable work done by the Association of Carers. He will know that it receives a grant from the DHSS, as do Crossroads Care Attendant Scheme, Contact a Family, the National Association of Carers and their Elderly Dependants and other similar voluntary organisations at national and local level, all of which make significant contributions that are supported actively in the constituencies by hon. Members on both sides of the House.

Meals on wheels is an extremely valuable service and an excellent example of productive collaboration between a social service department and a voluntary organisation —the Women's Royal Voluntary Service. The WRVS is already doing much, and I pay tribute to its work, which I hope will expand and develop in the months ahead. Many people, especially elderly people, depend upon the delivery of a meal to the door by the meals on wheels service. More that 28 million meals are provided every year, often by the dedicated members of the WRVS. As part of our search to improve the value of services, we have commissioned several research projects from the WRVS to test the feasibility and acceptability of offering alternatives to the traditional cooked meal delivery service, such as escorted shopping trips. We have asked the personal social services research unit at the University of Kent to carry out a study of the present position. We hope to set up a seminar to consider the subject, especially the different options for future development, early in 1987.

There is greater scope—I am buttressed in that belief by the conversations that I have had with Dame Barbara Shenfield, the leader of the WRVS—that we can do more. I hope that we can obtain better co-operation between the statutory agencies and the voluntary workers. We have made substantial progress in providing community care through, for example, joint finance.

Mr. Meacher: That is a joke.

Mr. Hayhoe: The hon. Gentleman says that that is a joke. When we came to power in 1979, the total spent on such programmes was £63·5 million.

Mr. Meacher: That was seven years ago.

Mr. Hayhoe: It has increased to £670 million since then. Of course, the hon. Gentleman always wishes to denigrate what we have done, because the Labour Government did so little when they were responsible. We have also made considerable progress in taking long-stay children out of large mental handicap hospitals and putting them into better provision in the community, including small NHS units for children who need health care. More than 2,400 children were in such hospitals at the end of 1980. At the end of 1984, there were fewer than 700, including those children in short-term care. Our latest estimates show that the numbers are now much lower.

We are committed to providing efficient and effective services for those who need them. For too long, the central key role played by families, friends and neighbours in community care has been ignored. Of course, it is not true to say that nothing more needs to be done by statutory and voluntary service providers before adequate support is provided for all informal carers. We have recognised their key importance and brought it to the notice of those planning and providing services locally. We are developing and exploring new and better ways of providing support. We are undertaking the research to provide solid evidence for future planning. I believe that that is a record of progress, and it lays the foundations for significant further progress over the next few years. I commend the amendment to the House.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. Time is very limited and many hon. Members wish to speak. I appeal for very short speeches.

5.31 pm

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): The Minister for Health has just proved that he is incapable, not only of taking care of carers, but of making a decent speech on the issue. He accused my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) of being pessimistic, but my hon. Friend was reflecting the deep and profound pessimism of carers. The right hon. Gentleman should ask his hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security, who has responsibility for the disabled, what was said to him by the deputation of carers I took to see him a few months ago. The carers were profoundly pessimistic, as my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West explained. That was the reason for my hon. Friend's pessimism. He was reflecting the reality of the situation.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to an article in The Sunday Times. I cannot see how any Minister could read such an appalling and tragic article and refuse to do anything positive and constructive for carers. It beggars belief that the Minister could use the example of an article in The Sunday Times and make the bromide speech that he made today. The right hon. Gentleman said he wa glad that the Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) was making progress, but he surgically removed from the Bill the provision relating to carers.

The right hon. Gentleman said that the figures cited by my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West were fanciful. The right hon. Gentleman does not know the real figures, so he attacked my hon. Friend. The right hon. Gentleman has not taken the trouble to find out what they are. He said that the figures would emerge in 1988, but carers cannot wait until then. The Conservative party has been in power for seven years and Ministers for Health have had sufficient time to ascertain the position. The Minister said that he recognised the importance of carers, but he still made a wordy speech which offered no real progress. He has not satisfied the House on all those issues. In fact, I am sorry to say that he made a bad speech. His speech disappointed me, because I had hoped that hon. Members on both sides of the House would agree on this issue.

The debate is not about compassion; it is about justice. People have become carers because they love the people for whom they care and because they have compassion for them. It is unjust for society and it is wrong for the Government to expect those people to become virtual slaves in caring for disabled people. Severe disability damages people's lives. It is wrong that a disability should damage the lives of those caring for disabled people. In fact, it devastates their lives, yet that occurs all too often. It is unjust, unfair and intolerable.

The Government's amendment seems similar to the early-day motion which was supported by hon. Members on both sides of the House, but there are some significant differences. The early-day motion asked the Government "to ensure that . . . adequate respite care . . . a considerable improvement in the level of support . . . a flexible system of cash and other . . . services, such as home helps and home nursing"— and that

"the invalid care allowance is made available to married women".

The amendment pays warm tribute to carers. We can all say that we pay tribute to carers. However, the amendment uses the phrase

"in line with its stated policies . . . and the availability of resources".

We all know that that is shorthand for saying that funding will not be provided and that the money is not available. That is what the Government are saying. The Minister's fine words mean only that, because of a lack of resources, the carers will not receive the money.

The amendment refers to the European Court judgment and says that the Government will carefully consider it. That is not good enough. We do not want the judgment just to be carefully considered by the Government. We want it to be accepted by them. There is a great difference between considering and accepting.

It is impossible to overstate the importance of the issue to women. There are some men carers but basically it is a women's issue. A few months ago, in the presence of my wife, I attended a meeting of carers at county hall across the river. I went as their friend. In the 20 years that I have been a Member of Parliament I have never had such a rough ride. Those women carers, of many creeds and kinds—some black, some brown and some white—were unanimous in their bitterness at being exploited. When I tried to explain that, along with many hon. Members, I was campaigning for carers, they were vindictive. They said that it did not matter what we were trying to do. The only thing they cared about was what we were doing and what we had accomplished. I could not say that we had accomplished anything. I have never known women who felt so bitter. They are treated badly. They feel that they are abused by authority. A loving task to them has become a prison sentence, where no adequate support is provided.

Some of the country's 1·25 million carers are driven to despair, are in ill health and in need of care. Some carers are prisoners of their own conscience. Cash is the most important requirement. It has been estimated, as my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West said, that more than £5 billion is saved every year. I pay a warm tribute to Judith Oliver of the Association of Carers for the marvellous work that she and her colleagues have done and to Pat Osborne of the Crossroads association for the wonderful work that that group has done. Those associations are demanding cash, and rightly so, because cash is crucial.

Back-up services are also being demanded. There is no round-the-clock nursing help and carers are neglected, especially at weekends. There is little respite provision. Above all, carers need a break. They cannot stand the eternal grind 24 hours a day, seven days a week, 365 days a year. Yet often, when they contact the emergency services, they find that they get little help. Carers are not given adequate training. They are given a rough deal. As my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West rightly emphasised, the more disabled a person is, the more difficult it is to get help. Carers are taken for granted by national Government, local authorities and the public.

I have no doubt that the main reason why carers are shabbily treated is that they are women. This is a women's issue. If most men were carers, responses and attitudes would be very different. People look down on women. The Government look down on women. Women are shabbily treated, and women carers are the most shabbily treated of all. That is the main reason why the Government pay scant regard to them. I hope that the Government will pay due regard to this debate, because carers can easily sink and become submerged non-persons unless we can help them. There is a strong feeling among carers that they want not just cash but recognition and a sense of identity. That is what they require.

I suggest that we should provide for carers a genuine new deal, which includes eight points. First, we should give carers an honoured place in society. Secondly, we should recognise their wonderful value and make civilised and adequate provision for them. Thirdly, there should be adequate Government recognition of the serious problems hidden behind the sad curtains and the lonely wheelchairs. Fourthly, there should be an end to discrimination against married women and co-habitees. They should be paid the invalid care allowance now rather than have to wait until the Government are dragged kicking and screaming by the European Court to undertake reform. Fifthly, there should be a careful assessment of the role, capacity and functions of all carers and the burdens that they relieve. Sixthly, home helps and nursing helps should be made available when needed and for as long as required. Seventhly, the provision of expert care is needed so that carers can have a break, rather than a breakdown. Eighthly, there should be planned provision of information and advice about benefits, services and options.

Carers are exploited because they care and are dutiful, because they love their dependent relatives, because they want to help and because they are women. It is time that we ended this scandal and gave them justice.

5.43 pm

Sir David Price (Eastleigh): I feel somewhat upstaged by the speeches of the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) and of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health. Those who follow the Order Paper may recall that on 10 February I tabled a not dissimilar private Member's motion. On listening to the opening speeches in this debate, particularly that of the hon. Member for Oldham, West, I could not help but feel that if I rather than the hon. Gentleman had opened the debate—I say this in due modesty — I might have created a better atmosphere for the debate. Above all, this is a subject on which we should try to strike a consensus. I shall not, therefore, reply to some of the more partisan of the hon. Gentleman's points or take up some points raised by the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley).

I start with the proposition that many more dependent people are cared for at home than are cared for in the ordinary hospitals, institutions and rest homes of all the statutory, charitable and private groups combined. That is our point of departure. To set it out in a little more detail, I shall give the House a round up of the facts, some of which have been mentioned.

More than 1·25 million people are caring for a relative or friend who is severely or very severely disabled due to illness, accident or the infirmities of old age. About 100,000 of those carers have been doing so for 10 years or more and some have been doing so for more than 30 years. More than 5·5 million people are supporting a person who because of age, illness or disability could not live safely or comfortably without the help of the carer. More women now care for an elderly or disabled relative than care for a child under 16. That fact, which has not yet come up, is one of the most penetrating facts to grasp in the debate. As the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South said, four out of five carers are women.

Recently published reports confirm that there is an inverse ratio of support for carers — the more handicapped the dependent relative, the less support is made available. Research in Yorkshire has shown that the more disabled the relative, the fewer the people able to undertake the care because it is too difficult and onerous. That means that volunteers and neighbours find it increasingly difficult to give meaningful help as the disability becomes more advanced and severe.

If 1 per cent. of those caring just for the elderly suddenly gave up, our health and social services would find their budgets being increased immediately by 20 per cent.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): That is an interesting point. The social services department in Barnsley estimates that its budget would probably increase by twice as much again. I notice that the hon. Members for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price), for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mrs. McCurley), for Cheltenham (Mr. Irvine) and for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) and 43 other colleagues have signed early-day motion 299. I have been listening intently to the hon. Member for Eastleigh, and I hope that he will join us in the Division Lobby.

Sir David Price: If the hon. Gentleman had listened, he would have heard me say that I wanted the debate to achieve a consensus. I was referring to a major point. The hon. Gentleman can keep his party points for his party's committees.

It is estimated that those caring for the elderly at home save the statutory services £5·3 billion a year. It is important to take on board also the fact that the cost of a bed in a residential establishment is between £140 and £500 a week. By contrast, the maximum rate of attendance allowance available only to the most severely disabled living at home is £30·60. The invalid care allowance is only £23 a week.

That puts the role of the carer and the scope of the problem within statistical dimensions. The problem is severe. It covers age spectrum. It is important to remember that many carers are themselves elderly people.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): rose——

Sir David Price: No, I have given way once already, and I am trying obediently to be brief.

It is generally acknowledged that there are a number of hon. Members who have personal experience of caring. They will be with me when I say that the reality of caring for someone whom one loves is so private and intimate that even in a debate like this the House will not expect us to share our personal experiences. I certainly do not intend to do so. Suffice it to say that most carers have consciously chosen to look after their dependent relatives at home because they love them. They do not, therefore, want to hand the job over to anyone else.

Caring for someone who is heavily dependent is continuous, tiring, stressful, and restrictive. It can impose serious strains on other relationships within the family. Many of us have constituents with a severely disabled child and have seen how this can have repercussions on other children in the family who are not disabled. Outside help at key times on both a regular and a one-off basis can make the difference between total breakdown and a successful and loving partnership between the carer and the cared for.

That leads me on to consider — and this is what future discussion should be about — the different forms of support that are needed. In the interests of brevity I shall try to go straight to the heart of the matter. I invite the House to consider the various ideas put forward by the Association of Carers. Time prevents my going through them, but I would mention one point which comes in its submission to hon. Members:

"It does appear at the moment that the presence of a carer is often seen by statutory services to obviate the need for supportive services, whereas carers are almost invariably in need of help in the very onerous tasks which they have opted to undertake out of love."

I think that this is true.

I should like to draw the attention of the House to the report of the Select Committee on Social Services and the 101 recommendations that we made. Let me emphasise that we made them on an agreed basis, across the party spectrum, which is the spirit that I wish to introduce, and maintain, in this debate. I hope that when replying to the debate my right hon. Friend will declare the Government's support for those measures.

Each of us who takes part in this debate will have his own suggestions for improvement. We have already heard a number from the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South. I should like to suggest a few briefly, in encapsulated form.

We need more back-up in the home. This means more home helps and more meals on wheels. I pay tribute to the progress which has been made, but we have only 50,000 home helps in England, and that is not enough. There is uneven provision between men and women. In support of that I quote from a recent report of the Equal Opportunities Commission:

"Evidence presented in our report shows that nearly 60 per cent. of male carers studied received home helps compared with only 34 per cent. of female carers, and 28 per cent. of men had the support of the meals on wheels service compared with 16 per cent. of the women. It seems services which provide direct help with the daily domestic routine are more likely to be provided if the carer is a man. So the work and health of women carers is affected to a greater degree."

We would like to see progress made in this area, not only for its own sake, but because this is an inequality which I find unacceptable.

We need more medical support in the home. My right hon. Friend referred to the primary care report which has just come out. We have to build on that. We must support the general practitioner service, which is the linch pin. We ought to extend the role of the community nurse, the community physiotherapist and the occupational therapist. In my part of the world they are extremely helpful to the handicapped.

We need an extension of the care assistant or care attendant. I call in aid the development of the care attendance service in Hampshire. On the hospital side, we need to have relief on call, what in our report we refer to as the "revolving door". If a chance is taken in putting people back into the community and the carers run into difficulties, they can by this means get those people back into hospital. This may have to be done at awkward times — which is when it nearly always happens — and not during the conventional surgery hours.

There is a need for the carer to have time off from caring. Age Concern once described the life of a carer of someone with dementia as the 36-hour day. Earlier, I heard people talking about problems of overtime. If one is caring for someone who is severely disabled, there is no question of normal working hours or overtime; it is a total commitment. So the need for relief is often urgent.

What happens when the carer runs out of steam? We all get these tragedies in our surgeries — a mother and father, now old-age pensioners, who, having looked after a severely disabled child who is now aged 40 or 45, can no longer provide the necessary care because they have literally run out of steam.

I support all the pleas to my right hon. Friend to get the invalid care allowance right. I have raised the issue, as have many right hon. and hon. Members. There is no longer any justification for not extending it to married women. As I said in a letter to The Times a few months ago, I very much hope that my right hon. Friends will be able to do it gracefully before they are compelled to do it by the European Court.

I hope that I have said enough to demonstrate the importance of carers to our nation. We need them. We cannot get on without them. I hope, too, that I have demonstrated that carers need more back-up, and more support, especially professional support, if they are to fulfil their role as carers and still have some personal life of their own.

[Sir David Price]

I beg the House not to treat carers as if they were an object of pity or compassion. They do their caring willingly, as part of their role in life, out of love.

5.56 pm

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): The hon. Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price) has spoken with considerable knowledge and a good track record in putting forward his point of view. He has set up an interesting agenda of proposals which will probably find cross-party support in this Chamber. Above and beyond the debate tonight, there is plenty there for which we can gather a consensus. But such is the nature of these debates that this evening at 7 o'clock we shall have to decide which way to vote on the motion. I can find nothing in the motion with which to disagree, and I am glad that it is before us for debate.

I might perhaps enter a number of caveats and additional points, but some of these have already been touched on and, because I know that other Members want to take part in the debate, I shall try not to detain the House.

The first of my three caveats is a plea for a proper balance in dealing with carers between the voluntary sector and the statutory sector. I know from my experience as president of the Liverpool old people's hostels association and from discussions with the Merseyside council for voluntary service and Liverpool young persons advisory service that they are very stretched for funds. They believe also that they are having to deal with a local authority which almost seems philosophically opposed to the spirit of voluntarism, and that can make life difficult for the voluntary organisations. If adequate support is to be given to those who care and who do the caring work, resources and support must be provided for voluntary organisations. Although I am glad to see a reference in the motion to increased support for voluntary organisations and agencies, I should like the Government to look at ways in which their position might be better protected.

Another caveat concerns the division of responsibility between health and social services departments. Often they are hopelessly unco-ordinated. To rectify this, I would like to see the health and social services provision for adults amalgamated under directly elected regional government. I would also like to see the social services provision for children integrated into a family courts system.

My third caveat is about flexibility, of which there needs to be more if we are to give more help to carers — a point on which the hon. Member for Eastleigh touched. Flexibility in the provision of care requires the breaking down of the entrenched intransigence of some groups of people, regrettably some of them trade unionists who defend working practices and insist that care may be provided only at certain times — for example, not at weekends. I hope that the Opposition Front Bench will use its considerable influence with the trade unions to ensure that some of this inflexibility is broken down.

In addition, we should like to see a charter for carers that would establish their inalienable right to an income that is independent of their dependants. Secondly, there should be access to information, which is often denied by the professional to the carer. Thirdly, as other hon. Members have said, there must be respite care, which is so important. Fourthly, there must be increased governmental encouragement and support for organisations such as the Association of Carers, with opportunities for more training to be provided under their aegis.

Enhanced nursery provision would enable women to have more flexibility in caring for children or relatives and would increase opportunities for women generally. Our record is not good. In France, 90 per cent. of three-year-olds attend nursery. In West Germany, the figure is 70 per cent. Here, it is only 2·8 per cent. My city of Liverpool intended to open six new nursery classes in 1985-86, but the Secretary of State withheld his approval. The authority will again seek approval for 1986-87. I hope that this time the Secretary of State will give the go-ahead.

These are the caveats and addenda that I would enter, while supporting the Opposition motion. Like the Government in their amendment, we commend the estimated 5·5 million people who are supporting disabled or elderly relatives at home. We have all been sent details of how many it is estimated are in our constituencies. I am told that there are 9,500 carers in my constituency. However, we repudiate the Government's contention that they are giving adequate support to the carers. Like the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley), I feel that the Social Security Bill, which should have been a golden opportunity, makes no specific provision for carers, and some will be up to £6·90 a week worse off because of the changes being made to long-term supplementary benefit.

What thanks is that to people who have sacrificed so much for the good of others? What sort of thanks is that to those who save the state millions of pounds? If just 10 per cent. of those who are cared for at home had to be looked after in residential institutions, the public cost would be over £1 billion a year. In comparison, the cost of extending invalid care allowance to married women — a move for which there is all-party agreement, and which would be of real help to the carers — would be less than one tenth of that £1 billion a year, at approximately £85 million a year.

The key to the Government's intentions comes in that immortal phrase used by the Minister for Health, "the availability of resources". If a Government can find, as this Government did a few weeks ago, £1 billion to give away in tax reductions, and can look next year to a further £4 billion for cuts in taxes, why can it not find greater resources to support the carers? That is the touchstone on which the Government's sincerity should be judged. By that touchstone, we shall vote against them tonight.

6.3 pm

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (Surrey, South-West): I am fast reaching the stage when I find it hard to take seriously the views expressed by the Labour party, because its answer to all difficulties is the profligate application of a cheque book — somebody else's. I have been closely involved in caring for carers for many years. It is no news that their difficulties are not only financial. There has been a certain amount of rivalry over voluntary organisations, and I speak on behalf of the National Council of Carers and their Elderly Dependants, now reaching its 21st birthday and so well in advance of many others who have more recently joined the debate on the needs of carers.

The council was founded at a time when nearly all the caring for elderly relatives was done by unmarried women — the single daughter staying at home looking after the elderly relatives. The invalid care allowance, which was introduced in 1976, was brought into existence largely under the pressure of organisations such as the council.

I share the views of those who hope that the Government will find it within their power to find the £100 million necessary to pay the invalid care allowance to married women. I am content for that to wait for the fully considered judgment from the European Court, and until it has been considered by the Government and they have made it the subject of a report to the House. However, having been through all those necessary steps, I have every confidence that the Government will do the right thing by the many married women caring for dependants. I pay tribute to the Government for the steps that they have already taken in extending the invalid care allowance to non-relatives and doubling the amount of part-time earnings that can be allowed before entitlement to the allowance is affected.

I wish to speak particularly about the carers of the elderly. It is easy to throw all carers into the same discussion, as they have many aspects in common, but they also have distinguishing features. For example, there is no doubt that elderly parents will be very much a growing part of our community as the number of residents over 85 doubles in the next century. Increasingly, elderly people will be looking after the very elderly.

Many contributors have said that it is too easy to take carers for granted, and to assume that all is well for them until they reach breaking point. I hope that the debate will highlight some of their needs and the ways that they can be given help before they reach that breaking point.

We have spent too little time concentrating on some of the good practices that have been established throughout the country. In my constituency, I have been consistently impressed by pioneering projects and ideas about meeting the needs of the elderly and carers. It has become fashionable to say that we always want more without looking carefully at what is being achieved, learning from our successes and then trying to spread good practices to other areas.

In my constituency I have visited many projects for sheltered housing, cluster housing, good neighbour schemes and, above all, schemes using telecommunications systems to keep in touch with dependants. The recent census returns showed a doubling of the number of people living on their own. People are increasingly reluctant to live with their relatives, whether semi-dependent or independent. Using telecommunications networks is the way to ensure that the welfare of the elderly is provided for without their losing privacy.

It is too easy to say that we need more resources for health care, but we have had a 24 per cent. increase in real terms in spending on the Health Service. Above all, I applaud the 63,000 more midwives and nurses since 1979. I hope that we shall be able to discuss the role of nurses in the light of the report by Julia Cumberlege. Nurses are independent professionals who should have increasing scope for practising on their own, and are particularly important in meeting the needs of dependants.

During the autumn, I was fortunate enough to spend a morning in my constituency with a district nurse and a health visitor and I was constantly impressed by the new practices, developments and schemes available for the elderly. It is more fashionable to say that we do not have enough, and in many areas there is room for improvement, but when one goes out on the twilight scheme, which offers help to put dependants to bed in the evenings, and many other schemes, one realises the recent remarkable achievements.

I should like to share with the House my pride in the new geriatric hospital in my constituency, which has cost £1·2 million to build. For too long, health care has too easily concentrated on the dramatic, exciting and acute operations rather than on the less exciting Cinderella services for the mentally ill, the mentally handicapped and the elderly. It is too easy not to recognise the great redirection of resources, not always met with favour by the power leaders in the NHS, but making an enormous difference for those in need of health care.

Much mention has been made in the debate about the role of voluntary organisations. These organisations do the best work and the work which we can be most proud of in our country. Many voluntary organisations have not been mentioned—for example, the Alzheimers Disease Society and the Red Cross. Many voluntary organisations organise schemes and work together with statutory authorities.

We have not so far in the debate mentioned the needs of former carers. Reference has been made to those people who give up five, 10, 15 or 20 years of their lives to care for a young or an old dependent relative. That may result in the carer becoming extremely isolated as the dependent relative's needs take up all the carer's time and attention. When that relative dies, the carer can be quite bereft and take some time before he is ready to return to employment. I hope that the Minister will consider whether it is possible in the provision of benefits to give that carer longer after the death of the dependent relative before the relevant benefits are lost. As a member of the National Council of Carers and their Elderly Dependants said, "Carers cannot walk from the graveside straight to the jobcentre."

Carers have financial needs and there are extra burdens to caring quite apart from the loss of earnings. I am confident that, with due consideration and careful planning, the Government will find their way to keep in line with the rulings of the European Court. Carers also have practical needs—relief and respite care, day and night sitting services, day centres, lunch clubs, recreation and leisure facilities. It is vital that there should be joint planning and careful surveys of the needs in specific areas. It is also vital that there are mechanisms for offering information and advice to carers.

There is, above all, one area which is so easily undervalued by those who see everything in basic financial terms which requires consideration — the emotional needs of carers. Carers are isolated and unacknowledged. Their status needs to be raised in the eyes of us all, and local authorities, voluntary organisations and professional bodies at every level must be aware of carers. I hope that the tributes paid in the debate to the commitment of informal carers will lead to a greater appreciation and understanding of those unsung heroes throughout the country.

6.12 pm

Mr. Bill Michie (Sheffield, Heeley): I am acutely aware of the shortage of time and I will therefore speak for no more than five or six minutes, not because this serious debate does not deserve more of my time, but because many of my colleagues wish to speak.

Most hon. Members are aware of the problems in our constituencies and know of the many thousands of people who are affected by the lack of resources for caring for loved ones, neighbours or families. Some 12,000 people are affected in my constituency and at least 1,200 of them are severely handicapped and have, as already mentioned, extra problems which are difficult to resolve immediately unless more resources are available. A special kind of person is required to deal with such cases.

I believe that the main argument relates to resources. The hon. Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) said that it was all very well for Opposition Members to talk about providing more money but that that money always comes from someone else's cheque book. I do not know who these aliens are, these "someone elses", these people who do not appear to belong to our society. The hon. Lady seemed to imply that they were removed from reality. I do not believe that many people would object to helping the people who help others. The cheque book mentality is not a good argument for inaction.

Sheffield has done a great deal of work to help carers. On many occasions the district council in Sheffield has told me that there are three aspects about carers, and they have been outlined already in the debate. The first is that practical help and flexibility are required. At present there are services in Sheffield which do the best that they can. However, local authorities generally find it difficult to give the support at the right time in the right place. There was a story of one local authority which could not provide services early in the morning, late at night or at the weekend because it could not afford it, yet it could afford to offer places in homes which could cost much more. We must locate the resources in the right places. Flexibility in that area is vital.

Sheffield is trying through experimental areas such as the scheme at Ecclesfield to provide such flexibility and Sheffield hopes to introduce further changes to help the carers who are caring for 24 hours a day. It is a fact of life that, without additional staff, it will cost almost £175,000 in premium rate payments to fund that experimental project. Such a sum is not easy for local authorities to come by.

Secondly, local authorities have the problem of finding enough cash for adaptions. It is vital that carers should have such adaptions in their homes. In Sheffield, in 1985-86, expenditure on adaptions was £1·2 million. There have been many debates over the past year or two about public expenditure. It is obvious that, in relation to revenue, that money will not be forthcoming and therefore we will have problems in sustaining programmes which we believe to be essential for adaptions.

My third point relates to respite care. Occasionally people want a break, particularly those who care for the severely handicapped. They need time to restore morale and recover physically and emotionally from such caring. I know that some of the carers in my constituency will not ask for such a respite service, but I believe that such a provision should at least be available in a civilised society. It is impossible to continue day and night caring without some respite.

There is an early-day motion which is more or less in line with the motion we are debating. The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Sir J. Osborn) signed that early-day motion and I hope that he will be voting with the Opposition tonight. Most of my colleagues have said that the needs of carers are desperate. Their needs are not being shouted about because they exist behind closed doors and caring is done in a quiet and sincere manner. That does not mean that the need is not great. The need is present and the House and the rest of society have a responsibility to fulfill our commitment to carers.

Several Hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has set an admirable example. If other hon. Members do the same, I shall be able to call all those who wish to speak.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): As I was one of the proposers on behalf of the parliamentary panel for the personal social services which put forward the early-day motion which has been adopted by the Opposition as their motion tonight, some explanation as to why I intend to support the Government may be required. However, that is not too difficult to explain. The Opposition carefully chose the motion to scourge the Government's record and in a way which paid no heed, for example, to the galloping inflation which pauperised many of the people who now need help from the state because their savings were stripped by out-of-control public expenditure which made it impossible to make sensible provision for their later years.

I will be supporting the Government. However, I should like to make it clear that we are discussing a major problem. There is a huge bulge in the number of elderly people needing to be cared for. We must plan for that bulge just as carefully as we plan for any bulge in school or university populations.

We are sadly very much a behind-closed-doors society. It is the dream of most of us to rush back from our day's work, slam our front door in the face of the world, and stay at home with perhaps a small number of friends or by ourselves. That is running away from the thought of any commitment to others. We must ask ourselves whether that really is the way forward for our society. If it is, it will be the end of the willingness to care. It has been well pointed out that in the enormous increase in the number of step-families there will be a huge increase in the number of kin but perhaps a considerable falling off in the commitment of those kin to individuals within that relationship.

As we have heard today, carers have a range of needs, but one of the things that they need most is a 24-hour response. For reasons which I entirely understand, carers, having committed themselves to looking after their loved ones, are too reluctant to accept help from volunteers. They see it as a job in which they have developed considerable skill and they are reluctant to share it with volunteers. They need help in coming to terms with what has been demonstrated to be a remarkable source of help.

Secondly, we need more part-timers. I could not agree more with the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) when he says that the trade unions should be encouraged in every possible way to make it possible for people to respond outside the ordinary working day.

Thirdly, organisations such as Crossroads need support. It is enormously important that organisations which are not yet big enough to have formed major fund-raising arms should be given a great deal more help with their headquarters' costs than organisations which have grown used to raising their own money. That is important.

The delay which accompanied the grant to the headquarters of the Association of Carers made its life difficult. Therefore, we ask for both speed and rather more understanding of the needs of the headquarters of such organisations.

To provide care through the local authority bureaucracy is expensive, not because local authorities are unduly costly — some are, some are not — but because it is difficult for them to provide care cheaply. Liaison officers will be enormously costly, however worthy they may be. There have been examples of women meeting together and forming their own co-operative to provide care and that is a major way forward for helping carers to find the sort of 24-hour response that they need.

With the huge growth in demand, there is a need for new sources of funds. Ever since the war we have had a society which has put an enormous premium on people spending their money on their house. That is their principal form of saving. That is the most immobile form of saving and the most emotionally tied-up form of saving. It leads to poverty because people cannot bring themselves to trade down-market to free funds. They find it enormously difficult to shake off the emotional ties of their home and so they remain isolated from other people who might be more able to provide them with help. As a society we need to look seriously at ways of helping people in such a situation to release the funds which are tied up in their home. Some schemes are already available, but we need to look at the matter much more coherently and consistently than we have done.

I commend the Government for carrying out research into the best way of allocating what will always be, by definition, inadequate resources. However, their research and the findings which will come from it will cry out for more resources. What we are doing is, perfectly properly, postponing for a moment the spending of money so that we know exactly how best to spend it. But the money will have to be found. As our society begins to grow even faster —it has had several years of consistent growth—each of us should ask whether we would not prefer to spend some of our new prosperity on this neglected source of help.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I am delighted to follow the hon. Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe). I am vice-chairman of the social services support group in the House of Commons and it is my intention to vote for the motion before us. The words of the motion are identical to those of early-day motion 299 for which the hon. Gentleman and I acted as sponsors a few weeks ago and which 147 hon. Members have signed. If it was right to sign the motion then, by what token is it not right to vote for it today?

Indeed, I am a little surprised that the Government have not found a way of adopting the motion. I realise that the last part relating to the invalid care allowance is rather difficult at this time, but, as was said in another place recently—some hon. Members were there—the sooner the nettle is grasped the better. The Government will have to grasp it.

Many of the points in the motion appeal to hon. Members on both sides of the House, across party divides. The sort of divisions that have arisen tonight are unnecessary. We should be finding a way forward. The right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) put forward a specific eight-point plan. The hon. Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price) put forward an action programme, as did the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton). People have been looking for specific steps to try to reach the common objectives that we all share.

We can argue about what resources are needed and how they should be funded, but everybody acknowledges that ideally greater resources are needed and that they should be directed to the right places. The Minister said that no details of the numbers and circumstances of carers are available. He referred to the general household survey later this year and the national survey of disabled people in 1988. Those two surveys, which are all very well, will give us global statistics, but they will not give us detailed local figures. They may show what resources are needed, but the question that then arises is where to allocate those resources, to whom and to answer what needs.

In Committee on the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Bill, the Minister said:

"It would not be right to put a statutory obligation upon local authorities to assess carers' needs." — [Official Report, Standing Committee C, 5 February 1986; c. 68.]

It is necessary to assess carers' needs. New clause 10, eventually brought forward by the Government, contains the words:

"the local authority shall . . . have regard to the ability of that other person"—— the carer—

"to continue to provide such care on a regular basis." — [Official Report, 11 April 1986; Vol. 95, c. 523.]

If the local authority is to have regard to the ability of the carer, what is the difference between that and trying to quantify that regard in terms of an assessment of what is necessary to provide the support services? We are in danger of playing with words here, when in our heart of hearts we all know that we need to be able to quantify and specify the requirements in detail in order to ensure that resources are available to meet those needs.

The Minister made the point that promises should not go beyond the country's capacity to fulfil them. I was a little disturbed last night when in another place it was suggested that the pressure to pay the invalid care allowance — we all hope that the Government will be forced by the build up of pressure to do that — could restrict the money available for other purposes to help disabled people. I realise that all Governments have a limited pot of gold from which to obtain resources, but there is a general mood, not only in the House, but in the countries of these islands, that we require a shift of resources in the direction of those needing care.

One reason for that is that we have not done enough in the past. That is not a party political point. Many people who provide care have not been supported enough in the past and they need more in the future.

Secondly, there is the bulge in the elderly population, which the hon. Member for Mid-Kent mentioned. The increasing elderly senile population will have an enormous impact over the next 20 years. We have seen that happening over the past decade, and the momentum is growing. The pressure is there. We are not yet getting our act together to meet that need. Therefore, we must get the resources together to ensure that we are not caught out.

The position of the elderly and mentally infirm is very serious. They have requirements that carers cannot hope to contain within the community unless they get the range of support services that other hon. Members have detailed. I shall not repeat them now.

[Mr. Dafydd Wigley]

As the hon. Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) said, we need a survey of needs in particular localities. That comes back to the question of specific assessment. We cannot get away from it. Therefore, I hope that the Minister can give an assurance that when the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Bill, which is critical to what we are discussing tonight, passes through another place, as I expect it will, probably unamended, the Government will find the necessary resources to ensure that it is implemented at an early date. I realise that the local authority clauses cannot be implemented in this financial year because of the constraints on local authorities. However, I hope that the Government will give a firm undertaking that the resources will be available to meet the needs of carers from the beginning of the next financial year onwards. I hope that will be a token of the Government's determination to do what is necessary to help carers.

Mrs. Anna McCurley (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): There seems to have been a little fuss from the Opposition about the fact that some Conservative Members supported an early-day motion which approximates to their motion this evening. I believe that there was no harm in supporting the idea, but a little realism has been injected by the Government in the amendment.

I should like to speak about the elderly in Scotland. What we have been talking about tonight came home visibly to me when I recently visited Killallan house, in Houston, in my constituency, where a 97-year-old was celebrating her birthday and her 77-year-old son and daughter were visiting her. They were the fortunate ones. Most people in that position are still at home without help.

The problem of elderly carers with even more elderly parents or dependants is becoming more acute. Those in the greatest need are now those who are either unable or unwilling to articulate their problem because they do not want to be a burden on society. Many of them come from a generation which believes that love and duty are not bound up with money. Sometimes I believe that the Opposition do not understand that, no matter how little people are paid, they are still willing to do the work.

There is the problem of the elderly looking after the aged. However, for many younger carers there is the problem of loss of income combined with the high cost of the much needed services such as additional laundry, additional heating and lighting, aids for incontinence and special diets.

There are roughly 125,000 carers in Scotland. They are mostly women who undoubtedly have had a poorer deal than men. Their job will never get better or easier. Age, decline and ultimate loss are the end products of their hard work. It is estimated that the savings to the Scottish budget through the hard and unpaid work of carers is about £660 million per annum.

However, the Government have demonstrated their concern in Scotland. They have provided additional resources for keeping people within their own homes, with carers in mind. The emphasis is undoubtedly on care in the community and the SHAPE priorities and SHARE allocation of the Health Service shows that clearly. Additional funds have been provided and recently the Minister responsible for health in Scotland gave an additional £250,000 to help the elderly in their homes.

We are very responsive in Scotland to voluntary bodies such as Age Concern when they suggest projects. One project did a survey of dementia sufferers and their carers in Glasgow. We responded very swiftly and provided additional finance.

The benefits which are available must be taken up. It is important for those who are entitled to benefits to ensure that they get what they deserve. Admittedly, at present the benefit system is a tangled forest and there are many outstanding inequities, but we are steering a path through it. Age, sex and marital status can exclude one from benefits and we are well aware that married women are excluded from the invalid care allowance. That must ultimately change. Also, divorced women are not eligible if they are receiving maintenance. That seems unduly harsh.

I hope that the Government are willing to continue to move towards a more equitable position, not through the force of the courts but by humane evolution of the system. Of course, the cost implications are huge and we cannot do it overnight. However, it is important that we aim to get things right now. In the next decade the number of over-75s will increase by 33 per cent. That is a worrying figure for a society whose resources are created by fewer and fewer people. Seventeen per cent. of the Scottish population is now of pensionable age. The number will increase slightly between now and 2011, but the number of over-75s will have increased by 19 per cent. and the over-85s by 80 per cent.

It is interesting that 35 per cent. of all Scottish households have an old-age pensioner, but 31 per cent. of our pensioners live on their own. Therefore, additional resources need to be put into the system. Of the female carers in Scotland, 42 per cent. are more than 60 years old and 70 per cent. are more than 50 years old. The average age of a carer in Scotland is 61. That is a time in life when one needs a little help for oneself and should not be in a position where one has to use mental and physical energy to such a great extent. Those people do it willingly, voluntarily and out of love.

I add my congratulations to those which have already been given to the voluntary services for their help. The National Council for Carers and their Elderly Dependants is grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) for all the help that she gives it. Without that body the services would be under a severe constraint. My contact with the council has been quite frequent recently and I have found it a magnificent body.

Many other agencies are helping to keep carers happy and to prepare the elderly for old age. I must mention the Women's Royal Voluntary Service because it is the true embodiment of a voluntary organisation. It husbands its resources very well and it is involved in direct care with very little administration. Many of the voluntary organisations would do well to take the WRVS as their example. I also congratulate Age Concern, Crossroads and the other remarkable voluntary bodies.

The Government are showing greater willingness to participate in research and in funding this very important area. I hope that we can continue to help before it is too late.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): We in the House and people outside are now about to book holidays, if they are not already booked. We are saying that we will put our household pets in places where they will be looked after or we will get friends to look after them. A carer of people is not in that happy position. A carer cannot do that. Why should carers be in that position?

We blithely take such people for granted. The Minister took them for granted when he said that the resources were not available. He said that the resources were not available in the social services departments. There is much understanding among hon. Members about the need to help carers. We must together try to find the money to achieve our objective. We can do it. Local authorities have capital expenditure tied up. For heaven's sake, let them release that capital expenditure and let it be spent on things that it should be spent on such as caring for the carers.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): I am pleased that there is consensus about what needs to be done, but there is no consensus about the availability of cash. That is where the rub lies. There are 1¼ million people in this country who are looking after severely disabled relatives. Although they may be looking after their severely disabled relatives by choice, that is no reason for exploiting them, yet they are being exploited.

The hon. Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) said that it is all right if one signs cheques using somebody else's cheque book, but who is signing the cheque for £120 a week that goes to many owners of private nursing homes? This gives rise to the kind of headline that appeared earlier this week in the Liverpool Echo, which, together with the "World in Action" team, has done a great service by pointing out that many of the cheques for £120 a week are wasted because that money is swelling the profits of the owners of private residential nursing homes who are not providing proper food and conditions for the people in their care. I have already put down three parliamentary questions about residential homes, including Millvale House in my constituency.

I hope that the Minister for Social Security will agree to hold an independent inquiry into this matter. If the Government really care for those who are in private nursing homes, they should inquire into the cost of caring for people in those homes. They should provide more help for the real carers—relatives who provide care, not for profit, but for love.

6.42 pm

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham): The desperate urgency of the case for carers is obvious to the carers themselves and to anyone who knows a carer. At the very least, caring for an elderly or a disabled person can mean the loss of social life, job prospects and income, but for many carers it also means emotional and physical breakdown, exhaustion and isolation.

I want to mention the circumstances of one woman to whom I talked in her own home last week. For many years Mary looked after her elderly mother until she died at the age of 84 after a long, depressive illness. Three years later, when Mary was only 48, her husband suffered a massive stroke which left him with pre-senile dementia. It was then that, in practice, Mary lost the husband whom she loved dearly.

It is 12 years since Mary's husband had his stroke, years which have seen her life devastated. She has become totally isolated. She had to give up her job to look after him—a job she desperately misses, not only for the money, but because she enjoyed her work. She has lost contact with her friends. She cannot go out to see them because she has to stay in to look after her husband. When she last invited friends to her home her husband stripped off in front of them, so she feels that she can no longer invite them to her home. Her relationships with her children and the rest of her family have also broken down. Her children find that it is less easy to travel to see her, because they have small children, and she cannot travel to see them because she has to look after her husband.

Mary always gets up before her husband to have her breakfast, because as soon as he is awake she is too busy responding to his demands to find time to eat. She finds it impossible to eat at the same table as her husband, anyway, because he stuffs his food into his mouth so forcibly that he nearly always vomits over his food. He is doubly incontinent. She finds faeces smeared everywhere in the house—up the banisters and up the walls. She feels under strain 24 hours a day. On the morning that I met her she had awoken to find that her husband had disappeared. She spent anxious hours searching for him, with the help of the police.

In those 12 years of caring for her husband, the strain and isolation have broken both her physical and her mental health, but because her husband is doubly incontinent she finds it difficult to get respite care, even in an emergency. She had to be taken into hospital for a cancer operation, but even then she could not get respite care. Mary is one of the many carers whose caring has broken her. Because of the struggle and the strain, these carers feel as though they no longer have the capacity to care, yet they have no choice but to continue.

Mary has never been assessed as to her capacity to care. She has never been offered day or night sitting services, or a home help. She says that she cannot stand it any more. She wants to get her husband into residential care, but she will have to go on looking after him because of the low level of services where she lives.

Mary's case is heartbreaking in the extreme, but it is not unusual. It is relatively typical of the pattern of caring. It is not just part of her life; it is a series of caring roles that have taken over her life. They take up the 24 hours of the day, the seven days of the week, and the 52 weeks of the year. As both she and her husband are not earning, she has financial problems. Her case is also typical of the social isolation that is caused, of the breakdown of family relationships and of mental strain. Carers are six times more likely than anybody else to suffer a mental breakdown.

Mary lives in the London borough of Merton. It is a Conservative-controlled borough that takes pride in its low level of spending on social services. That means that it takes pride in an appallingly low level of services. Although there are carers in all parts of the country, the services that are available to support them in their role differ drastically. According to the Minister, there is a network of professional carers and the only problem is co-ordination, but whether one gets any help at all depends not upon one's needs but upon where one lives. There is no respite care for those looking after younger, physically disabled people if one is a carer in Conservative Kent or Conservative Richmond. In neither of those counties, unfortunately, is there one of the excellent Crossroads care attendance schemes.

Mr. Rowe: That is untrue.

Ms. Harman: I stand by the fact that no respite care is provided by the county of Kent for those looking after younger, physically disabled people. Many counties under Tory control provide less than half the number of home helps that are set down in the Government's minimum guideline.

The hon. Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price) referred to the need for more home helps. Is he unaware of the fact that councils that are under Tory control are cutting back on home helps and that the increase in the home help service that the Minster praised is because Labour-controlled councils, in the teeth of Government opposition, have tried to increase their provision? The Liberal-controlled Isle of Wight is such a care less council that it provides less than one third of the Government's minimum guideline for home helps.

Mr. Alton: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms. Harman: It is an irony that the Government praise as responsible and exemplary those Liberal and Tory councils which leave carers to crack up behind closed doors. The Government condemn Labour councils which try to improve services in order to ease the burden on carers. The Government brand them as irresponsible and profligate. What an irony that the Government are discouraging councils which are trying to improve and increase services. The statement in the Government's amendment to our motion, that they intend to continue to improve the level of support for statutory agencies, is not true. In fact, last year council social services spending increased by only 0·5 per cent. because of Government restrictions, although the Department of the Environment acknowledges that a 2·5 per cent. increase is needed just to maintain existing services for the growing number of elderly people.

Nor is it true, as the Government say in their amendment, that they are continuing to improve the level of support to voluntary agencies. As a result of local government spending restrictions, voluntary organisations have seen their council grants cut by over a quarter. Instead, the Government have spawned a chaotic range of schemes for voluntary organisations, many of which involve services being provided by short-term Manpower Services Commission trainees on as little as £1·70 an hour. Carers deserve better than a disjointed service by an ever-changing stream of conscripts from the dole queue.

Instead of mealy-mouthed platitudes, the Government should embark upon a national strategy for ensuring comprehensive provision of services at local level. The Minister said nothing about that in his speech. He referred only to seminars. The Government should be taking the initiative to recognise the growing needs of a growing army of carers.

As well as the financial measures which my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) outlined, the Government should encourage the development of local services which ensure that there is early identification of carers and an assessment of their capacity to care. The Government should also provide sufficient residential provision to ensure that nobody has to care when that is beyond her or his capacity. Not all carers want to be voluntary carers. Some of them are conscripted into caring because there is no alternative. Carers need information and advice about help. They need the continuing backup of key workers to help them to fight their way through the maze of different agencies with which they have to deal. Obviously, we would like to see care attendant schemes in all parts of the country. The Government must encourage and co-ordinate group practice and make sure that the resources are there to back it up.

Forty seven Conservative Back Benchers have already signalled their support for this motion by signing early-day motion 299, which stands in the name of my right hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley). That motion is identical to the motion that we are debating. The Government amendment totally contradicts early-day motion 299, and Conservatives who signed that motion must vote for this motion and against the Government. If they do not, they will be revealing themselves as dishonest and as hypocrites, and carers in their constituencies will be saddened to know that the support they thought they had from their Members of Parliament is worthless because they were not prepared to defend the interests of those carers whom they said they represented.

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): The one thing on which all hon. Members are united is the importance of the subject that we have been debating for over two hours. In some ways, the time has been too short for such an important subject. In the past, the people about whom we have been talking have had inadequate recognition, perhaps from hon. Members on both sides of the House. Such people are worthy not only of the admiration that has been expressed by every hon. Member who has spoken, but of the support of the whole community for what they do.

Apart from the occasional rude remarks that have been made about the Government and the odd sour note that has crept in, I found the debate immensely encouraging. I suspect that five, or certainly 10, years ago such a debate would not have taken place, because nobody would have thought the subject warranted even two or three hours of the time of the House. That is a sign of a great and welcome increase in public and political awareness of the problems of carers.

I have no doubt that part of the trigger for today's debate was the Advocate General's opinion, issued on Tuesday of last week. However, that would not have triggered off the debate if there had not been a fundamental interest in the subject. That interest represents an important gain for our political discussion and for a solution to the problems of the disabled and those associated with them. I am happy to acknowledge that, because I can claim something that was implicit in the speech of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health who opened the debate. While the Government can in no sense claim, nor would we seek to claim, that it is primarily our own achievement, we have contributed to that awareness by the policies and initiatives that we have taken in the past four or five years.

When the first results of the DHSS social work service — now the social services inspectorate — project on informal carers were discussed at a major seminar at Friend's House in London, I was in the job now carried out by my hon. Friend the Member for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney). I remember making the opening speech at that conference which had been instituted to discuss the project. Those taking part included representatives from local authorities, health authorities, voluntary organisations and others. The conference sought to bring to their attention the need to think more about the problems of carers. A good deal has stemmed from that work, carried out only three or four years ago, and it is being built upon.

I know that the Opposition regard £10·5 million as a piffling sum, but we are contributing with our helping the community to care programme. That programme has its bits and pieces. Some are large, others are small, but they are all important in their way in developing further the recognition and awareness of this problem. Pilot projects are taking place in three local authority areas.

The hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) spoke about the information and advice available to carers. The King's Fund work seeks to improve that information and advice. I know that people have occasionally rubbished such things and asked "What is information and advice?" In my experience both in this area and in a narrower way in social security, the improvement of information and advice fulfils a major need and ensures that people know where to go to get the help either in cash or in care that they need. I make no apology for those projects, because they play an important part in what we are all seeking to do.

My right hon. Friend touched on the development of joint finance and joint planning. I should like to join in the tributes that have been paid to many of the voluntary organisations. There has been a significant expansion of the amount of support given to those voluntary organisations by the Government to enable them to expand their work, to which the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) rightly paid tribute.

I have looked up the amount of grant aid paid to a number of those organisations, and it confirms my own recollection of what has taken place during the time that I have been in the Department. Broadly speaking, Crossroads and the Associations of Carers are getting three time the amount of grant aid now that they were getting just a few years ago. The Association of Carers was not receiving any grant aid when this Government took office, because at that time the association did not exist. We have not contributed to the association as much as it would like, but we have contributed significantly to the development of its important work. I hope that we shall be able to continue to do so and to develop financing methods that will assist still further its steady development and give it the greater security that it would undoubtedly like.

I should like to pay tribute to the hon. Member who made the most thoughtful speech in the debate—I hope that I am not offending any other hon. Member by saying that—my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price), who has considerable knowledge and a long involvement in these matters. It gave the debate the balance that it had previously lacked, because of some of the words uttered by the hon. Member for Oldham, West. I was struck by the point that I think my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh took from Judith Oliver of the Association of Carers about the tendency for local authorities and other service providers sometimes to assume too easily that if there is a carer there is no need for services. However, very often the opposite is true. Governments cannot change those attitudes by diktat from the centre, but they can help to change them over a period, and this Government have already contributed to that aim.

Much of the debate has focused on the argument about the invalid care allowance. I acknowledge the strength of feeling and the interest that exists on both sides of the House about that matter. We have heard quoted some huge figures of carers. Whether or not we quarrel with the size of those figures or the sums involved, the House should at least not run away with the idea that the extension of invalid care allowance to married women is a solution to the sort of problem that we are debating. At most, 70,000 of those millions of carers, about whom the hon. Member for Oldham, West spoke, would stand to gain. They would certainly not see this as a solution to their problems or as an alternative to the sort of services that have been spoken about so tellingly in the debate. For example, it must be recognised that an elderly carer would not gain at all from the extension of the invalid care allowance because, as part of her husband's pension, she already receives exactly the same amount of money that she would receive by way of invalid care allowance. If she were to receive invalid care allowance, the husband's benefit would be cut by a corresponding amount.

I ask people not to exaggerate the extent to which invalid care allowance presents a solution to this important issue, nor to exaggerate what would be achieved by what they are urging the Government to do. As the amendment says, we shall consider and report to the House on any judgment that the European Court may make in due course. Both the motion and the amendment in their different ways show the dilemma posed by many different needs. What they have in common is that they unequivocally recognise the needs of carers and the progress that has been made. However, much more needs to be done. The amendment invites the House to proceed in a considered and responsible way.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 33 (Questions on amendments), and agreed to.

Mr. Speaker forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House, noting that there are a substantial number of people from the age of seven to 70 years caring for disabled and elderly relatives at home, often for many years, pays the warmest possible tribute to these carers; and further noting the research which shows that carers themselves often suffer from mental and physical illness, social isolation and disadvantage, recognises the action already taken by the Government to improve their position, especially in view of the undoubted savings to public funds which flow from their commitment; and in particular welcomes the Government's intentions, in line with its stated policies on care in the community and the availability of resources, that: (a) adequate respite care, both at home and in short-stay facilities, be assured by continuing improvement in the level of support given to statutory and voluntary agencies, (b) a flexible system of appropriate support such as home helps and home nursing be available at times when the carer needs them and (c) any judgement which may be made by the European Court relating to the invalid care allowance introduced by the Labour Government in 1976, be carefully considered by the Government and made the subject of a report to the House.

County of South Glamorgan (Taff Crossing) Bill (By Order)

Order for Second Reading read.

7.13 pm

Mr. James Callaghan (Cardiff, South and Penarth): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I seek the indulgence of the House to make my maiden speech on a private Bill.

The purpose of the Bill, which is promoted by the county council of the county of South Glamorgan, is to enable the county council to construct a road crossing of the tidal estuary of the river Taff. The interests of those hon. Members who represent Cardiff are touched by the Bill, as is the interest of the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Sir R. Gower). As the river crossing that is the subject of the Bill is in my constituency, they have kindly allowed me to sponsor the Bill, although they will put their own gloss on it and perhaps add their own reservations. However, I think that there is no basic difference between us in our endeavour to secure a Second Reading.

I should like to begin by describing the area that the Bill touches. We are discussing not an area of sylvan beauty or an untouched coastline that we are seeking to preserve for the national heritage, but one of the most rundown industrial areas in south Wales, an area which was created when the coal traffic was at its height but which, with the decline of the coal traffic, has itself declined and become an industrial backwater where live some of my constituents, several thousand of them, who are in an area of deprivation. We are concerned in this matter to improve the environment in which they live. In so doing we have run up against problems that I will describe and try to treat fairly because I hope, if I can, to satisfy the objections of those who object.

I want those who are thinking of objecting to recognise that this area comprises very old, poor housing, a rundown industrial backwater with a road transport depot at one side and an oil storage depot at the other; the dry docks and the wet docks are there, and the mud flats that lead to them have to be constantly dredged; and unemployment in the area is the highest in the city of Cardiff. I should not like any Member to be under the impression that the vandals of Glamorgan county council are attempting to spoil some part of our national heritage. That would be far from the truth.

The area is being improved, and the Bill is part of the effort to improve it, although the proposal that the House is being asked to approve is the building of a crossing from Cardiff to Penarth across the Taff estuary. Here the difference arises. The county council is proposing a barrage. Those who oppose it for good reasons would prefer a bridge. There may not seem to be much between the two, but I will explain why the county council would prefer to build a barrage.

I have already said that this is an area with the fewest amenities in the city of Cardiff. It is an area outside the entrance to the docks that has been a great handicap to us in the past. It comprises mud flats that have to be dredged constantly. The rise and fall of the river Severn, as I think is well known, at this point are the highest and lowest in the world, with the exception of the Bay of Fundy in Nova Scotia. Having said that, I dare say that I will get a number of letters telling me of other places that have higher rises or lower falls. In this case, it is 40 ft. When the tide goes out, it leaves a tremendous area of mud flats, and the Cardiff docks entrance has to be kept dredged constantly.

In its proposal for completing the road system from one side to the other, the council had what it thought was the excellent idea of improving the amenities of those who live in the area by building a barrage that would hold the water level steady and would disguise the ugliness, which is how some people think of the mud flats. There are, I know, people in Essex who believe that the mud flats there are the most beautiful things in the world. I can only say that my constituents, alas, do not have that taste. They wanted to see the mud flats disguised, and they were very happy with the county council's proposal.

The council wants to take a small area of the mud flats closest to the houses where my constituents live. This is an area on which feed a great many important birds. They go there to feed every winter. I am told that they feed on invertebrates. If they choose, they can also have an excellent diet of rusty bicycles, old bedsteads and sundry other rubbish. Not surprisingly, some of my constituents — though not all — are anxious that this should be removed. A barrage would be one way of removing it.

A public exhibition was put on in the area concerned which 700 people visited. Many were enthusiastic. A large number were in favour and there were some objectors, but I am happy to say that this is the reverse of the normal type of Bill where the objections usually come from the residents. In this case, the residents are in favour and those who live outside—if I were in an unkind mood, I would say those who live in much better areas—are opposed to the Bill. We must take the matter seriously, and later I shall suggest what I think should be done. We must find a balance.

We fell foul of the sites of special scientific interest and conservation groups generally, including the Nature Conservancy Council, all of whom have registered objections. I do not wish to criticise those groups which do much to preserve our heritage. If I may speak of my bona fides, I have been a member of the International Council for Bird Preservation for many years. Yesterday I checked with my bank that my subscription was fully paid, otherwise I might have received a request to pay it.

The county council wishes to enclose a small area of a much bigger area which stretches roughly from the Severn bridge — an area we call the English Stone — through the Welsh Grounds, lying in the middle of the Severn estuary, to the English and Welsh Stone at the bottom. It is a vast area of 25,000 acres or more. The county council proposes to enclose less than 1 per cent. of the total area in order to improve my constituents' amenities. For that reason, I am asking the House to allow the Bill to go to a Committee so that it can examine what can be done to meet the needs of those groups.

A large number of birds roost and feed there, partly, no doubt, because of the nature of the mud flats. Naturally, the mud flats are closest to the city where my constituents live. They are the last to be flooded, and the tide leaves them first. There are also many scavenging gulls on the refuse of the city which pours out. The area has been an eyesore for as long as I have represented this part of Cardiff. It is unpleasant for the residents, and offputting for industry and commerce.

The county council, knowing that there would be claims that its proposals would have an impact on bird life, commissioned a study on the effects. Clearly there will be a loss of feeding ground, and no one can disagree with that. The study, conducted at University College, Cardiff, counted a peak of 1,500 redshanks feeding at low tide, 8,000 dunlin, 450 shelduck and others.

In my innocence, I assume that if the birds are shut out of this tiny area, they will find somewhere else on the huge expanse between the English Stone and the Welsh Stone. However, I am told that, because the area is the last to be flooded, it is where the birds much prefer to be, and that we would perhaps rob them of a little of their feeding ground. The county council tried to handle that, and proposed to the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds that it would construct an artificial mud bank of equal size surrounded by ditches so that it would be there in perpetuity, adjoining the area to be shut off. In that way the birds may continue to feed on an area of equivalent size. I am not making fun of the matter, but that was the type of problem that the county council set out to meet.

I notice that some hon. Members who signed the objection are present. I believe that the RSPB has been unreasonable. It refused to meet the county council to discuss the matter fully, and to see whether the council's idea of a substitute mud bank would meet the objections. The RSPB said, "We are losing so much land for all sorts of good purposes that as a matter of principle we refuse to allow any more to go. Therefore, we must stand on our rights and object to the Bill." If that happens, the Bill will not receive a Second Reading, and that would be entirely wrong. Obviously, we must look after the interests of and seek to conserve our natural heritage, but if the choice is between 1,500 redshanks and 5,000 constituents who live in the worst possible conditions in south Cardiff, we must achieve a balance, and I know where that balance should be struck.

If the RSPB will meet the county council and discuss the matter, every effort will be made before anything is done to construct some alternative that would not destroy even one acre of the birds' natural feeding grounds.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that the RSPB—I am so advised by the Wales officer of the RSPB — has met the county council, placed all its objections before the council and remains of the view that the objections are not met by the proposals in the Bill?

Mr. Callaghan: That is why the objection is continuing.

Mr. Carlile: The county council and the RSPB met.

Mr. Callaghan: Whether they met or not—

Mr. Carlile: The right hon. Gentleman said that they had not met.

Mr. Callaghan: I am not sure whether they met. There was certainly correspondence between them if that counts as a meeting. Some people from the RSPB visited me, and none of them lives in the area about which we are talking. They live in much more salubrious areas. I am anxious that my people should have as good a life as those who came to see me, and that that should not be denied them. That is why I ask the House to give the Bill a Second Reading.

The hon. and learned Gentleman may be right, but no one could have made greater efforts than the county council. The society told me that it was standing on principle and that there could be no compromise because enough has been lost. If a society does that, obviously there can be no agreement, whether or not it met the county council. The House must judge between the two groups and see where it thinks the balance of advantage lies.

I promised to put one further matter to the House. As I explained, the channel is constantly subject to dredging. British Dredging Aggregates, a company in my constituency, operates from a wharf on the river Taff which will be cut off from the sea if the barrage is built. It is the company's most profitable wharf. The company asked me to tell the House that "it is happy to support the Scheme at this stage but that must be subject to the essential requirement that adequate and proper compensation is made to BDA for the loss of a vital part of its undertaking. Discussions are currently proceeding with the Local Authority and it is hoped that adequate compensation will be agreed."

The House need not deny the Bill a Second Reading on those grounds. Although the company will be subject to some difficulty, it believes that it can reach an agreement with the county council.

I shall be glad to answer any questions. If the RSPB has met the county council, I gladly withdraw what I said. Perhaps the hon. and learned Gentleman will explain to me whether the society is willing to depart from its attitude that there can be no compromise on the matter.

Mr. Carlile: I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that a meeting took place between officers of the RSPB, including Mr. Lovegrove, the Wales officer who runs the RSPB in Wales, and county council officials, including the chief environmental officer and the chief solicitor. The RSPB is perfectly prepared to listen to any proposal which the county council puts to it.

The right hon. Gentleman has been fair and most helpful, but could he help me with other important factors? What have been the consultation costs of the barrage scheme? What is the estimated cost of the barrage scheme? For the aid of a comparison, what would be the cost of a bridge?

Mr. Callaghan: I accept that the officers of the RSPB met council officials. I do not think the hon. and learned Gentleman has disposed of my question. If the RSPB is not willing to compromise, what is the consequence of it listening to the county council?

The cost of a high-level bridge—it is all part of a larger scheme and should be put in that context—would be £38 million. The cost of a low-level bridge on piers would be £36 million. The cost of the barrage would be £40,600,000. The barrage would cost £2 million more than a high-level bridge and £4 million more than a low-level bridge. I hope that the hon. and learned Gentleman will not tell my constituents of south Cardiff, who have lived in these conditions for 40 years or more, that £4 million should stand between them and the barrage scheme. If that is the basis of the hon. and learned Gentleman's objections, I must tell him that that is not the sort of equation that my constituents would make. They would be astonished if the hon. and learned Gentleman, as a member of the Liberal party, were to make such an equation.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): My right hon. Friend is making a powerful case on behalf of his constituents. I wish to remind the House that I am a member of the RSPB council, although I have not been involved in this matter. I do not live in one of the salubrious areas referred to by my right hon. Friend; I live in south Yorkshire. if my right hon. Friend secures the Second Reading—I think he is confident of doing so—I hope he can assure us that that will not provide the county council with any reason to believe that it does not need to enter into further discussions with the RSPB. Such discussions are necessary, not least because the RSPB has assured me that it does not, in principle, object to the crossing.

Mr. Callaghan: My hon. Friend is correct. The RSPB has stated consistently that it does not object to the crossing, but does object to the barrage. The RSPB has made it absolutely clear that it favours the building of a bridge.

I can give my hon. Friend an assurance, after many years of contact with the councillors of the county council, that it is their determination and intention—I hope that no one will take exception if I say it is a Labour county council, as I do not wish to put off anyone who is ready to support the Bill—to improve the amenities of the area. Whatever the politics, officials who are not politically minded have shown every desire to meet the RSPB with the intention of achieving a compromise and to find some way of ensuring that the scheme goes through.

I received a letter from the council which informed me that it does not intend to proceed with the construction of the barrage until replacement mud flats have been established. I hope that that assures my hon. Friend and the RSPB. I support the work of the RSPB and I hope that its good work will continue.

It would be a great disservice to people who are deprived and who are living in an area of high unemployment and whose living conditions are not satisfactory if they could not have the improvement in their amenities which this proposed construction would effect.

Mr. Gwilym Jones (Cardiff, North): It is important to stress that there is no lack of enthusiasm for the peripheral distributor road around south Cardiff and for the Taff crossing which is the subject of the Bill. I regard these developments as positive features—indeed, they are one of many features which we can gloriously hold up which seek to attract people to relocate in Cardiff. There have been some local reservations about the line of the road, and, as the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) referred to, the effect on British Dredging Aggregates Limited. Those are not points which I need to discuss in detail as they have been dealt with by the right hon. Gentleman. We are debating the nature of the crossing and whether it should be a barrage. The barrage is the centre of no small controversy both in and outside Cardiff. It is important to emphasise that, from all the representations I have received, there is no objection in principle to this new crossing of the Taff.

When the Bill was read the First time I found it necessary to shout "object" in company with my hon. Friend the Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) and to add my signature to the blocking motion which appears on the Order Paper. I knew that there were significant local worries about the environmental implications of the Bill. I did not feel it was right that it should receive a formal

[Mr. Gwilym Jones]

First Reading and receive a relatively brief consideration by the Unopposed Bills Committee. I had received representations and petitions from constituents who sought my help as well as from local and national groups worried about the environment. I felt those reservations should be considered.

On the day following the First Reading, no fewer than six petitions were received against the Bill. One petition came from ARC (Western) Limited and ARC-Powell Duffryn Limited. The others were from the Cardiff Naturalists' Society, the Severn-Estuary Conservation Group, the Glamorgan Trust for Nature Conservation, the RSPB and British Dredging Aggregates Ltd. That meant that, unless the petitions were withdrawn, the Bill would automatically go to the Opposed Bills Committee.

The week following the First Reading I received an assurance from South Glamorgan county council that it would enter into negotiations with the petitioners in an attempt to reach agreement with them to withdraw their petitions. I withdrew my objection to facilitate and encourage those negotiations. I did not want any excuses for the negotiations not to be pursued full-heartedly, nor did I want it to be claimed that the objections to the Bill were making the negotiations pointless.

I regret that the political representatives of South Glamorgan county council reacted with great arrogance when the Bill was read the First time. They said that all the environmental arguments had already been fully considered by the council and dealt with. Accordingly they said that this House should not bother to hear those arguments for itself. I am sure all right hon. and hon. Members would utterly reject that arrogant and flawed contention. What citizen is too unimportant that his point of view should not be heard by this House? The councils' audacious pretension has been further flawed.

South Glamorgan county council had sought to evaluate the environmental implications and effects. Dr. Peter Ferns of University College, Cardiff, was commissioned to advise the council on these aspects. In turn the South Glamorgan county council offered to carry out the compensatory works recommended by Dr. Ferns — a recognition of the environmental effects claimed by the objectors. However, Dr. Ferns has stated that South Glamorgan county council has not subsequently carried out any work to determine if his proposals are feasible.

The objectors claim that in negotiations with South Glamorgan county council, before and after the First Reading of the Bill, the representatives of the council have, at best, received submissions with a polite "thank you, but no thank you".

The impression has been conveyed that the council is determined to have the barrage, come what may. It is, therefore, only fair to mention that I have had reports from South Glamorgan county council, from its side of the table, to the effect that perhaps not all of the objectors have been fully prepared to work towards an agreed solution to the problem. But inevitably such recriminations will flow from negotiations which both sides admit have failed.

The county council's case for the barrage can easily be seen. It would provide a constant ponding of the water back up the river Taff to where the river runs adjacent to the city centre. It would be a significant cosmetic improvement in itself, and it would also be an improvement for those who abhor mud or for those other all too common features of urban vandalism, the rivers and their banks. We could all give endless lists of those things that are dumped into or alongside rivers by unthinking people.

It is envisaged that a wide range of water sports, most obviously rowing and other small boat racing, could be developed on the ponded water to the clear advantage of those who want to participate or to be spectators. However, cosmetic improvements are certainly not to everyone's liking. Beauty is very definitely in the eye of the beholder. All conservation groups and like-minded individuals emphatically say that the mud flats are very attractive to the wading and other birds which populate them, to those who enjoy and take pleasure in watching them, and to those who make serious studies of them. That enjoyment, and those studies are possible, because the Taff-Ely estuary has the highest density of wading birds in the whole Severn estuary, and as high a density as any other site in Great Britain. Little wonder that the Taff-Ely estuary was designated as a site of special scientific interest in 1981. That is a factor of no slight consequence.

As the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth said, the proposed barrage would only compromise an area of less than 1 per cent. of the whole Severn estuary SSSI or less than 10 per cent. of the Taff-Ely SSSI. But it must be remembered that it is the most up river part of the SSSI, and the part that is available for feeding first and last with each tidal cycle.

I have numerous statistics for the bird population, but I shall cite just one example, that of the redshank, which has a peak count of 1,500. I am advised that the redshank's presence is significant, as there has been a national decline in redshank numbers. But at least in the Taff-Ely site their population has remained relatively stable. The compensatory works originally proposed by Dr. Ferns are only exactly that. Their feasibility is not yet proven, and the barrage would inevitably eliminate a critical part of the bird feeding area, leading to a substantial reduction in the bird population. That is no small price to pay for what others have chosen to describe as a cosmetic only improvement to the river Taff.

I said that there was no objection in principle to the crossing, and I should add that the advantages of industrial regeneration are recognised by all of us, and, not least, by the conservation groups. It has been pointed out to me, however, that if there was a barrage at the mouth of the river Taff there would be a paradox, because it would then be more difficult to attract new industry further up the Taff vale. Moreover, it is confidently predicted that the standards of discharge into the river Taff would have to be raised by the Welsh water authority. New industries might wish to take advantage of the opportunity to discharge into the river Taff, and so the standards would have to be raised if the Welsh water authority was to avoid an unacceptably high effluent level in the static or much slower flowing waters behind the barrage.

Some of my constituents, along with the Cardiff Naturalists Society, the Glamorgan Trust for Nature Conservation and the RSPB, have asked me to vote against giving the Bill a Second Reading and to speak, and to urge others to do so as well.

However, Second Reading is neither the place nor the time to do anything like that. That would not properly answer all the questions that need to be answered. What is worse, it would jeopardise the crossing across the Taff which we all want to see. I want the Bill to obtain its Second Reading and to go on to the Opposed Bills Committee. That Committee will comprise four hon. Members who are impartial and who have no axe to grind. Despite any past recriminations about meetings or negotiations that have taken place between the objectors and the council, I am confident that both sides will have a fair crack of the whip in Committee. Accordingly, I am prepared to give the Bill a Second Reading, despite the fact that I have some quite considerable reservations about it. I hope that it will be given a Second Reading, and I urge all other hon. Members to vote in favour of that.

7.45 pm

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): I congratulate the hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones) on his excellent speech. He set out succinctly many of the objections that I might wish to raise. I share his judgment about the Bill at this stage. Although I have distinct reservations about the environmental impact of the proposed barrage, as well as one other reservation to which I shall refer, I believe that the overall scheme proposed by South Glamorgan county council — the scheme for regeneration of the docklands — is commendable. I should like to see it come to fruition.

I shall concentrate on whether there is a need for a barrage or whether the crossing could be adequately provided by a bridge. The right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) may have given the impression that the local authority is unanimous about the proposal. There is certainly not unanimity among the elected members of the county council. I have taken the trouble to make inquiries within the county council, and I know that some members are very concerned about the cost. I believe that the council will have to establish, to the Committee's satisfaction, that the cost of its proposals has been properly investigated. At this stage, I cannot counter the broad figures given by the right hon. Gentleman for the respective cost of a barrage, bridge, or low-level bridge——

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): Will the hon. and learned Gentlemen give way?

Mr. Carlile: Before I give way, perhaps I should say that some county councillors and others in the area believe that the construction of a barrage as opposed to a low-level bridge would cost substantially more. Information on the relative costs has not been made available, as it might have been. I understand that the county council has already spent about £250,000 on research reports and that the estimated cost of building the barrage, which the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth rightly gave as being just over £40 million, is very much not a fixed estimate. Although the cost of building bridges can sometimes escalate out of all belief, the building of bridges tends to be rather more predictable because the engineering technology is much better known. It is possible, however, that the cost of building a barrage will escalate out of all recognition and reality.

Mr. Ray Powell: I am grateful for the opportunity to ensure that the House is clear on this matter. Only two hours ago, I was given to understand that all the councillors on South Glamorgan county council are agreed on the Bill. Indeed, all the political factions on the county council have agreed to support the measure. Will the hon. and learned Gentleman explain from where he gets his information? I am sure that he does not wish to mislead the House.

Mr. Carlile: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving me the opportunity to do so. I have been informed by the leader of the alliance group on the county council that it supports the principle of the scheme and does not oppose the erection of a crossing, but that it opposes the barrage because of the apparently escalating costs of that method of crossing. I hope that that answers the hon. Gentleman's question.

I move from cost—I have tried to put down a marker for the Committee that the issue of cost must be addressed by proper evidence—to the environmental impact. The Royal Society for the Protection of Birds, which has its Wales headquarters in my constituency, feels strongly about the matter, but it is wrong to suggest that it is not prepared to attend meetings or to consider the views of the county council. I assure the House that, on 13 February at 3 pm, senior staff of the county council met senior staff of the RSPB in Wales, including the Wales officer, Mr. Roger Lovegrove. On that occasion, as the right hon. Gentleman suggested, the county council offered to the RSPB what has been described as the compensatory scheme, which involved the construction of artificial mudflats.

Mr. James Callaghan: The mud will not be artificial.

Mr. Carlile: I am reminded that the mud will not be artificial, but the construction will have to be contrived.

So that it is clear that the RSPB was listening to what it was told, I inform the House that the county council suggested that the construction of the proposed alternative site would cost a considerable amount of money, and it is my understanding that a figure of about £1 million was mentioned. The RSPB was asked to consider the matter and undertook to consider it during the following weeks.

The RSPB considered the matter, but rejected the proposed compromise. I assure the House that the RSPB is a responsible body which does not have a record of opposing all developments involving river crossings on environmental grounds. It tries to take a balanced view between the impact of any proposed scheme, which may be extremely beneficial, upon the local population, and the deleterious environmental impact which may arise. As an example of that balanced view, there is a proposal that the stretch of the lengthy Montgomery canal, leading from part of the constituency of the Leader of the House into my constituency, should be reopened. That would require a private Bill. The RSPB, having considered the evidence, believes that the proposals made for the reopening of the canal, which will involve considerable construction work, are acceptable, subject to environmental safeguards which, in principle at least, have been broadly agreed. It is not a body which simply opposes every such development on environmental grounds. It makes a judgment and, in this case, it made a judgment that the impact of a barrage would be more damaging than is justified.

The right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth appeared to be a little less knowledgeable than he should be about sites of special scientific interest. We are not simply talking about an unsightly mudflat of relatively minor importance, but about a mudflat which is part of a complex of wetlands which has achieved international recognition. It qualifies for protection under the international convention on the conservation of wetlands because it is internationally important. It is also regarded as important under the European Community directive on bird conservation. Indeed, the entire Severn estuary is a proposed special protection area under the EC directive on conservation of wild birds. It is nationally important as a site of special scientific interest because of its important wintering population of shelduck and wading birds, especially dunlin and redshank.

The Taff estuary, although only a small part of the Severn estuary complex, supports 9 per cent. of the birds of the complex and is the third most important subsection of the Severn after Bridgewater bay and the Welsh Grounds. The Taff supports 10 per cent. of the Severn's dunlin population and 26 per cent. of the redshank population. Peak counts of 8,000 dunlin have been recorded. Dunlin and redshank are declining in numbers elsewhere on the west coast.

Mr. James Callaghan: The hon. and learned Gentleman rebuked me for not being as well informed as I should be. If an alternative site is provided for the birds — it is a relatively small matter — why should that reduce the number of birds that roost and feed there? The new site that is being offered, and which the RSPB has not yet accepted, is within a bird's flying distance—a few hundred yards—of the site that would be submerged. I cannot understand the objection in principle by the RSPB.

I am assured that the county council, including the SDP-Liberal alliance, agreed unanimously when the scheme was introduced. Councillors may have had reservations since then on the ground of rising cost, but when the vote was taken, everyone said yes.

Mr. Carlile: The premise upon which the right hon. Gentleman based his first question is false. The provision of an alternative site would not necessarily achieve the purpose of that site.

Mr. Callaghan: Why not?

Mr. Carlile: Because birds may not go to the new site.

Mr. Callaghan: They fly hundreds of miles to get to the present site.

Mr. Carlile: The right hon. Gentleman's simplistic premise flies in the face of the evidence in the report of Dr. P. N. Ferns to the county council, and the considered opinion of the RSPB, which has some expertise in these matters.

The proposed barrage would result in the permanent inundation of at least 8 per cent. of the mudflats on the estuary. Although in quantitative terms it is a relatively small area, it is nevertheless of disproportionate and special importance for feeding birds because of its position at the top of the estuary. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the assertion that the area is important because it is at the top of the estuary. The mud on that flattened area is the last to be covered by the rising tide and the first to be uncovered by the falling tide. As a result, waders concentrate in the area immediately before and immediately after high tide at the time of year when they need to feed for the maximum time. In the coldest conditions they need to feed for longer to acquire fuel in order to survive.

In the mild winter of 1983-84—I cite this example so that the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth and the House can see that the propositions are based on evidence and not just on surmise—66 per cent. of the redshank population in the Taff and 49 per cent. of the dunlin population used the uppermost mudflats for feeding for a significant part of the tidal cycle. In the more severe winter of the following year, 1984-85, 100 per cent. of all species, except curlew, used the area for a significant time. The loss of these mudflats would have serious consequences for birds, especially dunlin and redshank.

I recognise, as does the hon. Member for Cardiff, North, that in the end one must choose between a barrage, which may result in a pretty looking lake with questionable economic benefits, and a perfectly acceptable form of crossing, a bridge, which would not have a considerable impact on the environment and bird life, for, from the point of view of the bird life, it is not good enough to provide another site on the seaward side of the barrage. Expert opinion is that interruption of the natural tidal flow in the estuary because of the barrage could seriously alter the mudflats on the seaward side of the proposed barrage.

As the hon. Member for Cardiff, North said, the reason for a barrage as opposed to another form of crossing is based not on economic or environmental grounds but on cosmetic grounds. A decision must be made whether such an expensive cosmetic recommendation should be adopted, at considerable cost to our important wild life.

The right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth knows that the bird life of Wales is one of Wales's greatest possessions. It attracts many people to Wales, not only to those scenic parts in which my constituency is situated, but to other areas where the birds are. I assure the right hon. Gentleman that people go there to see the birds, even if the birds are on mudflats in a rather unattractive area near a city.

Mr. Callaghan: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Carlile: I assume that the right hon. Gentleman wishes to make a serious point.

Mr. Callaghan: I promise the hon. and learned Gentleman that there is no tourist industry in Butetown, and I fear that there is never likely to be one.

Mr. Carlile: I think that the right hon. Gentleman was not present when I reminded the House that this area is part of an internationally recognised conservation area under the Ramsar convention on wetlands of international importance and that it is proposed to be included as a special protection area under the European Community directive. The serious matters which I have raised—they do not deserve the frivolity which has come, surprisingly, from the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth —should be given full, fair and impartial consideration by the Opposed Bills Committee.

8.5 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Wyn Roberts): It may be helpful if, at this point, I intervene to give a brief indication of the Government's view on the Bill. The Government have considered the content of the Bill and have no objection in principle to the powers sought by the council, although there are minor points of detail that need to be discussed with the promoters. Traditionally, the Government stand neutral in relation to private Bills, and I do not propose to depart from that practice on this occasion. However, it is clear from the contributions made to the debate so far that the County of South Glamorgan (Taff Crossing) Bill raises important issues which require careful and detailed consideration.

The right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) explained the importance of the proposals in the Bill in the context of the county council's plans for the economic regeneration of its area. A crossing of the Taff is clearly seen by the county council as a vital component in the peripheral distributor road scheme designed to improve links with the motorway system and, particularly, to help to bring new life to the old dockland areas of the city whose regeneration is currently being tackled with considerable imagination.

The proposal is that this crossing should be achieved by means of a barrage so as to create a permanent lagoon point to the environmental improvements this would bring about and to the social and recreational benefits which would flow from it. These are all points which cannot be dismissed lightly.

On the other hand, clearly there is a great deal of concern amongst conservationists about the impact on bird life of the proposals to construct an embanked bridge or barrage. The site of the proposed developments affects an area of considerable nature conservation interest — the Taff-Ely estuary — which has been notified by the Nature Conservancy Council as a site of special scientific interest. The site is of regional and national importance for its population of over-wintering wildfowl and wading birds. The NCC includes also the Taff-Ely estuary within the boundary of a wider Severn estuary site which it is considering proposing for designation as a wetland of international importance under the Ramsar convention and as a special protection area for birds under the European Community birds directive, which the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) described.

The NCC takes the view that the construction of a barrage or embanked bridge would entail the loss of an important part of the Taff/Ely site of special scientific interest and has formally advised the Department of the Environment that it objects to the proposals for the Taff crossing contained in the Bill, although it would not object to a crossing which did not involve the loss of feeding grounds. The NCC's report will be placed before the House in the normal way. Undoubtedly, the conservation implications of the proposals demand careful consideration, but they must be weighed against the undoubted benefits which would accrue from the construction of a barrage or bridge, which have been described.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones), the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery and, I am sure, the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth that the arguments would best be decided in Committee when the detailed evidence on either side can be presented, examined and evaluated. I therefore recommend to the House that the Bill be given a Second Reading and allowed to proceed in the usual way to Committee where the provisions can be considered in detail.

8.10 pm

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, East): It is unusual for a Newport Member to intervene in what is essentially a Cardiff matter, and I do so with some trepidation. Strictly speaking, this is not exclusively a Cardiff matter, because the Bill is sponsored by South Glamorgan county council. However, those of us who recall the reorganisation of local government in the early 1970s realise that, essentially, south Glamorgan is really greater Cardiff.

Cardiff is the capital city of Wales, and all Welshmen are proud of it. In the past decade, it has suffered severe blows to its industrial and commercial base. That was symbolised by the closure of the great East Moors steelworks, when thousands lost their jobs. Other enterprises were equally badly affected.

The county council, in its wisdom, has realised that good communications are the key to new developments and to attracting new jobs to the area. New road schemes have formed a large part of the county council's regeneration scheme. There is a need for better linkage with the M4 via the Severn bridge to south-east England and, likewise, better access via the M50 and the M5 to the midlands and north England. The major element in this strategy is a southern link road around Cardiff. The southern part of Cardiff would particularly benefit, including the docks which in recent years have suffered because of the loss of their traditional trade. Other developments running parallel to the new road scheme consist of residential, commercial, high-tech, leisure and public development. Altogether it seems to be a most enterprising scheme.

The route of the new road has been considered for many years, and the line chosen was considered and then approved after public inquiries. The whole scheme is to undertake industrial and commercial regeneration but, significantly, one of its principal aims is to improve the environment. The county council has granted planning permission for a barrage option and an embankment/bridge where the road crosses the estuary.

It is felt that these developments could considerably improve the appearance of the lower reaches of the river Taff and provide recreational and leisure opportunities for the Cardiff people. This is not just a cosmetic exercise, as was suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile). The construction of a barrage would ensure that the unattractive river bed and lower part of the river, which are exposed at low tide, are covered by water at all tidal levels. Those objectives and the developments they encompass are commendable. They make sense from an economic and investment standpoint and in environmental and recreational terms.

A snag in the scheme which has already been mentioned several times is that some disturbance will be caused to the conservation interests of the Taff estuary and the site of special scientific interest. As a result, there have been protests. For example, I received from the Gwent Ornithological Society through its chairman, Mr. Peter Martin, a letter dated 14 March, in which he said that the Taff estuary was special because it supported 9 per cent. of the birds—mainly waders—using the Severn estuary. Those birds feed on the mud flats which would be enclosed by the proposed development.

Other conservationist bodies have been active and have made their views known. I suppose that it is a sign of the times, and praiseworthy, that such strong protests should be made in the interests of conservation. Nevertheless, we must all recognise that a reasonable and fair balance must be found between the interests of the economy and the environment and the interests of conservation.

[Mr. Roy Hughes]

The county council believes that its proposed development tends to outweigh the more specialised conservation and ecological considerations. On balance, I tend — reluctantly, in some ways — to support the county council's view. We are, after all, living in a time of mass unemployment, and Wales has particularly suffered. Cardiff, like many other parts of the country, badly needs new jobs. This development will help to provide them. Likewise, with the growth of technology, more leisure time will be made available. A recreational scheme of the type proposed by South Glamorgan county council will help to fill a need.

As I understand it, the county council is prepared to sit down with the Nature Conservancy Council, the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds and other interested groups so that compensatory measures can be discussed. For example, a small nature reserve has been suggested because new habitats may be created behind the barrage. Every encouragement should be given to this possibility. New mud flats and roosting sites will be created.

The number of disturbances could be controlled. The county council's suggestions leave me with the impression that the conservationist bodies are knocking at an open door. The South Glamorgan county council is prepared to co-operate with the bodies which have the necessary expertise. The council has had a good conservation record since its inauguration in the early 1970s. This Bill is, therefore, worth supporting. It should be given a Second Reading, for, with good will, the objections can be ironed out.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle (Lincoln): I object to the Bill not because I do not want a crossing of the estuary of the river Taff, but because the barrier that has been proposed achieves the crossing in a way that is less than adequate. We all recognise the need for Cardiff to develop its economy, and we certainly support the aim of creating jobs. I have a great deal of sympathy for the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) and my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones) and the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes), who all argued the economic case. There is no doubt that hon. Members who represent that part of south Wales have a compelling duty to try to improve the economy and to bring jobs to their area. I myself come from an area which needs jobs, and I can understand the need to make rapid and lasting progress in this respect.

What I find highly objectionable about the Bill is not the crossing itself but its proposed form, its effect and its cost. It could very well be achieved without destroying a valuable habitat and what I believe will in future be an area of great interest for residents of Cardiff, particularly when Cardiff enjoys the economic regeneration which we all expect. The crossing could retain that interest and also, by creating better communications and industrial connections, achieve the economic benefits which we would all like to see. It could also be constructed at considerably less cost to the taxpayer.

We have had a long discussion about dunlin and redshank and numbers of wading birds. I do not intend to go down that road, but I do want to mention four of the really important aspects of the conservation argument. This is a site of special scientific interest. It is also scheduled under the Ramsar convention. The environmental requirements, therefore, need to be examined very carefully.

The area to be affected covers some 9 per cent. of the birds of the whole Severn complex, so it is not something to be sniffed at and the number of birds is not insignificant. The area affected is at the top of the tide, so it is of particular interest and value to these birds in periods of very heavy weather. In the hard winter of 1984-85 — and, I am sure, in this past winter although we have no figures yet — 100 per cent. of the species spent some of their time feeding in this area. It is of clear benefit to them. If they do not have it for feeding, they do not go elsewhere, because there is nowhere else to go; they are just lost to the bird population.

Why should we care about this? Wetlands and coastal habitats of this type are under threat. They are diminishing. We have a clear duty to protect these irreplaceable assets for future generations. The Government have recognised this principle in the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 and also through European Community directives in, for example, the Ramsar convention. Are we in this House merely to ignore this? That is not good enough, without the most convincing reasons for doing so.

I might consider my argument a little weaker if this would stop the development and modernisation of Cardiff, but I do believe that it would. If we achieved these essential communications across the Taff estuary, they would in themselves lead to economic activity and to all the benefits of a more effective and vigorous economy in the area.

Moreover, it would be cheaper and easier to build a bridge on concrete piers which would allow the tide to flow and so not destroy the habitat. The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) mentioned the cost. It is a significant factor. When it examines this matter, the Committee will need to know the exact costs, the cost of the barrage and of the hydraulically operated sluice gates, together with the cost of the annual and ongoing dredging rather than just the compensation to be paid to the dredging company. It will need to know if significant costs will be incurred by raising the level of water and thus increasing the damp in the adjacent houses. I ask that all those costs be put before the Committee and be compared with the cost of a simple bridge on stilts.

In addition to the loss of habitat and the expense, the county council, in my view — and I say this as an outsider, I admit — has shown a lack of vision and a failure of imagination. While I accept the need to develop the area, the opportunity could have been taken to create a valuable natural reserve and an area of great interest for local people. In the proposed new leisure complex, for example, why could a viewing centre not have been set up overlooking the mud flats, with perhaps a small museum to show local people the value of mud flat and tidal waters for wildlife and explaining the wildlife which exists? That would have been of unique benefit and of great educational value, and it would have fitted in well with the redevelopment of the area.

Leaving the mud flats does not mean choosing between birds and people; it is really making the best use of what is there to help the people and to encouraging interest in the area. The rusty cycles and bedsteads lying on those mud flats are not there just because there are mud flats there, but because people have no interest in the area. If one were to create an interest and bring out the variety in the area, one could solve that particular problem. Yet instead of this vision, the county council has decided to use the bridge and barrier to go for an inland lagoon which will not only destroy what is natural and special about the area, but will put something which is neat and dull in place of something which is or could be perhaps wild and intriguing.

It is not good enough to claim that the county council will create another habitat and make recompense for what has been lost. New habitats need years in which to create the diversity and complexity of an established habitat. I think of ancient woodland where it has taken 300 or 400 years to develop that complexity. It may not take so long in the Taff estuary—I am no expert on mud flats—but we will not replace one habitat with another at all easily. So we are going to lose something. Although the county council must be encouraged to do as much as possible to replace the habitat, we cannot fool ourselves that we will be successful.

We all support the development of Cardiff. I respect the line taken by my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North and his great interest in the economic prosperity of his constituency and area. But we can achieve that without destroying a valuable habitat. We can achieve that without an expensive solution, by going for something that is clearly more cost effective for the taxpayer.

Above all, by destroying the habitat, the county council would be losing an opportunity to create an imaginative site full of interest for the people of the area. If the Bill goes into Committee, these matters must be fully examined, and the Committee should alter the Bill to take account of the valid objections that have been made.

8.30 pm

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): I agree with many of the points made by the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle).

I wish to express my concern about what is proposed by the county council in the development in Cardiff. Bills such as this arouse concern and opposition. Depending on what one makes of earlier speeches, the county council may or may not have met the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds. That leads to the view that people who build roads often bring a bad name on themselves.

No hon. Member thinks that the road should not be built, but the proposal was introduced in such a way that there was bound to be opposition. There are two parts to the proposal. The first relates to the road and the second to an amenity lake and scenic area. They can be separated, because it is possible to build the road on stilts, costing £4 million or £6 million less than if it is built on a barrage. I would welcome a contradiction from any hon. Member if I am wrong.

We all want the road. Wales needs communications. It has suffered from bad communications for long enough. There are dreadful roads in mid-Wales and no motorway in north Wales. A bypass at Wrexham was built only on the condition that the railway line was singled, thus depriving us of a decent railway service. I have no argument against the road. We need plenty of good roads because our success as a modernised industrialised nation depends on our ability to communicate with the other parts of the country and Europe.

However, the road could be built on stilts. There would have been no opposition if the county council had proposed that idea. Instead, the county council has embarked on an ambitious plan for this derelict area.

Earlier this evening I saw an exhibition, mounted by the county council, with pictures of rotting and rusty metal in the mudflats. The residential area appears to be a quarter or half a mile further up the river. I asked the county council why, if the residential area was further up the river Taff, it could not build a barrage there. Its answer was that it wanted to build a sports and amenity complex halfway between the barrage and the residential area. Therefore, there is some point in having a barrage lower down the river so that the view can be more scenic.

Mr. James Callaghan: I would not wish my hon. Friend to be under any misapprehension about where the houses are. The houses of Grangetown are a quarter of a mile away, but there is one area in my constituency where the people do not need a viewing centre, because they already look out over the mudflats.

Dr. Marek: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that information. My only knowledge of the area comes from having looked at the maps and pictures two hours ago.

There should have been some compromise before the Bill came before the House. It is no use trying to find out who is to blame, but there has not been enough communication. If there has been a meeting, there has been only one. Something must be done. I share the view of other hon. Members that we should not hold up the Bill on Second Reading. Therefore, I do not intend to talk for one and a half hours. However, I have one or two points to make. The Bill should have a Second Reading and go into Committee, where I hope that meetings can be arranged, arguments can be put forward and we can achieve a compromise.

One possible compromise would be to move the road further north. However, that is not practical, because the road will be extremely expensive, and it appears that the county council would not consider it. Another possibility was mooted by the RSPB, the Cardiff naturalist trusts, and the other environmental bodies, all of which are concerned. The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) mentioned four bodies as being against the plan, so one cannot dismiss the environmental arguments.

The RSPB and other environmental bodies have suggested that the bridge should be built on stilts, so that the tide can go in and out. However, that would not satisfy the legitimate aspirations of the county council, which wants to do something for the area so that the residents will have a tidy environment. Moreover, it wants to build the leisure centre in a first-class position. Simply to have the rotting iron remaining there, with the tide going in and out of the mudflats, is not what the county council wishes to see.

Another possibility is to scrape away the spart grass on the other side of the barrage and to have a one or two-acre lake with a shallow end and a wide expanse. One would then hope that, deprived of their natural feeding habitats, the birds would fly over the new road and settle and feed on the other side. I am not a member of the RSPB, nor an expert on birds, but I shall believe that when I see it. The county council is prepared, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) has said, to build such a lake before constructing the road. That might be a good idea. I am not sure whether invertebrates will be found on the other side of the proposed road construction once the spart grass has been scraped away, so that everything will be available for the birds. However, we should not dismiss that idea until it has been investigated. I know that the county council has undertaken a study, but this solution should be investigated fully to find out whether it would be acceptable.

[Dr. Marek]

The RSPB may be worried that, if it gives way on this project, there may be problems. Every two or three months an area used by birds is under threat—whether from a farmer wanting to plough it up, a county council wanting to build a road across it or a company wanting to dig peat out of it to distil whisky.

I am concerned about this matter in general. The RSPB could be right in saying that if the county council goes ahead with its plan but it does not work out, the council could wash its hands of the area. I would welcome a commitment in Committee that the county council would maintain an ongoing interest in the problem. If the road were built with an appropriate area for the waders on the other side of the barrage, that might be adequate. However, if that did not work, I hope the county council will not say, "We built the road five years ago and it is too late to worry about the birds now. We had 8,000 redshanks five years ago, but we have only 2,000 now. We have no clue where the others have gone but they must be somewhere." I hope that the county council will take a more positive attitude. They should realise that there is a serious problem. Redshank numbers are declining on the west coast. Once the council has realised that, perhaps it could spend some money to discover the cause of the decline in numbers and make adequate arrangements with regard to the building of the road.

If the county council could give such a commitment, to have a continuing interest in the bird population once the road has been built, the RSPB could take note of that and therefore have more faith in the council.

There is another possibility which might be entertained. As I understand it, the barrage would cost £42 million and the low level bridge £38 million. It might be possible to build a low level bridge and build a barrage with the extra £4 million or £6 million 200 yards north of the bridge. It would not be necessary to put a road on that barrage, and therefore it would be cheap. That barrage would be built at an angle to satisfy the residents—[Interruption.] I am making a suggestion.

Mr. Stefan Terlezki (Cardiff, West): Come on.

Dr. Marek: If the hon. Gentleman would like to intervene, I shall gladly give way as I would like to hear what he has to say.

If we give the Bill a Second Reading, we will show that we agree in principle with the proposal although we have some reservations. In the debate we are offering suggestions. These suggestions may be hopeless, but the council should consider them seriously. If the suggestions prove to be useful at the end of the day, the House might have done a service to the members of the public that it seeks to represent.

It is possible to build a bridge on stilts or a low level bridge and use the extra money to build a barrage 200 or 300 yards north of the bridge. From my examination of maps of the area, the bank in question is just that very small distance north of where the bridge might be positioned. If the bridge were built at an angle, it might be possible to satisfy both parties involved in the consideration of the problem.

It might also be possible to build a road partially as a barrage and with stilts in the central part. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Terlezki) should not lower the tone of the debate by his sedentary interventions. This is a serious issue to the people not only of Cardiff but throughout this country from Land's End to John O'Groats. People are seriously worried about the environmental depredations that are taking place every day of the year. The matter is extremely serious and it deserves our careful consideration.

I shall not detain the House for much longer. It is possible to build a low level bridge to form a barrage for most of its route with stilts in the middle. A semi-circular barrage could be built to keep the banks that are important for the dunlin and the redshank. Although there are many acres of mudbanks in the Severn estuary, as other hon. Members have explained, the mudbanks that we are considering tonight have more than their average share of waders. The fact that the area is at the top of the estuary and is therefore the last area to be covered when the tide comes in and the first to be uncovered when the tide goes out makes it very important for wading birds.

In conclusion, I hope that the controversy about this matter can be dispensed with and that the Bill will receive a Second Reading. I hope, too, that in Committee we shall be able to resolve our differences. There must be a middle way in this matter. We must have the road—there is no doubt about that — but we must also preserve our environment.

8.44 pm

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): I will not go down the same road as my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek). He has covered a number of points which I hope will be examined closely by the Committee after the Bill receives its Second Reading.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) began his speech by apologising for taking part in the debate because he did not think that he should be involved as he was an hon. Member for Newport. He thought that he should not become involved in a debate about Cardiff. Having listened to speeches from the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) and from the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) and now from my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham, I make no apology for speaking in the debate. My constituency is Ogmore, and the river Taff runs through Ogmore to Cardiff. Most of my constituents shop in Cardiff and go there for their entertainment. I believe that the benefits of the Bill could extend to my constituents.

I am rather surprised that the Conservative Members with Cardiff constituencies have not sought to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I would remind them of a statement made by Nye Bevan that "If you sit on the fence too long, the iron will rot your soul." I would have thought that they would have been open in their support for the Bill. Local authorities in their constituencies, the South

Glamorgan county council and the Conservative party have given much support to the Bill, and I cannot understand why they have not supported it.

In all probability they share the same view that I would like to express regarding my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan). We all listened to his comprehensive speech, which covered most of the issues involved in this short debate. As might be expected from a previous Prime Minister and the present Father of the House, my right hon. Friend made an excellent speech. I take great pleasure in complimenting him on what was an excellent maiden speech on a private Bill. I know that that sentiment would receive sympathetic backing from all hon. Members present tonight.

I have known my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth for at least 30 years. I am familiar with his service and representation to the city of Cardiff and to the Cardiff constituencies that he has represented as there have been parliamentary boundary changes almost every other election. I am sure that the House would unreservedly give its support to a Bill which my right hon. Friend introduced on Second Reading. I am sure that my right hon. Friend would be concerned only about the interests of the constituents that he has served in Cardiff and that he would not propose any measure to the House that might be detrimental to his constituents or to the environment of the Cardiff area in general.

I have no reservations about supporting the Second Reading of the Bill. I know the area well and I have canvassed there on many occasions, in Cardiff, North, South, East and West and indeed in Cardiff, South and Penarth. I did that when Cardiff, South and Penarth was Cardiff and Penarth before the reorganisations many years ago. I know the specific area we are talking about. I believe that the Bill should receive a Second Reading so that a Committee can be set up.

I am even more pleased to support a Bill on the Floor of the House having recently been involved in a controversial debate in the House on whether private Bills were needed and whether hon. Members should sit on Committees discussing them. I share the view that we should make facilities available in the House for private Bills and that hon. Members should serve on the Committees considering them. I know that on occasions that is irksome. Hon. Members may not have a particular interest in a Bill. Nevertheless, I have served on two such Committees, and they were interesting. I am sure that those who are asked to serve on the Committee considering this Bill will also find it interesting.

Having discussed all the issues mentioned by the hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones), I am convinced that his arguments are reasonable, forthright and responsible and I feel sure that the Committee will investigate fully the points that he so ably and responsibly raised. After Second Reading, the matters that he raised can be looked at in depth and in detail.

Having read more literature from the preservation societies on this proposal than, perhaps, from South Glamorgan county council, I know that it is necessary to look after the environment. I fought the last general election against a Greenpeace candidate and I learnt more about the environment and that movement than I had known before.

To date, the cost to the county authority is about £60 million and the link road to the M4 from the Grangetown link to the Butetown link should be approved. If the M4 stops where it is now, it appears, from examining the drawings and maps earlier, that the road would lead only to a residential area in Grangetown and through to the docks. If the Bill does not receive its Second Reading a great opportunity will be lost and the road will lead to nowhere. The problems of Grangetown as described by my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff South and Penarth will remain unresolved.

If hon. Members had taken the opportunity to look at some of the maps and drawings of some of the areas covered by the proposal and at the proposals of the county councils, they would appreciate that it is necessary for constituents to have their environment changed. A large area of Cardiff could be changed, far beyond the changes set out in the Bill.

The sponsors of the Bill have been kind enough to ensure that we have notice of the petitions against the Bill on the grounds of its potential effects on bird life which have been lodged by four conservation bodies. The county council accepts that the case for those conservation interests deserves careful consideration.

Two petitions have been lodged against the Bill by businesses which are likely to be affected. Negotiations are taking place with those petitioners which it is hoped will result in agreement. It is respectfully submitted that unless negotiations produce an agreed solution an opposed private Bill Committee would be the appropriate forum for considering the case. Most hon. Members have expressed that opinion earlier in the debate.

The county council has offered to the conservation petitioners a commitment to implement the material measures mentioned. The county council will gladly explain the material measures to a Committee of the House and undertake through that Committee to carry out those measures before commencing the construction of the river crossing. That covers the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham.

The county council respectfully called attention to the fact that giving a Second Reading to a private Bill means that the House affirms the principle of the Bill conditionally and subject to the proof of the allegations of fact before the Committee to which the Bill is referred. Those allegations of fact are comprised in the preamble to the Bill on which the case for the Bill is founded. In the circumstances, it is respectfully submitted that it would be proper for the Bill to be given a Second Reading so that the issues which it raises may be thoroughly investigated in Committee. Therefore, I support the Bill and I hope that the House will do likewise.

Mr. James Callaghan: With the leave of the House, I have an obligation to those who have expressed strong reservations on the Bill to say a few words to try to reassure and to meet the reservations raised by the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle), the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) and my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek).

The county council's general record in conservation of the environment is well known. I am one of the few people in the House who has an island in his constituency—Flat Holm. If any hon. Member had any doubts about the environmental interests of the county council he need only go to Flat Holm to see what has been done there to preserve and conserve its heritage. In addition, there is the Gwent-Glamorgan heritage coast, the Cosmeston lakes country park, Caerphilly mountain country park, the medieval village and an ambitious tree-planting project.

I am sure of the bona fides of South Glamorgan county council in this matter. It told me that it does not wish to be seen as vandalistic or insensitive in its consideration. It wishes to find a balanced and sensible compromise. South Glamorgan as an authority is conscious of the need to protect and enhance the quality of the environment, both generally and specifically. It wishes to seek the co-operation of the Nature Conservancy Council, the RSPB and other interested groups in determining the type and nature of compensatory measures. Hon. Members who raised those questions will find that South Glamorgan has every desire to come to some agreement.

I make one final offer to those hon. Members who have expressed their reservations, but not to those who have expressed their support. If they care to come to Cardiff, I shall stand them a good lunch and I believe that they would be convinced by what they saw.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and committed.

Agricultural and Horticultural Co-operation Grants

8.57 pm

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John Selwyn Gummer): I beg to move,

That the draft Agricultural and Horticultural Co-operation Grants (Extension of Period) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 23rd April, be approved.

The Agriculture Act 1967 provided authority for a scheme of grants to encourage and develop co-operation in the production and marketing of agricultural produce. There have been three extensions, in 1977, in 1980 and again in 1983, the latter ending on 14 May 1986. We propose to extend the period during which a co-operative grants scheme may operate by a maximum of five years, compared with three on previous occasions. I believe that the agricultural and horticultural co-operation scheme has done much over the years to encourage producers to come together and to undertake imaginative and forward-looking investments.

Since 1981-82 expenditure under the AHCS has more than doubled, from about £2 million to over £4 million. Over the same period launching aid paid to new fruit and vegetable co-operatives under EC legislation has risen from virtually nil to £1·2 million. Other grants payable to forage groups in the less favoured areas brings the current annual level of expenditure on co-operative grants to over £5·5 million. Given the growth in expenditure, we have looked at the AHCS in relation to other claims on the limited resources available. We have concluded that there are simply not the resources to allow unlimited further expansion of expenditure under the scheme and that some steps should be taken to bring it under greater control.

We believe that the necessary additional control of expenditure can be brought about by laying down a number of objective criteria by which applications will in future be assessed and by identifying some of the consequences flowing from them. One of my officials has, therefore, written today to the chief executive of Food from Britain setting out the criteria. Copies of the letter will be placed in the Library of the House. However, hon. Members may find it helpful if I outline the main criteria and the effect that they will have on the grants awarded.

The criteria include the funds allocated by Ministers in each financial year to pay grant claims. For 1986-87 the total provision for co-operative grants is about £5 million, about £4·8 million in 1987-88 and about £4·4 million in 1988-89. There is a time lag of up to two years between the award and the payment of the grant. In order to keep expenditure within the provision, therefore, we will need to tailor the level of approvals currently being given to match the money available for later years. One way in which we will do this is to place an upper limit on grant on any individual project of £100,000.

Ministers already restrict the amount of AHCS grant awarded to successful co-operative applicants under EC regulation 355/77. Successful co-operatives can now obtain up to 50 per cent. of the cost of projects from these two sources, which we consider too high when overall resources are limited. We shall therefore in future be limiting AHCS grant in such cases to 15 per cent., which, together with grant under regulation 355/77, will still total up to 40 per cent. of the cost—a substantial incentive.

The supply and demand position of each commodity will also be taken into account. This is very much part and parcel of the Government's policy to bring into the equation the realities of a world which is now in surplus rather than in shortage. As a result, we do not expect capital grants to be made to co-operatives in the cereals sector in future.

The criteria will be applied to applications received by FFB after today and prospective applicants will also be informed of them. We will, of course, continue to make grants available under the scheme for non-capital expenditure, which includes formation costs, feasibility studies, initial managerial salaries and marketing agents fees. Such grants can help to ensure that co-operatives get off to a good start and employ good quality staff to run their businesses.

For a number of years there has been a ceiling on the level of non-capital grant recommendations which FFB can make to Ministers in any one year. This has stood at £450,000, and we are reducing it to £350,000 for 1986-87 in order to stay within the financial resources available. As I have indicated, if we do not take this action now there is every likelihood that expenditure will soon outstrip resources. Nevertheless, expenditure on grants will still be substantial at around £4·4 million in 1988-89.

I am sure that the House will welcome the continuation of the AHCS and will recognise the widespread benefits which it has brought. I am sure that the House would also want it to be carried forward within the new situation brought about by the surplus production, which is now a continuing feature of our agricultural and horticultural life. Therefore, it seems perfectly right that we should make the sort of changes in administration which I have outlined, and I felt that this debate on the statutory instrument ought to give us a chance to acquaint the House with them.

I commend the statutory instrument to the House as a means of ensuring that these grants are available for a further period, but within the context of the overall resources we have to apply, and also with the new situation which we must constantly take into account now that we are concerned with surpluses, not only in this country and Europe, but in the world.

9.5 pm

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): The Minister of State referred briefly to the need to deal with the new situation that confronts the agriculture industry because of the surpluses that are a new feature of this type of market. It would be helpful to the industry and to many other people if the Government could give a clearer lead about the direction the industry is supposed to be taking. The Opposition support the order. There is a strong case to be made for promoting co-operatives and assisting change to take place, where appropriate, in the agriculture industry.

The only point that I want to put to the Minister relates to the body that has been charged with the task of disbursing funds, Food from Britain. The Minister said that an official in his Department had today written to the chief executive of Food from Britain. Some of those who are involved in the agriculture industry might wonder whether his letter will be returned to him tomorrow marked "Not known at this address." There is an air of crisis about Food from Britain. A meeting of that organisation has taken place today and it would be useful if the Minister could say something about it.

If this and other marketing schemes that are the responsibility of Food from Britain are to continue—I stress that there is universal support for a national promotional organisation for agricultural produce and for its funding not only by the Government but by the industry—help is needed. The funding of Food from Britain is in a state of crisis. The organisation has been unable to secure the £4·8 million that it needs to run a credible operation during the current year. The Government have guaranteed £3 million, which is welcome and appropriate. The Meat and Livestock Commission is to provide £265,000, but that is considerably less than was envisaged. As yet, nothing has been promised by the Milk Marketing Board, and a poll of cereal producers has yet to take place to find out whether they are prepared to contribute towards the organisation. There needs to be more certainty about the future of Food from Britain. Nevertheless, it might be argued that, because of the uncertainty surrounding it, the agriculture industry is not in a good position to take on this additional burden.

It would be helpful if the Minister could say whether the Government intend Food from Britain to survive and to succeed and whether, if necessary, they are prepared to tide it over. This would be an appropriate opportunity for the Minister to say something about the matter. It would be relevant to this order, because Food from Britain is the organisation through which these funds will be channelled. Again I stress the Opposition's general support for the objectives of the order. I hope that the Minister will be able to allay some of my fears.

9.7 pm

Mr. Colin Shepherd (Hereford): I commend my hon. Friend the Minister of State for directing resources towards areas of need that are not covered by those commodities that are in surplus. He will have commended himself and his ministerial team to the public as a whole who are casting a careful eye over the agriculture industry and its support mechanisms. What he has done is right, and I congratulate him on doing it.

I have a specific point to put my hon. Friend about the draft order. Previous orders have run for a period of three years. This order is to run for five years. In the light of the remarks of the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson), I should be grateful if my hon. Friend would explain the reason for this extension.

9.8 pm

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): I welcome the extension of the AHCS support. It is essential for the industry. However, further development of such grants is needed. In the context of the surpluses to which reference has already been made, there is a need to develop new markets and new products. We are depressed by the surpluses, but they should not allow our vision to become clouded. We may be able to produce new products that secure new markets. We should not ignore that.

Undoubtedly, there is under-funding of Food from Britain. However, the industry must be grateful for £3 million this year. That is obviously a help, but there is an immense task ahead. For example, New Zealand promotes its lamb in Britain at a cost of something like £7 million and that shows one of the problems we face in marketing our own food, but there is vast scope here too for us. The Minister said that there were limits on the amount of money that could be spent. I understand that, because for purposes of good housekeeping he has to work within a budget. However, I should not like to think that the Treasury has placed a dead hand on co-operative grants for agriculture.

As has been said, the industry is in something of a crisis. I have visited co-operative and marketing units on the continent, and it is obvious that a lot of money has been spent on co-operatives there. Continental farmers have advantages because of investment in the past, and we have not caught up with them. I was recently in western France and saw a co-operative that was developing new products. It was bringing forward six new meat products a month and selecting one of them for marketing. As I was leaving the building I noticed that many of the products were stamped and destined for Sainsbury's. We have serious problems to face in competition and marketing and if Food from Britain is in something of a crisis we need to pay attention to that. This is not a contentious issue in terms of politics across the House. The industry needs support, especially in marketing. I support the renewal of the AHCS grants but they need to be beefed up.

9.12 pm

Mr. Gummer: I should like to answer the points that have been raised and to thank Members on both sides of the House for their support.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd) asked about grant extension. We have sought to extend the period from three to five years because we believe that it is helpful for the industry to have security and to know that grants will continue over a longer period. Where we have the chance, it is necessary to give agriculture and horticulture such reassurance. That is because it is much more difficult to operate in a world where the security that comes from shortage has been replaced by the insecurity that is bound to attend surplus.

It is a curious fact within the industry, and one that we must face, that when people no longer have the assurance that they can always market what they produce because of shortage, they have to learn to live in a new kind of world. We want to make sure that there is no danger of people feeling that at some point in the future they will find themselves without these grants. That is why we have extended the period from three to five years.

The hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) asked whether, if the industry was unable to come up with the extra funding for Food from Britain, the Government would tide it over. The Government are already supplying £3 million. We have also agreed to provide additional sums next year, and in future we will supply matching funds on a generous basis, but we are not prepared to come up with more funds if the industry is not prepared to back Food from Britain. That is because Food from Britain works only if the industry is deeply involved in it and shows backing for it. We have no reason to doubt that the industry will produce the money that is necessary.

The hon. Member for East Lothian talked about a state of crisis. The way to create a state of crisis is to say that. There is no state of crisis in Food from Britain. It is continuing to operate successfully. However, it does not have the assurance of its future funding that we had hoped, not because it is not there, but simply because, as so often happens, the agriculture industry takes longer to come to the necessary arrangements. Reasonably, it has been suggested that until the poll among cereal producers has been carried through it is difficult to see what will come from that area. It is true that the milk marketing boards have not yet fixed a figure, but they have said that they will give generous support in line with the support given by other people.

The hon. Gentleman has been long enough in agriculture to accept that. It is always true that various sectors want to make sure that others are contributing before they put down their money. I can understand that. That and the innate conservatism—if I may use that word—of the agriculture industry taking a little longer to decide what to do override and run against the enthusiasm which we on both sides of the House have for Food from Britain.

I beg the House to accept that it is only if the industry itself shows enthusiasm by putting its money where its mouth is that we shall get the Food from Britain that we want. An enormous sum is not needed, but what is needed must come from the industry.

Mr. Colin Shepherd: Would not the industry do well to refresh its memory by looking at the experience of the French marketing co-operatives to see what can be done? Over the past few years, the progress that the French organisation has made may have been forgotten. Food from Britain was modelled on it. It may have been forgotten how persistence will produce similar results of a dynamic nature.

Mr. Gummer: I am sure that my hon. Friend is right, and that everyone in the House agrees that the agriculture industry would do itself and the nation a great disservice if it did not take seriously the need to provide the funds so that food can be presented with the same enthusiasm, panache and expertise as so many other products are produced. We are spending less per head as a proportion of our income on food than we have in the past. It is important that we ensure that the public are aware of the benefits, particularly of British-grown and produced food.

Mr. Home Robertson: I assure the Minister that, as a cereals producer, I shall vote for a levy when the poll takes place. The fact remains, however, that if the Minister has been reading the papers he will recognise that it is not I who have suggested that there is a crisis, but that it is broadly acknowledged that there is a crisis in Food from Britain. The scale of the crisis could mean that that organisation may not even be able to take part in the Paris show, which would be a tragedy.

Will the Minister give an undertaking that the Government will use such influence as they have with public organisations, such as the Meat and Livestock Commission and milk marketing boards, to ensure that they take their share of the burden? It is not good enough if Food from Britain has to stagger from crisis to crisis. There must be a guarantee to ensure that it can continue to succeed, as it has begun to succeed.

Mr. Gummer: My objection to the word "crisis" was that it is an inappropriate word. It suggests that it might be a continuing crisis of the sort to which the hon. Gentleman refers.

The organisation was a creation of the Government, and my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and his predecessor put a great deal of personal support into it. There was also great support from elsewhere in the House—I am not talking on a party political basis. That had not been done before in Britain. It was an important innovation. It should have been done a long time ago. Now that we have got it going, I agree with the hon. Gentleman that we want to continue it. It is not a crisis, but merely a function of moving from one system to another, and of that new system being a necessary way to bring the industry to the next stage. The industry must be deeply involved in Food from Britain if it is to succeed. That is what I am concerned about.

I do not wish to use the word "crisis", first, because it is not true even if other people outside may have used that word, and, secondly, because such talk is depressing for an industry which does not need to feel depressed. Many people have shown considerable support for the organisation. The Government will continue to make it clear that it is our view that Food from Britain should go from strength to strength. We want it to increase its ability to serve the farming and horticultural community. Therefore, we will go on saying to those in the position of making decisions that they ought to support Food from Britain. We shall not force them to do so. That does not work unless they can recognise the importance of it and provide a good proportion of the funding, with a generous return from the Government.

I welcome the support of the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) for Food from Britain and his desire for it to succeed. It is true to say that we are late in the business of selling British agricultural products. We have a remarkable range, which is increasingly finding its place in the markets of the world, and we are selling better at home against imported goods. This is because we are beginning to understand much more that food has to be presented and sold with the same expertise as anything else. I wish to see that continue, and I am glad to note that we have all-party support for it.

My response to the first comment made by the hon. Member for East Lothian is that I am concerned about the constant requests that he makes about the need for guidance. Of course the Government must give guidance on what the agriculture industry should do. The aim should be to find opportunities and to encourage people to take up those opportunities.

The purpose of the statutory instrument is to ensure that there is an opportunity to provide grants for goods and services, to the benefit of the industry. The one thing that the Government must not be led into doing, and must not be pressed to do, is to produce some kind of blueprint that suggests to people what they ought to grow and what they ought not to grow. First, if the Government did this and everybody followed what they said, one would be in surplus very rapidly. Secondly, it suggests that the Government are better at doing the farming than is the farmer himself. That I deny, and I think it to be quite wrong. We must not try to recreate the kind of security which, inevitably, is associated with shortage in a world which, by its very nature, cannot have that security in future. We must, however, ensure that where security can be provided, it is provided.

The purpose of the statutory instrument and the extension of the period is precisely to give some security where we can guarantee it, but not to give the false security provided by the White Paper "Food From Our Own Resources". That suggested that we ought to do things when, almost as soon as that document was printed, we learnt we should not have done at all.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Agricultural and Horticultural Co-operation Grants (Extension of Period) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 23rd April, be approved.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 79(5) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.)

VALUE ADDED TAX

That the Value Added Tax (Land) Order 1986 (S.I., 1986, No. 704), dated 15th April 1986, a copy of which was laid before this House on 16th April, be approved.

That the Value Added Tax (Land) (No. 2) Order 1986 (S.I., 1986, No. 716), dated 17th April 1986, a copy of which was laid before this House on 18th April, be approved. — [Mr. Neubert.]

Question agreed to.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS (JOINT COMMITTEE)

Ordered,

That Mr. Stuart Randall be discharged from the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments and Mr. William Cash and Mr. Nick Raynsford be added to the Committee. — [Mr. Neubert.]

Overseas Civil Service (War Service Credits)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Neubert.]

9.23 pm

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): I declare a pecuniary interest in the subject that I bring to the attention of the House. If the Government respond favourably to the debate I, as a retired member of the overseas civil service with wartime service in the Royal Air Force, will be a beneficiary.

I hope that my hon. Friends the Members for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton) and for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) will be successful in intervening before the Minister replies to the debate. I am authorised by my hon. Friends the Members for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone) and for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) to say that they are unable to be here but support what I am about to say.

The Colonial Service, now called Her Majesty's Overseas Civil Service, together with the Indian Civil Service and the Sudan Civil Service, was responsible for the government of the British empire. Although recruited by the United Kingdom Government in London, its members were employed and paid by the Governments of the colonies to which they were assigned. They served the British Crown and British interests abroad in many different capacities, as administrators, accountants, engineers, policemen, educationists and in other professions. They worked under all sorts of adverse conditions of climate and health, often with primitive accommodation and usually without even the normal amenities of civilisation. The consequence was usually shorter careers, early retirement and shorter lives. They endured those conditions because, to be a member of the Colonial Service, with its personal challenges, dangers and adventures was worthwhile and a reward in itself. They were the instrument of Britain's contribution to the welfare of its overseas territories and they were proud that under them the standards of government, law and order and justice were raised to levels never known before, and in some cases since, in the countries concerned.

Although almost all its members were graduates and professional men and women, specially selected for their jobs, the Colonial Service was always the most neglected of the British public services. Its pay and pensions were comparatively low, being fixed according to the relative poverty of the colonies providing them and often influenced by hostile local politicians.

That does not matter so much now, when most of them are retired, but what does rankle with those who were first appointed to their colonies after serving in the second world war is the British Government's refusal to include in their pension computation an element on account of their war service. All the other public services in Britain —the Home Civil Service, the Diplomatic Service, the Armed Forces, the police, and even the teachers—have their war service taken into account when their pensions are calculated and paid. Only the Colonial Service—the Overseas Civil Service—does not. Members of the other public services who were appointed after service in the war get credits for that war service in their pensions on the simple ground that they should not suffer in their pensions compared with colleagues who did not serve in the war.

The reason for that distinction—it might almost be called discrimination — is simple. Members of the Overseas Civil Service were, technically speaking, employed by colonial Governments and no colonial Government was obliged, nor was any Government after independence expected, to pay the pensions of their expatriates beyond that appropriate to their actual service in the colony. Her Majesty's Government alone had the power and responsibility to pay the comparatively small sum involved but have always refused to do so, although the claim has been considered at the highest level. What my right hon. Friend the Minister of State now tells complainants is:

> "As you know this matter went forward to the 1983 Public Expenditure Survey where it received very careful consideration. I am afraid we were forced to conclude that it would not be possible to accommodate such a large and continuing commitment among the numerous claims on available resources. I am sure you will appreciate the overriding need to contain public expenditure: this is an example of the hard choices the government has to make. Given the continuing need to contain public expenditure it would not be right for me to hold out any hope that the position will ease, and that I might be able to reopen the issue in the foreseeable future."

I quote from a letter recently sent by my right hon. Friend.

The cost of what my right hon. Friend called "this large and continuing commitment" has been estimated by my right hon. Friend's Department at £3 million a year, and the number of people eligible at 4,600. These are probably over-estimates. In any case, the money could easily be found in savings elsewhere. A sum of £3 million, for example, is less than that now being wasted on the net cost of issuing dog licences. It is less than the cost of many unimportant items in the Government's research programme. No account is taken of the clawback in income tax. The number of people involved is declining every year with the deaths of the people concerned, most of whom are elderly. On the other hand, the small sum involved in each case could make a significant difference to the comfort of men and women in their declining years who served their country exceptionally well.

Mrs. Ann Winterton (Congleton): I am glad to have the opportunity to say a few words to support my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook), who has raised this subject on the Adjournment debate.

This anomaly was first brought to my attention by a constituent who is a member of the Overseas Service Pensioners' Association. Since that time I have been extremely interested in the matter. I cannot agree with the Government's technical excuses for not treating these pensioners in a similar way to other public servants with regard to war credits. The Government have a moral duty which they should accept with good grace.

Relatively speaking, the amounts of money involved are extremely small but they would make a great deal of difference to the pensioners concerned. If the sums were granted to the pensioners, they would feel they had been treated in an equitable way in comparison with the other public servants. I agree with the cogent arguments presented by my hon. Friend and I urge my right hon. Friend the Minister to reconsider the matter.

9.33 pm

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): Some of our most distinguished citizens will share my gratitude to my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) for raising this question on the Adjournment.

The unwillingness of successive Governments to recognise, for pensionable purposes, the war service of colonial civil servants is a regrettable, deplorable, failure. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister will acknowledge that the time has come for the Government to accept that they must shoulder these undoubtedly strong moral obligations.

The colonial civil servants were recruited by the Government and were servants of the Crown. They have as much right to recognition as other servants of the Crown —home civil servants, officers of local government or teachers. They bore the burden and the heat of the day, and they served often in the most arduous of conditions. They made considerable personal sacrifices, born out of dedication and devotion. Their services are overdue for recognition.

We should also acknowledge that the end of the empire in the 1950s and 1960s meant for some, termination of their career and considerable difficulties in finding new employment and further pension opportunities. That strengthens the moral argument in favour of our case, and I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister will be able to respond to it.

There has certainly been discrimination. There is no conceivable reason why the Government should draw a distinction between colonial civil servants and others. On a technical level, it is arguable that they were not employees of the United Kingdom Government, but, as I have said, they were recruited by the Colonial Office and were servants of the Crown. That factor should be regarded as paramount by the Government.

My right hon. Friend the Minister is altogether too honest and benevolent a man to ignore such considerations. I hope that he agrees that the sum involved in putting right that wrong amounts to about £3 million and that, in all the circumstances of today, the Government should be willing to find it.

9.35 pm

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Timothy Raison): The House has listened carefully to the arguments put so clearly and directly by my hon. Friends the Members for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook), for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton), and for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth). Obviously, this topic is not discussed very often in the House. However, expenditure on Colonial Service pensions accounts for about £140 million this year. Incidentally, that is about one tenth of my Department's total expenditure, and the administration of those pensions to some 46,000 people is a major task of the Department.

I and my officials devote considerable time and effort to dealing with the questions raised on behalf of overseas pensioners by my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington, by other hon. Members and by the Overseas Service Pensioners Association; and rightly so. Of course, I endorse the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington about the quality of the work carried out by our Colonial Service. Its reputation will not be forgotten, but it was nevertheless good to be reminded of it again tonight. We are rightly proud of it.

There is no disagreement on the basic point that the people involved have rendered great service to the United Kingdom, and, in particular, to the colonial territories in which they were employed. In my job there are inevitably many pressures on me to find new sums of money. That applies to overseas pensioners as well as to the general demands in connection with the aid programme. I receive a steady stream of letters, asking for more money for one thing or another. I am talking about not just the wide range of Overseas Development Administration activities but pensions too.

Over the years, the Overseas Service Pensioners Association has been active in proposing either that the field of people who benefit under the arrangements should be widened or, alternatively, that the benefits should be improved. War service credit for post-war entrants to the Colonial Service is an example of the second kind. We have always tried to give it very careful consideration. The argument that my hon. Friends have put tonight was put with equal vigour to my predecessor, the late Sir Neil Marten, and myself. I fully understand the substance of the case—that, since the concession had been extended to the main British public service groups in the 1970s to bring them into line with the Home Civil Service, it should in fairness be granted to overseas pensioners as well. It has also been argued that the cost of doing this for overseas pensioners—the figure of more than £3 million a year has been quoted previously and again tonight — is insignificant. But that cost could run for many years.

It is worth remembering that there are two types of war service credit. The first applies to officers who were in pensionable public service employment immediately before military service in the second world war, and whose careers were interrupted by the time that they spent in the armed forces. The war service of that group of officers counts in full towards their public service pensions. Colonial and United Kingdom public servants enjoy equal rights in that regard.

The second type of war service credit applies to officers who entered public service immediately after demobilisation. United Kingdom officers are allowed to count half of their military service for pension purposes. This puts them on a par with civil servants who were taken on during the war years on an unestablished basis.

The war service concession for post-war entrants was granted to United Kingdom civil servants in 1946, and to the main United Kingdom public sector groups, such as police, firemen, prison officers, teachers, Health Service workers and local government staff, in the 1970s. These arrangements, however, do not extend to colonial public servants, whose pensionable service was reckoned only from the date of their appointment to the Colonial Service.

It is difficult at this time to establish precisely why war service credit was not extended to the Colonial Service immediately after the second world war. Such evidence as there is suggests that wartime conditions of service in the Home Civil Service and Colonial Service were judged not to be on a par, so there was no automatic justification for treating officers in the same way.

In the case of the Home Civil Service, the original concession in 1946 was introduced to remove an anomaly which would otherwise have arisen between war-time entrants and post-war entrants to the Home Civil Service. The Superannuation Act 1935 provided that the unestablished service of staff who subsequently became established without a break in service should reckon at one half its length for superannuation purposes. Recruitment to the Home Civil Service during the war was on an unestablished basis. Those who stayed on after the war would have been at an advantage, therefore, compared with those whose entry to the Civil Service was delayed by their war service. The 1946 Act simply provided that ex-service men and women should be treated no less generously in this respect than those who had entered the Civil Service during the war.

As I understand it, the same anomaly did not arise in the Colonial Service or, at any rate, did not arise in anything like the same degree. The terms of recruitment to the Colonial Service during the war varied from territory to territory and according to the particular discipline. Recruitment during the war years was also on a very much smaller scale — about 200 appointments a year, compared with 1,200 to 1,500 a year after the war.

This serves to underline the point that colonial pension scheme regulations did not, and should not, automatically mirror those of the United Kingdom public service. The provisions differed in several respects, often to the advantage of the overseas pensioner. For example, overseas pensioners have a retirement age of 55 rather than 60 and their pensions are inflation-proofed from that age. Unlike home civil servants, they can choose, within limits, how much of their pension may be commuted. They had the right to retire at independence on compensation terms which were by no means ungenerous. Many officers were able to pursue successful second careers having retired from overseas service. My hon. Friend the Member for Orpington is an example. It is difficult to arrive at a comparison of the relative worth of benefits from different superannuation arrangements, but I think that it would be generally accepted that the provisions for former Colonial Service officers, taken as a whole, are a fair recompense for past service. In some respects, the terms for the two categories differed. In certain respects, the colonial servants received favourable treatment.

It was against this general background that in 1983 we looked into the question of war service credit for post-war entrants to the Colonial Service. The conclusion then, among many hard and difficult choices, was that the resources could not be found. That remains the position. The Government are committed to the firm control of public expenditure. It is an unavoidable consequence of our policy that many claims, many of them worthy in themselves, for extra resources of one kind or another cannot be accommodated.

It has been argued that the cost involved is minimal. I cannot accept that. Although the figure of £3 million has been cited in the debate, and was cited by us in 1983, my Department has carried out more recent work, based on a random sample of pensioners' records, which has shown that the costs could be significantly higher—perhaps £5 million to £6 million a year. Those are sample figures. I am not claiming that they are exactly right, but they indicate a higher figure than that cited by my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington. It must be accepted that sums of this order raise public expenditure implications for the programmes for which I am responsible. Additional resources would have to be found if war service credit were to be granted to Colonial Service pensioners.

There is strong feeling on this issue. My hon. Friends have put the case tonight and, over the years, I have received quite a lot of correspondence on it. I hope that my hon. Friends will recognise our concern to strike the appropriate balance between the need to control public expenditure and demands on my Department and the claims of overseas pensioners for enhanced benefits. I believe, as I have tried to show, that, on the whole, overseas pensioners are by no means ill-served by the arrangements which successive Governments have put in place over the years and by the scale of the provisions now made for them. I am afraid that I have to say that, although my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington has argued his case cogently and I accept that there is strong feeling on this matter, I am not able to give my hon. Friend the assurance for which he has asked.

Afghanistan

9.45 pm

Viscount Cranborne (Dorset, South): I thank my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development for his willingness to answer an Adjournment debate twice in one evening. That goes way beyond the call of duty. I am grateful to him for the good humour he has shown in contemplating such a prospect.

I should like to raise the subject of aid to alleviate the severe difficulties experienced in Afghanistan by the population that remains in that unfortunate country. My right hon. Friend has rightly many times drawn the attention of the House to the Government's generous help to refugees in Pakistan. At least 3 million of those unfortunate people have been driven from their homes by a cruel conflict in their native country. My right hon. Friend's Department is giving direct about £4·8 million to the refugees. About £1 million is being given via the EEC for the same purpose. Of course, I welcome that.

Those of us who have visited the refugee camps know that, by and large, the money is extremely well spent. It is recognised that, although the refugees in Pakistan are treated well and are relatively well off by refugee standards, the real need is inside Afghanistan. On 13 March this year, I was delighted to note the unanimity in the House when my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan) raised this matter in an Adjournment debate. My right hon. Friend the Minister need look no further than to the comments of the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) who replied to the debate on behalf of the Opposition. The hon. Gentleman stated.

"I look forward to hearing how the Minister responds, particularly to the request for appropriate mechanisms for channelling aid to those who suffer within the country. I agree with what the hon. Member for Dorset, South said about the need for a Government response on this. He would be the first to recognise that in the peculiar circumstances of Afghanistan, probably that response will have to be through non-governmental organisations such as his, because of the flexibility that they can bring. I congratulate that voluntary organisation on the work it has already done, and I trust that the Minister will respond positively to what has been said." — [Official Report, 13 March, 1986; Vol. 93, c. 1213.]

I hope that my right hon. Friend will take note of the unanimity of view expressed in that debate.

The services were always poor in Afghanistan, even before this latest conflict. It is quite clear that a central administration which was poor and which could not provide any sort of development aid before 1979 is wholly incapable of doing that now, when most of the country is in the hands of people opposed to the Kabul regime. It is important for us to recognise the very large number of people indeed who have been displaced. Not only have they taken refuge outside the country — 3 million in Pakistan and perhaps another 1·5 million in Iran — but very large numbers have also been driven from their homes to become internal refugees. There is, therefore, a crying need for emergency aid of a humanitarian kind, particularly food and medical services.

My right hon. Friend will know that the organisation to which the hon. Member for Swansea, East referred during the course of that last debate is one of which I have the honour to be chairman, a registered charity called Afghanaid. I think that my right hon. Friend will agree that it has begun to establish a record for being able to administer, in particular, food programmes inside the country on a fairly substantial scale. Not only can we propose the programmes but we can carry them out and, equally important, we can monitor the results. All those who have been donors to our food programme have admitted that the monitoring which has been carried out under what are necessarily extraordinarily difficult circumstances has been very satisfactory. I would be interested if my right hon. Friend could say something about that in his reply.

Apart from emergency aid, we ought also to consider development aid. Afghanistan was always a very poor country. Once the immediate emergency is under control —and much needs to be done—we should consider the question of development aid, which must include education and agricultural research and development. For all these projects, it is also essential that, if we are to carry them out, they should be based on professional and sensible research. It is impossible to determine the needs unless professional people are sent into the country to interview refugees and to decide what is needed and where.

If my right hon. Friend could look favourably on projects of this kind, he should stipulate that the proposals be based on the kind of research which is now becoming possible, thanks to the co-ordination of the various voluntary agencies which have become so active inside Afghanistan. In that context I would like to mention a federation of voluntary agencies interested in sending help into Afghanistan for the displaced persons there.

We have heard many rumours of late to the effect that the Soviets would like to withdraw from Afghanistan, rumours that I take with a pinch of salt. However, and my right hon. Friend must forgive me for being biased, if such a splendid thing should occur, we would have to consider how we should consult the refugees and indeed the whole Afghan population on their needs. We must also decide what mechanisms there should be for distributing aid if the Soviets withdraw, and perhaps if such an eventuality should occur, we should examine such possibilities as well.

I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for listening to this short debate, and I hope that he will be able to give some sort of reassurance to the people who deserve our help and who, for political reasons, have not been able to receive the help that their fellow citizens outside the country have.

9.55 pm

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Timothy Raison): My hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, South (Viscount Cranborne) has a deep commitment to the cause of the people of Afghanistan who have suffered so terribly under the recent onslaught on them. He has spoken, as he has before, with considerable eloquence about the problems. The British Government regard the situation in Afghanistan seriously. The disruption and devastation caused by the Soviet occupation forces are a matter of the greatest concern.

Perhaps it may help the House if I touch briefly on what we see to be some of the aims of Soviet policy. The occupying troops and the regime forces are waging a callous and ruthless war against the resistance with all the weapons at their disposal. They seek out and ambush convoys, try to locate and destroy bases and do all that they can to crush the courageous opposition. We firmly support the courageous struggle of the Afghan people.

[Mr. Timothy Raison]

The Soviets are only too aware of the almost total rejection of the regime and its Soviet backers and of the resulting support given by the population to the Mujahadin with transport, communications or supplies. They have therefore followed a deliberate policy of displacing the rural population, either to neighbouring countries or into Afghan cities, making it easier to control the people and to isolate and identify the resistance. They do this through reprisals for Mujahadin attacks, destroying whole villages and massacring the inhabitants and by destroying rural infrastructure. Fields are laid waste, irrigation channels bombed and the lands mined. I do not propose to rehearse again the points covered by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary in the House on 13 March, but any hon. Member wishing to discover more details may consult the report produced for the United Nations Secretary-General by Mr. Ermacora which is in the Library, and which presents a devasting picture of the cruel events happening in Afghanistan.

There has never been the closest Government control in large areas of Afghanistan, but the Soviet and regime policy has resulted in the displacement within Afghanistan of some 1 million people deprived of their usual support for food, health care and education. The Government recognise that it is important that we should do all that we can to help them to maintain the best possible existence in their own country, to prevent them fleeing to add to the statistics of helpless refugees in neighbouring states. There they would become more wretched, a burden on the international community and on even the most generous of host countries, and their flight would contribute further to the breakdown of the traditional cultural and structure of society in Afghanistan.

Soviet troop withdrawal and the restoration of the rights of the Afghan people remain the key to the problem. Any settlement must take into account the position of the resistance and the refugees, or it will never stick. We strongly support the United Nations Secretary-General's efforts to secure a political settlement on the basis of successive United Nations resolutions. Mr. Gorbachev has talked of early withdrawal, but the aggressive pursuit of the war and the Sovietisation of Afghanistan belie these statements. We appeal to the Soviet Union to translate these words into reality.

As the House knows, we have already supported various operations by the Afghan Support Committee and Afghanaid. We financed the 1984 report by Dr. D'Souza to which my hon. Friend referred, on the threat of famine and have subsequently provided £50,000 to Afghanaid to relieve famine in Afghanistan. I pay tribute to the skill and dedication of those in Afghanaid who conducted this difficult operation.

My hon. Friend talked about the future. He must recognise the great difficulty that can occur in giving direct assistance to those displaced persons in Afghanistan. We must be realistic, and I cannot at the moment give blanket assurances about the next stage. I will examine carefully proposals put to me by Afghanaid or by similar organisations. Our policy is to give assistance to destitute Afghan refugees and displaced persons wherever they might be, those who have been forced to leave their homes because of the fighting in Afghanistan.

As I said, it is difficult to give aid in a country that is dominated by a far from friendly power——

It being Ten o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Donald Thompson.]

Mr. Raison: My hon. Friend talked about two aspects of the matter—the immediate relief operation and the need for longer-term development. As far as the needs of the relief operations are concerned, as he knows, we are studying carefully the reports of what has happened. We have monitored the accounts put forward to show how the £50,000 that we gave to Afghanaid, has been spent. I understand that the accounts were presented in Pushtu, but we have managed to translate them. It seems that the money has been spent in the ways that it was intended to be used. We will, however, think carefully about how we will respond next.

My hon. Friend will recognise that the long-term developments are particularly difficult. The normal conditions for long-term development aid are that it is on a Government to Government basis. It requires detailed and careful planning and it is normally a response to something put forward by the Government of the country involved.

None of these conditions apply to Afghanistan. There is some difference of dimension between supplying short-term relief supplies and in trying to become involved in the longer-term development processes. I cannot say at present that I will undertake to embark on long-term development programmes. If proposals are put to us we will consider them carefully. The real hope for long-term development must be a return to normality and to freedom in Afghanistan.

We strongly advise the stand of the Afghan refugees and of their neighbours in Pakistan. The plight of the 3 million refugees and the difficult position of Pakistan was brought home to my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs during his recent visit. During his visit he announced a £4·8 million bilateral aid programme for Afghan refugees which marks an increase of 17 per cent. over last year. That demonstrates that we have not forgotten these people. That sum represents a significant increase in aid and a significant step on the Government's part to show that we realise that the problem is not one that can simply be tucked away and that we must continue to bear it in mind.

We also provide food through the European Community. Seven million pounds worth of food aid will be delivered in 1986 of which our share is £1·4 million. Since the Soviet invasion, we have given more than £32 million to these people. That money has been donated mostly through the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and also through organisations such as the Red Cross and various British charities.

We are also developing a new scheme for training refugees. We have already given substantial assistance to the Allama Iqbal Open University in Pakistan, particularly in the vocational and mass education field. We are planning—by translating the material into Pushtu—to extend the work of the University into the refugee camps. That will have the advantage that the facilities will be available to the refugees without displacing Pakistanis as would be the case with conventional educational institutions. In addition, as the House will know, we are now providing medical treatment for Afghans who have been wounded in the fighting.

I visited Pakistan two years ago. I went to Peshawar where I met some of the refugees from Afghanistan who told me of their troubles and I visited the hospital where they were being treated for their wounds. Anyone who visits that place will recognise the extent of the cruel struggle that is taking place in that area. Therefore, it is right that we should be talking about this again in the House this evening. I would only say that I respect what my hon. Friend has to say about these matters. I shall always listen carefully to him and consider carefully what we can do. The Government's record in helping the refugees has been a creditable one, but, given the nature of their plight, that is no more than should be the case and that is something that we must not forget.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at five minutes past Ten o'clock.

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Orders of the Day

Children and Young Persons (Amendment) Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

New Clause 1

WARDSHIP

'(1) At any time after the commencement of any proceedings to which this section applies a Juvenile Court may transfer such proceedings to the High Court in wardship on the grounds that:—

(a) it is in the interests of the welfare of the child; or

(b) it is in the interest of justice; or

(c) it would be appropriate for the case to be dealt with under the wider powers of the High Court in wardship.

(2) This section applies to:—

(a) any proceedings under the Children and Young Persons Act 1969; or

(b) any proceedings under the Child Care Act 1980; or

(c) any proceedings under section 1 of this Act.

(3) The power under subsection (1) may be exercised before or at any stage during the hearing and upon the application of any party or the court's own motion.'.—[Ms. Harman.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

9.34 am

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 25, in page 5, line 3, leave out clause 5.

No. 26, in clause 5, page 5, line 5, leave out from 'Court' to end of line 15 and insert

'on the grounds that proceedings in relation to the same child are already continuing in the High Court

(2) This section applies to—

(a) any of the proceedings mentioned in paragraph (a) to (e) of section 4(1) above;

(b) any proceedings under section 1 of this Act.'.

No. 28, in clause 5, page 5, line 23, leave out

'and who may re-transfer the proceedings to the Juvenile Court'.

Ms. Harman: Most of these amendments should have been dealt with in Committee. To get the Bill on the statute book, which we obviously want to do, we shall have to rush through these quite substantial amendments which come before us for the first time. Because of the Government's handling of the Bill, the Committee stage was wasted. In all courtesy to the hon. Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters), who introduced the Bill, the Government should have got their act together and revealed their hand earlier. If the Government had undertaken meaningful discussions with the hon. Member for Westbury, who has been entirely reasonable about the Bill from the outset, we could have had a lengthy and extremely useful Committee stage. Because the Government had not decided what they wanted to do, the Committee stage lasted less than half a day. So we are more or less having the Committee stage now.

The purpose of new clause 1, which deals with wardship, and the grouped amendments is to knock out clause 5 and insert a clause that would give any party to proceedings the right to apply to have a case heard in wardship. It is necessary to avoid the introduction of a further anomaly into child care legislation, arising with the right to transfer proceedings to the High Court. Currrently, many cases concerning children in care are dealt with in the High Court under the High Court's wardship jurisdiction. There are a number of reasons for that. The principal reason is the flexibility and wider powers that the court has in wardship. The most important point which the court has to consider is the best interests of the child, and in that respect it can make wide-ranging orders.

Clause 5 as it stands proposes that cases may be transferred to the High Court, but it does not specify that that should be done within the wardship jurisdiction. As the amended Bill stands, there is no indication how such cases should be dealt with. Therefore, the court will have no greater powers than a juvenile court. It is difficult to see why a case should go through the delaying process of transfer to the High Court if the court cannot exercise its wider jurisdiction and flexibility which makes wardship a useful proceeding.

Because of the decisions of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, from 1981 onwards, children and their relatives and friends have found it impossible to use the wardship jurisdiction where a child is in care unless the local authority concerned agrees. My proposed new clause would remedy the injustice faced by children, their families and other interested persons. If clause 5 were deleted and new clause 1 inserted, the power of transfer to the High Court—obviously it would be used only rarely—would be a useful addition.

We are talking about an important part of a very much wider mechanism in the spectrum of jurisdiction in child care law. The Government have handled the issue badly. It is wrong that we have to put all the measures in one clause dealing with one part of the whole spectrum of child care law. We should be considering all parts at the same time. We should be looking at all the jurisdictions of all the different courts with a view to instituting a family court with wide jurisdiction which takes over the duties of all the other courts that now exercise jurisdiction over family and matrimonial matters.

I hope that the new clause will bring about an improvement. I am disappointed that we have had to deal with it in such an unsatisfactory and piecemeal way. The blame lies at the Government's door. It is not too late for the Government to make a commitment to comprehensive legislation on child care. The child care law review imposed strict consultation timetables. Many organisations felt that the time limits were too short and had to abandon their other valuable work to prepare their comments to assist the Government. They were happy to do so because they felt that swift action would result. They are bitterly disappointed that there still appears to be no commitment that child care law will be completely and comprehensively redrawn, let alone any commitment on the time for action on a family court.

Mr. Dennis Walters (Westbury): Like the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman), I very much hope that the Government will make a commitment to introduce comprehensive legislation in the next Session—or if not then, as soon as practicable. I fully sympathise with the aims of the new clause. It is precisely the type of proposal that I should have liked to be contained in clause 5 of my original Bill. However, I recognised that its provisions represented a considerable change which was unlikely to be accepted by the Government at that time. My clause 5 was not nearly as far-reaching as new clause 1, but it was made abundantly clear to me that the Government were not in a position to accept it. I therefore agreed with the Minister that clause 5 should be dropped. Although I applaud the new clause, I realise that it has little chance of success.

Mr. Ian Mikardo (Bow and Poplar): This group of amendments includes amendment No. 25, which proposes to leave out clause 5. My hon. Friend the Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) and I tabled that amendment, not knowing that our hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) and the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security—the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney)—intended, independently, to table the same amendment at the same time. The House will recognise that this amendment is a ship with a pretty formidable if somewhat variegated crew.

The Under-Secretary of State has tabled also two new clauses and no fewer than 14 amendments. I am bound to say a word of support about the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham. That is no way for the Government to treat a private Member's Bill. The Government are virtually hijacking the Bill, taking it out of the hands of the hon. Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters), and turning it into a Government Bill. That is grossly unfair to the hon. Gentleman. He was excited about winning, I think for the first time, a high place in the ballot. He was rightly congratulated. The hon. Gentleman obviously put a lot of thought and work into the legislation. But it has now, for all practical purposes, been snatched from his hands.

9.45 am

If the Government really wanted a Government Bill on child care, they should have introduced such a Bill, preferably one that fulfilled the promises that have been made for a long time. We see no signs that there will be a comprehensive Bill to clear up all the judicial problems and provide for family courts. We all know that, in the long run, family courts are the only sensible permanent solution. Over the years, the Government have been constantly ducking and putting off implementing that solution. I do not blame the Under-Secretary of State, because many of his predecessors did nothing. I feel for the hon. Member for Westbury. I believe that his feelings about his colleague the Under-Secretary of State are not all that friendly, because this takeover of his Bill is an act of daylight robbery.

I am always anxious, in dealing with the complex and often delicate and sensitive cases covered by the legislation, that in the interests of the child—it is the child about whom we care most—a decision should be made at the moment it is needed. All too often, that is a moment when the decision is urgently needed.

That point was put forcibly on Second Reading by the hon. Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley). I hope that she will not mind my saying that she put the House and the Committee in her debt by bringing her many years of practical and professional experience to bear on our deliberations. She said:

"in child care cases, of all cases, a speedy decision is vital." —[Official Report, 31 January 1986; Vol. 90, c. 1212.]

I am sure that no hon. Member would dissent from that judgment which was strongly reinforced by some authoritative bodies whose views were quoted in Committee by my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham. She quoted from a document from the Law Society, which stated:

"The Bill's provisions will almost inevitably lead to additional delay in decisions being taken about the future of children in local authority care, with consequent distress for both the children and families involved."

My hon. Friend added:

"That is also the view of the Association of Metropolitan Authorities and of the Legal Action Group." — [Official Report, Standing Committee C, 17 March 1986; c. 8.]

Clause 5 and certain other clauses shunt a decision about a child care case—often an urgent decision—into the High Court. I am not a lawyer, but I know enough about the law to be able to say that it often takes a long time to get a case into the High Court. Once the case has got there, it often takes a long time to get it out again—that is to say, to get a finding.

The Minister expressed some anxiety about that in Standing Committee. In columns 18 and 19 of the report he said:

"I have some experience of the courts and can tell my hon. Friends that it often takes much longer to go to the High Court than to go back to a magistrates court for appropriate consideration to be given to a problem."—[Official Report, Standing Committee C, 19 March 1986; c. 18-19.]

There is also the matter of the cost of actions in the High Court. Who will pay for High Court hearings which are often long and always expensive? There is no provision in the Bill as drafted for legal aid. There is no point in legislating for parents or for anyone else to have statutory rights that they cannot afford to exercise. That merely creates frustration. I know I must not anticipate the debate on new clause 2—you would be angry with me, Mr. Speaker, if I tried to do that—and I must not anticipate the conclusion the House may come to on that clause. Perhaps I could say in half a sentence that even if it is carried, it provides legal aid only in the juvenile court, which is not very costly, but not in the High Court, which can cost an arm and a leg. For those reasons I attach great importance to amendment No. 25 and I hope the House will support it.

Ms. Jo Richardson (Barking): In response to my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman), the hon. Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters) said that he had some sympathy with what she said. I did not take part in the Second Reading debate and I was not on the Committee, but the thought that immediately came to my mind was: in that case, why did he not support her? The hon. Gentleman immediately supplied the answer, when he said that he thought my hon. Friend's new clause was too far-reaching, that his was a more modest approach, and that the new clause to replace clause 5 was a considerable change. It is time that we thought about having such a change, so that we get the proper restructuring. That is the purpose of my hon. Friend's new clause. Clause 5 seeks to provide that care proceedings can be transferred to the High Court in certain circumstances. We all know that, but it does not provide any additional powers to deal with them, as the High Court would do in wardship.

Until we get a comprehensive restructuring of the court system that creates a unified family court able to allocate cases to the requisite level of the judiciary, according to the complexity and sensitivity of the case, this provision would create additional difficulties, delay and confusion, and, far from satisfying the intention of the sponsor of the Bill—to move forward a little more slowly—the Bill might make things much more complicated than they were before. I have read the Second Reading debate and the report of the Committee stage. Various references are made to family courts and to the Finer report. I came to the House in 1974 and my early years here seemed to be studded with references and campaigns about Finer because that report came out in the first few years of the Labour Government. It caused a great deal of discussion and its findings were a challenge to the concept of courts dealing with matrimonial problems.

Clause 5 attempts to fit judicial court cases into High Court procedures, but it does not provide the advantage of High Court's additonal powers of wardship. It is not clear, if the case were referred to the High Court, whether High Court procedures like the service of affidavits, directions, hearings, discovery and so on, would be followed. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman could clarify that, because I could not find any clarification in the Standing Committee report. It is something that we ought to know about. It is not clear on what grounds a court could decide that a case is of unusual difficulty or late, or whether the High Court could refuse to hear a case that it did not consider to be of unusual difficulty. That means there could be considerable delay and uncertainly for the child. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) has said, we are all discussing the Bill with the child in mind.

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridgeshire, North-East): Would the hon. Lady accept that, as a result of the inevitable delays that occur when a case goes to High Court, the situation of the child could easily change? For that reason, the Opposition have urged the Government not to tinker with Bills like this which would include family court procedures.

Ms. Richardson: The hon. Gentleman has made a valid and cogent point. As I was saying, it is the child that we must bear in mind and any change in the procedures brought in by Parliament must be seen in that context. Any changes would have an effect on a lot of children and we must take that into account. Any party to a court hearing that wished to delay the proceedings could raise arguments in the High Court about the venue and the jurisdiction as well as about the nature of the evidence and the difficult points of law.

I have put down two amendments to clause 5 which for convenience have been linked to the new clause that we are discussing. They are an alternative to deleting clause 5, although I thoroughly support the aims of my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham and follow her along that way. Perhaps I can briefly explain the purpose of amendments 26 and 28 which I have tabled. Clause 26 proposes to "leave out from 'Court' to end of line 15 and insert 'on the grounds that proceedings in relation to the same child are already continuing in the High Court.

(2) This section applies to—

(a) any of the proceedings mentioned in paragraph (a) to (e) of section 4(1) above;

(b) any proceedings under section 1 of this Act.".

The amendment seeks to remove the ability to transfer care cases on the grounds that the case is of unusual difficulty or length or because a difficult question of law arises. I have had briefings from a number of different organisations, as I am sure other hon. Members will have had. It seems that people who are expert in these matters feel strongly that the powers to transfer cases on these grounds alone would create unnecessary delays in dealing with decisions affecting a child's future, although the clause provides no additional powers to the High Court to deal more effectively with them. Although people seem unconvinced that the clause as drafted would be of any benefit, I gather there would be less objection to the transfer of cases if this amendment, as an alternative and as a second bite at the cherry, were carried.

Amendment No. 28, in clause 5, page 5, line 23, delete the words:

"and who may re-transfer the proceedings to the Juvenile Court", is an alternative way of dealing with the matter, and improves the Bill. It appears to be unrealistic to allow a case to be retransferred in that way, as it would only add to the delay in reaching a decision on the child's future, in a way that appears to be simply for the convenience of the court. Again, we come back to the point about whose interests are to be the prime interests in the consideration of such cases. Obviously, it is the child's interests, not the court's.

Each transfer appears to offer no additional powers to deal with the case. Delay in juvenile proceedings was identified as a serious problem, as hon. Members know, by the Select Committee on Social Services in its second report in 1984. It said so categorically. It seems that the provisions of the Bill would serve to increase rather than reduce delays in care proceedings and to use the Committee's words, "the evils attendant on" such delays do not appear to have been recognised.

I hope that new clause 1 will be accepted, along with the deletion of clause 5. However, if that does not happen, I hope that consideration will be given to the two amendments to which I have referred, which would at least effect some improvement.

10 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): I should like to speak in support of amendment No. 25, which stands in my name and the names of some Opposition Members. As the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) said, that is an intriguing combination.

I have no wish to prolong unnecessarily the discussion on this part of the proceedings, or, indeed, the Bill as a whole. However, it is right that I should respond to some of the points that have been made, particularly by Opposition Members.

The hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) made the charge that the Government's position has been inconsistent throughout the handling of the Bill. That is totally unjustified. The Government's position has been made clear from Second Reading and throughout the Committee. In Committee, the hon. Lady and I shared the same view about the vital part of the Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters), which concerns the proceedings and role that the magistrates play. However, while she and I voted in a particular direction on the Bill, none of her colleagues was present in Committee. That is one of the reasons why we are now tabling amendments, which we would have wished to avoid in handling such a Bill.

We welcome the interest that the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar has taken in the proceedings. That is an innovation. He claimed that we have hijacked my hon. Friend's Bill in an unacceptable way, but I find that difficult to accept. It is true that my hon. Friend was forbearing enough—or perhaps farsighted enough—to accept a significant change in clauses 1 and 2 of the original Bill. That was because we had fundamental misgivings about his proposals. The implication of the remarks made by the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar was that he wished we had gone along with proposals that were resisted by so many people in the professions concerned in the handling of child cases.

Ms. Harman: Why did the Minister not bring forward his amendment to delete clause 5 in Committee? Then there could have been a proper discussion. Nothing has happened since the Committee to change the situation. If the Minister had proposed the amendment that he has now tabled, we could have had a proper discussion in Committee. That is why I am suggesting that his strategy has been so shameful.

Mr. Whitney: I see no difficulties about having a discussion now. It flows from other discussions with my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury.

I do not wish to delay the House any longer than necessary, but I need to make one other point, which seems to have escaped the hon. Member for Peckham, about the Government's intentions. As the House knows extremely well, at the end of last year we launched our consultative document on the review and reform of child care law — a truly massive exercise, as the House understands. Therefore, we feel some nervousness and have some misgivings about legislation such as this. However, we do not use the piecemeal argument, saying, "If it goes in the right direction, let us have it."

The House will be aware that yesterday, in response to a parliamentary question, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made it clear that the Government, having absorbed about 200 responses to the working party report on the review of child care law, will now draw up their own proposals for child care law and day care. The Government intend to publish them in the autumn as a basis for legislation. It will be introduced as soon as parliamentary time can be found.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Will my hon. Friend give an undertaking that such legislation will be forthcoming within the lifetime of this Parliament?

Mr. Whitney: That brings in several other issues on which I am not at liberty to comment now. However, I hope that the House will accept that it is a major step forward that the Government have given an undertaking to introduce that legislation. The rate of that response is, in no small measure, a reaction to the pressures generated by my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury and the importance of the discussions that he has prompted as a result of his Bill. The proposals for a major piece of legislation, absorbing those responses to the report, will be published in the autumn.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): What the Minister has just said about a family law review is welcome. Hand in hand with that goes the question of family courts, to which reference has been made. How long do we have to wait before we have the Government's proposals? We have had suggestions that they are coming for a year or more. Now we hear that they will come out in a week or two. Can we have any assurance that we will see those proposals?

Mr. Whitney: At this stage, I can say only that my hon. Friend's reference to a week or two is probably near the mark. I wish that I could say more than that at this stage, but I think that my hon. Friend is in the correct target area.

I hope that we can agree on the proposal to delete clause 5. The purpose of the clause is well understood by all hon. Members present. It introduced a novel procedure, because it would require proceedings to be transferred from what is essentially a criminal court exercising a summary procedure to a civil court with a formal and much more elaborate procedure. While it would be possible to resolve that procedural problem, a great deal would be required by way of rules to achieve that.

The serious disadvantage in what is proposed is that it would inevitably cause delay in dealing with child care cases beyond that which is now experienced, and which gives cause for concern. We are all worried about the delay to which the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) referred. Delay would be inevitable in most cases because, until the case was ready for hearing, or even part heard, the parties would not know whether the case was one of unusual difficulty or length, or would give rise to an unusual or difficult question of law. The court would be able to transfer a case on its own motion only where the matter was part heard. Only then would it be possessed of the necessary information.

When the decision had been made to transfer, it would be necessary for the magistrates court to give notice to the High Court, on receipt of which the proper officer of the High Court would give notice to the parties, and after the defendants had acknowledged service of that notice, an appointment for directions would have to be arranged.

Mr. Freud: The Minister has described the litany of procedure. What will be done to monitor the changing circumstances of the child? I expect that cases could change radically between the beginning and end of legal proceedings if the High Court was invoked, because there are many stages in the legal process. A child is not a static human being.

Mr. Whitney: I entirely accept that point. That is why we wish to delete the clause. That issue will be addressed when we introduce our child care law reforms. There will be difficulties in the transfer of such cases, and I hope that, in view of our consultations and the responses that we have received, which include an examination of delay and changing circumstances, when we produce our legislative proposals we can deal satisfactorily with the inevitable problems.

The transfer of cases to the High Court could increase demands upon High Court judges and would be an unjustified burden upon the legal aid fund, without any of the offsetting savings which we hope will be made in the package that should emerge from our child care law reforms.

Ms Harman: Should not the overriding criteria be the best interests of the child and the best judicial forum for assessing the interests of the child, not the requirements of the legal aid fund? Even if the Minister believes that clause 1 is unlikely to survive and, therefore, the transfer mentioned in clause 5 would not apply, would it not be useful to apply the transfer to the procedures set out in clause 4(1), paragraphs (a) to (f)?

Mr. Whitney: I wish that the hon. Lady would make her point only once. Of course, children are important, as is the reduction of child abuse cases to the fewest possible. I understand and, to a large extent, sympathise with the high-and-mighty attitude that money should be no object. However, having accepted that we are struggling to find a set of arrangements, be they legal or administrative, to reduce to the absolute minimum — to eliminate completely is not for this world—cases of child abuse, there is a duty on any Government to take account of resources. I hope that the hon. Lady, having played her card once, will rest on that trick.

Mr. Freud: It is absurd for the Minister to accuse the hon. Lady of repeating herself and doing so four times over. It is unhelpful to our proceedings.

Mr. Whitney: Perhaps I am practising for "Just a Minute"——

Mr. Freud: The Minister would be good at that.

Mr. Whitney: Yes, I think I might be better than some. I am happy to agree with the Opposition that clause 5 should be deleted from the Bill. I do not recommend the House to accept new clause 1, mostly on grounds of principle but partly on grounds of resources. The objectives that will be set out in our review of child care law will improve care proceedings in juvenile courts so that recourse to wardship is reduced, while acknowledging that it would be available in exceptional cases. Although I shall be accused of repetition, I must say that new clause 1 would add considerably to costs and to delays in court proceedings, which the House would abhor. I urge the House to accept amendment No. 25.

New Clause 2

APPEALS

'(1) In subsection (12) of section 2 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1969 (right of relevant infant to appeal against order made in care proceedings) after the words "the relevant infant" there shall be inserted the words "or, in a case where a parent or guardian of his was a party to the care proceedings by virtue of an order under section 32A of this Act, the parent or guardian" and for the word "him" there shall be substituted the words "the relevant infant".

(2) In section 16(8) of that Act (appeals by the supervised person against certain supervision orders and dismissal of application to discharge such orders) after the words "the supervised person" there shall be inserted the words "or, in a case where a parent or guardian of his was a party to the proceedings on an application under the preceding section by virtue of an order under section 32A of this Act, the parent or guardian".

(3) After subsection (4) of section 21 of that Act (variation and discharge of care orders) there shall be inserted—

"(4A) In a case where a parent or guardian is a party to the proceedings on an application under subsection (2) of this section by virtue of an order under section 32A of this Act, the parent or guardian may appeal to the Crown Court against the making of a supervision order or the refusal of the court to discharge the care order.".

(4) In section 22(4) of that Act (power of High Court, on application of person to whom interim order relates, to discharge order) after the word "relates" there shall be inserted the words ", or, in a case where the order was made in proceedings to which a parent or guardian was a party by virtue of an order under section 32A of this Act, of the parent or guardian,".'.—[Ms. Harman.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Ms. Harman: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): With this it will be convenient to take the following:

Government amendments Nos. 22 and 23.

Amendment No. 24, in clause 4, page 4, line 35, at end insert

'for a period of not less than three months ending not more than six weeks before the date of the application'.

Government amendment No. 29.

Ms. Harman: New clause 2 deals with legal aid, and is necessary to ensure that people who are made party to care proceedings are entitled to apply for legal aid. Clearly, without legal aid for parents or anyone else who may be made a party to the proceedings, the right to participate in those proceedings is absolutely hollow unless they can afford to provide legal representation. Obviously, many people cannot get legal representation unless they receive legal aid.

A good illustration of why people need legal aid in care proceedings and why they cannot appear in court in person is given in new clause 5, which the Minister has tabled. The first sentence is absolutely incoherent, and should be submitted for a prize for legal gobbledegook. There is no way that people can begin to understand discussions about what is, perhaps, the most important feature of their lives —what is happening to their children— without legal representation.

The Minister made some backhanded remarks about a comment I made on legal aid when we discussed new clause 1. We are not simply making "money-no-object" points—we are talking about people's ability to enforce the legal rights which the House has seen fit to put on the statute book. The Government are always talking about law and order, but the law is absolutely meaningless and not worth the paper it is written on unless people can have representation to enforce those rights and to participate in proceedings which will profoundly affect their future.

At present there is a great problem with legal aid. Some firms are going out of business because of the restrictions being exercised on the legal aid system. Other firms, although still in business, are reducing the amount of legal aid work they will do in favour of increasing the amount of privately paid work. Therefore, the availability of legal representation for people on the legal aid scheme is being reduced seriously, and with it all the rights people could have enforced, had they had that legal representation.

There is also a problem facing law centres, and at present their future is in doubt. They are a further way by which people can obtain legal representation to enforce their rights and to be party to proceedings which will affect their future. Without them, some people could not participate meaningfully in court proceedings.

We have rather got used to the idea that the law centre movement is part of the legal scene, and is here to stay. However, there are only a few law centres, and there is by no means the comprehensive spread that there should be. Moreover, their future is in doubt because of a whole range of funding problems. It is highly regrettable that the Government have not seen fit to say that they will secure their future and extend their provision to other parts of the country.

Consequently, the new clause is important. It is not a question of money being no object. We are talking about basic justice and basic legal rights. The Minister raised the point about money when we discussed new clause 1, but it is more relevant to this new clause. However, let us see what the Government are prepared to find money for. It has been estimated that the attempt to abolish capital transfer tax and to return to some sort of voluntary estate duty will mean a saving for just one man—the Duke of Westminster — of about £600 million in tax on his estate. As the Government have just facilitated that, it ill behoves them to talk about being thrifty in the case of legal aid, which merely enables people to enforce their legal and basic rights.

10.30 am

I am not happy with Government amendments Nos. 22 and 23. Amendment No. 23 restricts those who could be parties to the proceedings to the parent or guardian. The Bill recognises that more people have a legitimate interest in being parties to a case than just the parent or guardian. In the Jasmine Beckford case, the foster parents could well have been a party to the case and could have considerably assisted the magistrates. The magistrates might not then have made the disastrous comments that were so heavily criticised by Louis Blom-Cooper and his inquiry team. The amendment means that foster parents or anyone else with a legitimate interest or involvement with the child could not be a party.

The Bill makes a considerable improvement to child care law in recognising the contribution that parties other than the parent or guardian can made to the proceedings. Obviously, the court has discretion and flexibility about who should be involved, so that those who do not have a legitimate involvement cannot be parties. I believe that it can be safely left to the court to exercise its discretion, using guidance on the criteria that should be taken into account.

I am not entirely happy with amendment No. 24, which stands in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson). It narrows the opportunity for foster parents to become involved in proceedings and to be made party to them. They could be made party to the proceedings only if they had cared for the child for a period of three months, ending

"not more than six weeks before the date of the application."

I cannot quite remember the dates now, but in the Jasmine Beckford case I think that the foster parents had not been looking after the child six weeks before. Consequently, I think that the amendment is unduly restrictive. I understand that its aim is to be consistent with other child care law. Obviously, that is important as we have a tangled enough web as it is. Indeed, we need a comprehensive review of child care law. However, imposing an absolute limit might exclude some people who have a contribution to make. Therefore, I hope that new clause 2 will be accepted, but that amendments Nos. 22, 23 and 24 will be rejected.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I have considerable sympathy with the call for legal aid to be provided to parents faced with the problem of adoption proceedings for their children. All hon. Members will have had parents in their surgeries with similar problems. Members of Parliament and those who are not qualified in law find it difficult to give them helpful advice. Moreover, to my knowledge not as many lawyers are qualified in child care as in divorce law, commercial law, the law for fraud and so on. That is a counter-argument to that put forward by the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman).

Although I have general sympathy for the hon. Member for Peckham, I was unhappy about her approach when she said that the money could come from the changes made in the Budget. It was a little beneath her to talk of money coming from the estate of the Duke of Westminister. Although a flood of money has been released by the change in capital transfer tax, it was a one-off thing and does not support her argument.

The principle of legal aid for parents faced with adoption proceedings should stand or fall on its own. If the House feels that the principle is right, it should will the means. But I do not want to become involved in the rather cheap arguments that have been put forward. I have 23 years' experience of being a schoolmaster and seven years' experience as the head of a mixed school with more than 2,000 children. Parents who face adoption problems are often people with difficulties of their own. They are sometimes inadequate people, and they have a job to put a case together. That is not always true, but on the whole those people need to be able to talk their problems through with someone who is qualified and who is in a position to help them. I rather fancy that suitably qualified lawyers are the best people to do that.

Parents involved in adoption proceedings are in a sensitive and emotional state, and often understandably find it difficult to make an objective case for themselves. After all, it is essential to be objective in legal proceedings because ultimately the decision will have to be taken objectively in the interest of the child's welfare. If parents are struggling and fighting — some of them do when they are involved in these matters—they are often not in a position to be subjective. Parents have come to my surgery begging to be allowed to see their own children. I find that heart-breaking—I do not want to load the debate emotionally — and I feel that the House and individual Members have an obligation to lean over backwards to assist those who are in that difficult position.

I have found in my long experience that parents tend to lean on anyone who will listen and who may have some means of giving sensible and useful advice. These third parties may include schoolmasters, headmasters, social workers or vicars. A multitude of sympathetic people can be brought into these matters. However, unless the pesson on whom a parent leans can pinpoint the law, describe how it stands and describe how it can be called in aid in the individual case, the parent will not receive the right sort of assistance that he or she needs and deserves.

I know of a school in a fairly deprived area where 10 per cent. of children are said to be involved in adoption proceedings. The problem is considerable and needs to be faced by the House. The care and welfare of the child must come first and if parents can be assisted to ensure that that happens, the House should make that assistance available.

Mr. Mikardo: Like the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway), parents have come to my surgery — not many — to complain that they have not been allowed to see their child. The last parent to complain to me on that ground had treated the child abominably before it had been taken from him. He subsequently treated the child abominably when he had a chance to see it. All these matters must be dealt with on a case-by-case basis and in a way that relates to the particular circumstances.

I wish to say through you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to the Under-Secretary of State that if he wants us to have a pleasant and effective discussion of the Bill, which is what the rest of us want, he will have to treat the House with rather more courtesy and respect than he did in the course of his previous speech, in which he was disgustingly patronising to my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman). He insulted the intelligence of the House in the reason that he gave for not tabling amendments in Committee. He said, "I did not table the amendments in Committee because no Opposition Members were present in Committee and we could not discuss them". Amendments that come before a Committee have to be tabled at least 48 hours before the Committee meets. Unless the Minister has taken on the mantle of Isaiah, Nostradamus or Old Moore, of almanack fame, he cannot know 48 hours before a Committee meets how many Members will attend it. His explanation was nonsensical.

My hon. Friend the Member for Peckham was right. If the Minister wanted to change the Bill in the way in which the Government are now changing it, and if he could have obtained the agreement of his hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters), the sponsor of the Bill, so to do, he should have tabled amendments for the Committee to consider. That would have enabled a proper discussion to take place because the Committee members would have had reasonable time to study the amendments and to take advice on them. Instead, we saw the amendments only yesterday, and that is treating the House cavalierly.

I applaud the attempt of my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham to secure legal aid for those who are involved in juvenile court proceedings, but if there is to be High Court involvement it is there, more than in the juvenile court, that legal aid will be required. If it is not to be granted, however, we are merely giving statutory rights to parents in the knowledge that they will not be able to take advantage of them through lack of resources. That will frustrate parents and embitter them. We shall appear to give them a gift, but it will be so tightly wrapped in an impregnable box that it will be of no value to them.

10.45 am

Amendment No. 24 stands in my name and the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson). The subsection gives rights of evidence to "any person with whom the child is or has been boarded out".

That will be foster parents generally, and foster parents will know and understand the child if they have had it for a while, and recently. I did not table the amendment to make the Bill consistent with other legal provisions. It was an original thought and the amendment is designed to ensure that a foster parent who wants to give evidence shall be one who has reasonable knowledge of the child, and reasonably recent knowledge. As matters stand, someone could demand to give evidence who had had the child with them for a couple of days only two years ago. He or she could be entirely unacquainted with the present circumstances.

I accept that the figures which I have chosen—

"for a period of not less than three months ending not more than six weeks before the date of the application"—

may not be the best ones. I admit at once that they were plucked out of the air. If there are better figures, or figures which would be supported by those with greater knowledge of these matters than I have, there will be an opportunity in another place, if the principle is accepted, of inserting them. It is not unfair to have some restriction because evidence of a child's condition and attitudes is not of much value unless it is recent and based on reasonable experience with the child. Even if the amendment is not accepted, I hope that the sponsor will be disposed to say that he is willing to think about it and perhaps to consider what might be done when the Bill goes to another place.

Mr. Sims: The hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) has complained that amendment No. 23 is too narrow. I suspect that my hon. Friend the Minister will complain that the original clause 4 was too wide. That is the problem that we face. In the proceedings which we are discussing, there will be many who could have an interest in and knowledge of the child and something to contribute to the court proceedings.

I am not a lawyer and my experience is limited to sitting as a magistrate in the juvenile courts. My understanding is that, once someone is made a party to the proceedings, he or she has legal status and the court is obliged to hear them. That person — this is what worried the Government—will be entitled to legal aid. As the hon.

[Mr. Sims]

Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) has said, the various categories that are set out in clause 4 are quite wide. They go wider than "any person with whom the child is or has been boarded out".

Subsection (3)(c) states:

"any other person appearing to the court to have a proper interest in the welfare of the child."

That is an extremely wide provision.

If my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State is to ask the House to accept the far narrower definition of amendment No. 23, for the reasons that I anticipate he will give to us, may I ask him to look closely at the present position with regard to other persons appearing before the court in these proceedings. They do not necessarily have to be parties to the proceedings in a legal sense. However, there could be circumstances in which it would be highly desirable that people who do not fall within the normal legal categories should be heard by the magistrates court. For example, the lady next door, who is not a relative but who knows a good deal about what has been going on in that house for some years, perhaps ought to be heard by the court. That might also apply to the lady round the corner whom the child knows as "auntie" and with whom the child stays for much of the day while mummy is out at work. I realise the difficulty of giving to those people the status of parties to the proceedings in a legal sense, but the court would benefit from hearing what they have to say.

Ms. Harman: The hon. Gentleman is confusing the question of the court being able to hear evidence from somebody who lives next door and whether that person has sufficient concern, interest and involvement to be a party to the proceedings. Does he agree that he has slightly misled the House by saying that my view is that clause 4 has been drawn too wide? Will he accept that I do not think that it has been drawn too wide but that I think that it is too woolly? There should be a wide clause, but guidance should be given to the magistrates about how to exercise their discretion. The new clause has been tabled to include such a provision in the Bill. Will the hon. Gentleman accept that, although I believe that the Government's proposal is too narrow, I do not believe that clause 4 is too wide?

Mr. Sims: I apologise if I gave that impression. I said that the hon. Lady thought that it was too narrow and that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State thought that it was too wide. I was seeking to say exactly what the hon. Lady has just said: that it is important that guidance should be given to the courts by means of rules, guidance, or circulars, to ensure that the interested parties, in the layman's expression, are able to appear in court.

My experience of sitting in these proceedings is that it might be an advantage to grant legal aid to people so that they may be represented by solicitors but that there are occasions when this might be a disadvantage and that it would be of help to the court to hear people informally and listen to the information that they are able to give to the court.

I understand why my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will ask the House to accept amendment No. 23. However, I ask him to ensure that the courts are fully advised of the desirability in these proceedings of listening to anybody who, in the normal layman's expression, would have an interest in the outcome of the proceedings.

Mr. Whitney: Amendments Nos. 22, 23 and 29 would remove clause 4 on parties in care and related proceedings and substitute a new provision with three separate inserts in the legislation.

Subsection (1) adds to section 32A of the 1969 Act that a separate representation order in care proceedings carries with it party status for the parent or guardian. "Guardian" here means not legal guardian but the 1933 definition of "any person who in the opinion of the court has for the time being the charge of or control over the child".

Subsection (2) adds a new section to the 1969 Act providing for grandparents in circumstances specified in rules of court to be made parties by leave of the court, which can be a single justice.

Subsection (3) provides legal aid for parents, guardians and grandparents where made parties.

These are the differences from clause 4, to which I shall draw attention.

First, the amendment relates to care and related proceedings under the 1969 Act but not to the Child Care Act 1980 proceedings when parents are already parties. Secondly, the amendment relates to parents and guardians only if a separate representation order has been made because there is a conflict of interest with the child. Thirdly, the amendment allows party status to grandparents but not to any relative, any person with whom the child is or has been boarded out and any other person appearing to have a proper interest in the welfare of the child. However, the extended definition of guardian will bring in those relatives who have the control and care of the child.

Mr. Mikardo: One person who might have something worthwhile to contribute but who seems to have been left out of the picture altogether is the child's teacher. Why has the teacher been left out?

Mr. Whitney: That would be a matter for the court. There could be cases in which a teacher could play a role, but the contribution of the teacher is not automatically provided for.

The amendment leaves for rules of court the criteria for giving party status to grandparents.

Amendment No. 29 is a technical amendment to clarify the rule-making power. As foreshadowed in Committee, I have discussed the clause with my hon. Friend and I hope he will support the amendments I have now tabled. I appreciate that he is disappointed we cannot go further at this stage. We shall, of course, come to this whole area again in our own legislative proposals. At this point we have been able to conclude only two of the more important possibilities in this Bill. The first of the two is parents and guardians in care proceedings where there is a separate representation order. This is wider than it seems, because in this context "guardian" includes any person who had charge or control immediately before care proceedings started, or has the charge or control of the child for the time being, in the judgment of the court. This seems to me an urgent improvement. I was also much impressed by my hon. Friend's arguments about the contribution which in some circumstances grandparents can make to obtaining the best outcome for the child. We endorse that point and recognise that grandparents can often play a major role in the child's life.

As for new clause 2, we accept that legal aid should be granted to parties to the proceedings. However, the way forward proposed in amendments Nos. 22, 23 and 29 is the better way forward. Therefore, I hope that the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) will withdraw new clause 2 and accept our amendments.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (Surrey, South-West): The suggestion, even the possibility, that teachers might become parties in care cases fills me with absolute horror. The suggestion by the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) shows a misunderstanding of the complexity of our court proceedings. If one becomes a full party to the proceedings, it means that one can not only give evidence but cross-examine all the other witnesses. That highlights the misunderstanding about clause 4 and the need for people to give evidence.

Care proceedings are traumatic, emotional and difficult occasions. I feel very strongly that all those who have a contribution to make to a child's welfare and future should be able to give their opinion to the court and make representations, but that is a million miles away from granting full party standing to them. The idea that each and every one of them should have legal aid and be able to employ a lawyer—which would result in a wonderful job creation scheme for the legal profession, a matter about which my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) may care to comment—fills me with horror. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims), who often speaks in a similar vein and who has presided over many difficult care cases.

In the past, the standing of parents has been equivocal, to say the least. If the least that my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters) is able to achieve is to give formal standing to parents in care cases, it will be a great step forward. For the most part, the modifications to the Bill have been an improvement. I feel strongly that clause 4 is too wide. I said so on Second Reading, and I welcome the modification that has been made.

It is fair that grandparents should be given leave to be parties, although it would not be helpful or right for them automatically to have the full standing of parties. The review of child care law has been much discussed, and many hon. Members were pleased to hear the welcome news that there is to be concrete action and a timetable for legislation in at least the foreseeable future. It is better than anything that we have been able to hope for in the past. The review of child care law must make the distinction between the need of those who might want to make representations to feel that they are involved in the decision over the child and the need for them to have full party status.

Mr. Walters: The new clause is the result of discussions between me and some of my sponsors and the Government. I single out my hon. Friends the Members for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) and for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) for their continuous and invaluable support throughout the discussions. I welcome the fact that the Government have been able to extend the right to be a party to parents and guardians and have accepted that, in appropriate circumstances, grandparents may become parties as well.

In my Bill I specified the circumstances in which grandparents might become parties — normally when they have an important contribution to make. I am a little concerned that the Government's proposals leave it entirely to the rules of court to do this. I would much appreciate a commitment from my hon. Friend the Minister that, when the Bill is enacted, the rules of court will not be framed in an unduly restrictive manner. If it is not possible for him to spell it out this morning, perhaps it can be made clear in another place.

I am delighted to have achieved this important improvement, and the flood of letters that I have received from grandparents all over the country recounting some sad and moving stories of the unhappy consequences of the present state of the law leaves me in no doubt about how welcome, right and beneficial this provision will be.

The new clause leaves unclear whether the definition of grandparent would extend to the grandparents through the father of an illegitimate child. By use of the word "relative" and its statutory definition in the Child Care Act 1980, my clause made it plain that the father and grandparents of an illegitimate child were also included. It is established that the reference to parents normally excludes the putative father. There is no definition of grandparents in any of the relevant statutes, and I hope that when the Bill goes to the other place this point will be clarified, and that the grandparents of the illegitimate child will also be included. In such cases, it is not infrequent that such grandparents are involved.

Whatever view is taken about the rights of the putative father, I can see no possible welfare grounds for distinguishing between the classes of grandparents. Therefore, I hope that this matter will be clarified in the other place.

Royal Assent

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that the Queen has signified Her Royal Assent to the following Acts:

1. Gaming (Amendment) Act 1986
2. Statute Law (Repeals) Act 1986
3. Highways (Amendment) Act 1986
4. Yorkshire Water Authority Act 1986

Children and Young Persons (Amendment) Bill

Question again proposed, That the clause be read a Second time.

Ms. Richardson: This has been a most interesting debate. The hon. Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters) has raised an interesting point about the grandparents of an illegitimate child who are the parents of the putative father. That supports the theory that I think is shared by my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) that, while we think it right that grandparents, if they so wish, can make an application, so can other people, and the court would deal with any frivolous applications.

Ms. Harman: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is sad and inappropriate that the hon. Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters), having raised this important point about the grandparents of the illegitimate child, should be talking about amendments that might have to be made in the other place to clarify the position? If the Bill had been dealt with properly by the Government, those points would have been raised in Committee and then we would have been clearing it up now and making the situation satisfactory on Report. The hon. Member for Westbury does not sit in the other place. Therefore, does he support the point made earlier, that the Bill has been hijacked by the Government and taken out of his control?

Ms. Richardson: I am glad that my hon. Friend has raised that point. I was not on the Committee, being engaged in Committee on the Social Security Bill, but I have read the debate. It seems to me from the remarks that the hon. Member for Westbury has just made that it has just occurred to him that the Bill is being stitched together as we go along. Bits are being snipped out and other bits are being stitched in. That may be the tradition in legislation, but it is normally a process carried out in Committee. It is rather strange that, in effect, we are having a Committee on the Floor of the House, with new ideas being trailed, and this is not necessarily the right time to deal with them.

I support legal aid. I speak as a lay person. I have never been a magistrate, and I have great admiration for those who have devoted much of their spare time to that valuable work. I am not a lawyer like my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham—I am a lay person in every sense of the word. However, I have had complaints, not on child care, but on other subjects, about the difficulties that some people have in getting legal aid in magistrates courts. They are not necessarily refused legal aid, but they do not know about it and it is not pointed out to them.

A few years ago, I had a long and somewhat acrimonious discussion with the now retired clerk of my local magistrates court. I discovered that Barking magistrates court was towards the bottom of the league table of legal aid granted in courts. I tried to find out why. The clerk was frank and said that he wanted to save the Crown money. My reaction was that it was not for him to make that decision. If people qualify for legal aid they must be encouraged and shown how to claim it.

The amendment suggested by the Family Rights Group attempts to ensure that people made parties to care proceedings are entitled to apply for legal aid. The group says that its case work with parents prior to the introduction of legal aid for parents in care proceedings showed that a right to participate was an empty right unless parents were able to obtain legal representation.

I can see that the provision might create a field day for the legal profession, but not many people would apply. I can see the nub of the concern, but the problem is overplayed. Against the possibility of lining solicitors' pockets, we must set the rights of, and the responsibilities which we have towards, people making application to a court to be parties in care proceedings.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): It is crucial in such proceedings to ensure that those who are party have access to the best representation. Is it not therefore vital that the new clause be included in the Bill?

Ms. Richardson: I agree that the new clause is necessary. No one is in a worse position than the person who is not represented or who is represented by someone not of their choice and given at the last moment. I know that the proposal is costly, but it is a cost that we must bear. The rights of people must be made known. People should be able to engage the person with whom they feel most comfortable. In a court action, the person acting for the party must command trust. I support the new clause.

Mr. Whitney: The Government amendments, specifically amendment No. 23, make it clear that legal aid would be provided for parents, guardians and grandparents who are made parties in such cases. The word "guardian" means, not a legal guardian, but is as defined in the 1933 Act which states:

"any person who in the opinion of the court . . . has for the time being the charge of or control over the child."

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters) for his remarks about how we were able to co-operate. We shall consider what he said, including his remarks about the illegitimate child. The rules of court will be outlined in the House of Lords. The consultation process, in particular with the rules committee, might take a little time. The matter is the Home Secretary's responsibility, but I shall pass on my hon. Friend's comments.

Question put and negatived.

New Clause 3

REVOCATION AND DISCHARGE PROCEEDINGS

'Either a parent or guardian or the child may apply under section 15(1) or section 21(2) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1969 for the discharge of a care or supervision order, or under section 5(4) for the revocation of a parental rights resolution.'.—[Ms. Harman.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

11.15 am

Ms. Harman: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The clause deals with revocation and discharge proceedings. Earlier clauses make parents parties in all care and related proceedings. That is an important step. New clause 3 is designed to make it clear that not only can parents or guardians be parties to applications but that they can initiate revocation and discharge proceedings.

Parents face many problems because they are not necessarily parties to discharge proceedings. There is a technical right to initiate discharge proceedings but the legal position is currently complex. Following the decision in 1985 in the Avon county council case, it is possible that parents will not be able to proceed with an application to discharge if there is a guardian ad litem and where that guardian ad litem does not support the application by the parents for a discharge.

Parents have to go through legal contortions in fighting their way through an application for discharge. A system which deprives parents of the right to seek the return of their children but gives them rights to be parties only when the application is made by the local authority cannot be fair or just. That is why I have tabled the new clause. I hope that it will be accepted.

Mr. Whitney: I am advised that the practical effect of the new clause would be small because under section 70(2) of the 1969 Act an application can be made on behalf of a child by a parent or guardian as defined, but including someone who was guardian when the original order was made.

I urge the House not to press the new clause as it would not fit in with Government amendments 22 and 23 by which party status is given to parents and guardians only when a separate representation order is made because of a conflict of interests with the child. When we present our own proposals for comprehensive legislation, I shall take account of the comments by the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman).

Ms. Harman: Does the Minister accept that section 70(2) of the 1969 Act was hedged around in the court decision in the Avon county council case? That means that section 70(2) no longer applies. The Minister assures us that in the far distant future we shall benefit from the child care law review, but now the situation remains unclear.

Mr. Whitney: I do not accept that it is wrong to wait while we complete the comprehensive process of revising legislation. I have already said that our concrete proposals will be made in the autumn. I am sure that it is right to take account of that and of section 70(2) of the 1969 Act as it now applies.

New Clause 4

ACCESS

'(1) The following subsections shall be substituted for sections 12A, 12B and 12C of the Child Care Act 1980.

(2) The Court, pending a final determination or on making a care order in any of the proceedings referred to in subsection (3) of this section may, on the application of a parent, guardian or relative of the child, make an order requiring the local authority to give access to the child to the parent, guardian or relative.

(3) The proceedings to which subsection (2) above applies are:

(a) an application for a care order or an interim care order under sections 1 and 2(10) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1969;

(b) an application under section 2(12) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1969 for the discharge of a care order;

(c) an appeal under section 2(12) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1969;

(d) an appeal under section 21(4) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1969;

(e) a complaint made by a local authority to the Juvenile Court under section 3(5) and (6) of the Child Care Act 1980;

(f) a complaint made under section 5(4) of the Child Care Act 1980 requesting the determination of a resolution made under section 3 of that Act;

(g) an appeal to the High Court under section 6 of the Child Care Act 1980;

(h) proceedings in the Magistrates' Court in relation to a child or young person on an information charging him with an offence; and

(i) an appeal to the Crown Court against an order made by a magistrates' court in relation to a child or young person found guilty of an offence.

(4) Where a child is in the care of a local authority under an enactment the parent, guardian or relative of that child may apply to the magistrates' court for an order requiring the local authority to give access to the child to the parent, guardian or relative.

(5) An application under subsection (4) shall be made by way of a complaint to an appropriate Juvenile Court.

(6) An access order shall be an order requiring the authority to allow the child's parent, guardian or relative access to the child subject to such conditions as the order may specify with regard to commencement, frequency, duration or place of access or to any other matter for which it appears to the court that provision ought to be made in connection with the requirement to allow access.

(7) A Juvenile Court is an appropriate Juvenile Court for the purposes of the Part of the Act if it has jurisdiction in the area of the authority who has the care of the child.

(8) "Relative" in subsections (2) and (4) is a relative within the meaning of section 87 of the Child Care Act 1980.'.— [Ms. Harman.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Ms. Harman: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The new clause recognises the critical importance of access in rehabilitation. It is agreed that, wherever it is possible and safe to do so, a child should be returned to live with its parents and that the period spent in care should be as short as possible.

The contact that the child maintains with the parents while it is in care and the access allowed to the parents are critical to rehabilitation. If parents lose touch with the child because they do not have proper access, rehabilitation can be simply a paper exercise, because the bonds between parent and child may have been broken.

The new clause provides that a parent, guardian or relative may apply for any matter involving access to be decided by the courts. When making access orders, courts could impose specific conditions on the access.

Hon. Members may think that the clause is too wide, but it gives courts extensive powers to impose conditions when granting access. It says that courts may impose conditions on the "frequency, duration or place of access"

and on any other matters. If a court were worried about the common law husband or boy friend of the mother, it could order that access should not take place in the presence of the man. It might also order that the child should not be taken on a visit to see that person.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Does not the hon. Member see a contradiction between her view that the court should be given these powers on access and her vote against clause 1 in Committee? Clause 1 gave the courts small powers covering simply the return home. Decisions about access would be multiplied endlessly compared with that initial decision.

Ms. Harman: There was wide agreement in the child care law review that access decisions should be made by the courts. The new clause is in line with the general spirit of the Bill and with the recommendations of the review.

At present, only parents may apply for access to children in care. The Bill recognises the importance of other relatives and people who are interested in the child's life, as does the new clause, which extends the range of people who may apply for access.

At present, courts can make orders for access only when it has been stopped by the local authority. No doubt hon. Members have met parents in their surgeries and know of cases where local authorities have not stopped access, but have imposed conditions that render access unsatisfactory. The new clause would allow parents to apply to a court and to say, "Although the local authority has not denied us access, the terms on which it has granted it are so unsatisfactory as to make it virtually impossible." The court could then agree with the conditions imposed by the local authority, scrap them, or impose new conditions.

The child care law review recommended that all disputes over access should be decided by the courts. We should prefer the forum in which access was decided to be an experienced, well-trained and consistent judiciary under a family court system. That would make the new clause a much more important step. I believe that it is important, but at present it is limited.

[Ms. Harman]

The European Commission of Human Rights has recently found the Government to be in breach of the convention that protects family life in, I think, five cases where parents have been denied access to their children in local authority care. The new clause would open up the situation, but the orders and conditions that the courts could impose would prevent it from getting out of control.

A major anxiety about children in care and their families is that insufficient work is done to enable children to return home. They must be able to see and to keep in touch with their parents as much as possible. Therefore, it would be right to allow a parent or relative to challenge a local authority's decision. If a child is very young or is to be in care for some time, access is important in rehabilitation, but there may never be rehabilitation and it is also important to ensure that there is close scrutiny of the conditions under which parents are allowed to see their children.

Mr. Walters: The new clause, which would extend the rights of parents or relatives to apply for access orders, is outside the scope of anything in the Bill.

I have some sympathy with the aims of the new clause, but I cannot resist the observation, already tellingly made by my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley), that it would considerably increase the involvement of magistrates courts in the management of children in care, and the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) firmly and, in my view, regrettably resisted that move in relation to my proposals in clause 1.

Mr. Mikardo: Subsection (5) of the new clause places within the purview of the juvenile courts the decision on a matter on which decisions are not always easy. It induces me to make some observations about that subsection and about other references in the Bill to juvenile courts.

I have to be careful that nothing I say could be interpreted as being derogatory of juvenile courts. I have a daughter who is a magistrate and who sits in a juvenile court in the north of England and I would not want to say anything that might import tension into what has hitherto been a loving and relaxed family. I know that she and her colleagues spent a considerable time reading and attending seminars to prepare themselves for their role.

11.30 am

We must bear in mind that it is a long time since the children of lay magistrates were young and a long time since those magistrates had day-to-day contact with children. My daughter would be the first to admit that, notwithstanding the study involved, the qualifications of a lay magistrate to make difficult judgments on child care cases, including access cases, on average — there are exceptions — are well below the qualifications of a trained, professional certificated social worker. The judgment of such a social worker should not, therefore, be cast aside.

Ms. Harman: Does my hon. Friend agree that the greater involvement which would be provided to the courts under the new clause is realistic, because, by definition, the parents and the local authority would be on opposite sides? Therefore, the magistrate would have to choose between contending cases. Does my hon. Friend recognise that clause 1, as it was first brought before the House, provided that the parents and the local authority would be, by definition, on the same side and, therefore, the scrutiny would not be realistic? Does my hon. Friend recognise that that was one of the reasons why we opposed clause 1?

Mr. Mikardo: I understand that. I do not seek to make more of the argument than it justifies or to make too much of the position. I know that lay magistrates place importance on the opinions expressed to them by social workers. A magistrate should not be over-influenced by what may well be an understandable and human fellow feeling for a parent and lightly discard—I use that word carefully—the views of the professional officer who is trained for the job and has probably studied the child closely over a long period.

Notwithstanding the disclaimer of the hon. Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters)—I do not cast any doubt on his integrity—it is clear that the introduction of the Bill at this time was inspired, at least in part, by a small number of recent cases of gross abuse of a child by one or both of his parents—cases which have horrified us all. I refer particularly to the Jasmine Beckford case. To the overwhelming majority of people, and especially parents, such cases are not merely horrifying; they are incomprehensible. Normal people cannot understand a parent behaving in that incredible way. They find it hard to believe that such a monstrous thing could happen. Our strong reaction is to overlook the fact that these abnormal cases represent only a tiny fraction of the many thousands of child care cases that are handled every day of the week by social workers. No one hears about those cases because they are brought to a satisfactory conclusion.

I appreciated the remarks of the hon. Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) on Second Reading —she took a crack at me earlier—when she said:

> "The history of child care law has, in my view, been too frequently an over-reaction to appalling incidents."

She continued:

> "It is very easy at a time of emotional strain and difficulty, especially when there is a great deal of press and public interest, to look for scapegoats."—[Official Report, 31 January 1986; Vol. 90, c. 1211.]

She cited the Jasmine Beckford case. She was absolutely right. We must remember that, in the Jasmine Beckford case, it was the court, not the social worker, that made an error which in the end, unhappily, turned out to be fatal.

Mr. Walters: In the Jasmine Beckford case, the magistrates, having made the order, commented that they would like the child to be returned to the home as soon as practicable. In retrospect, that was a grave mistake and a great pity. The decision to return the child was entirely that of the social workers.

Mr. Mikardo: That is not as I read the case and as some pretty authoritative people have interpreted it. Many people think that the social services department of the borough council involved in that case was made a scapegoat in the way that the hon. Member for Surrey, South-West said.

Ms. Harman: Is my hon. Friend aware that the inquiry chaired by Louis Blom-Cooper felt that, although the social workers said in evidence that they had not placed undue weight on the remarks of the magistrates, the remarks of the magistrates had been critical in leading to the decision? In fact, the report stated that the magistrates should be publicly upbraided.

Mr. Lawrence: Rubbish.

Ms. Harman: The hon. and learned Gentleman says, "Rubbish." I am simply bringing to the attention of my hon. Friend the Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) something of which he is probably aware—that the Blom-Cooper inquiry felt that the error of the magistrates was significant and, combined with the error of the social workers, disastrous.

Mr. Mikardo: My hon. Friend should not be surprised that the hon. and learned Gentleman said, "Rubbish." Honourable and learned Gentlemen never agree with their learned friends about anything under the sun. Obviously, they do not like Mr. Blom-Cooper. However, we do not have to become involved in high-level legal quarrels.

I refer to the intervention of my hon. Friend and that of the hon. Member for Westbury. The least one can say is that responsibility in that case must be shared. The professional people were disciplined and their careers put in jeopardy. To that extent, they were made scapegoats for a decision that was not entirely theirs. That is the point which I took the hon. Member for Surrey, South-West to be making. She returned to the point, with good effect, in Standing Committee. She said:

"Having been a psychiatric social worker for 10 years, I feel strongly about the value of the profession, the importance of people's judgments, their skills, the need for further training and the respect which they should have from the public. I have felt incensed in many cases where things have gone wrong that the social worker was all too easily the scapegoat."

The hon. Lady was strongly supported by the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security—the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney)—who said:

"The implication—indeed, the practice—of what is now proposed would be to ask the magistrates to get involved in detail of child placement and in making provisions which would take this whole subject into a different area. I suggest that the experience we have would not necessarily lead to the conclusion that this would provide the better answers in child care that we are all seeking."

Later in the sitting, the hon. Gentleman returned to the subject when he said:

"the local authority will . . . take the professional decisions on case management, such as the placement of the child. Because of its composition and procedure, the court is not an appropriate forum for reviewing such professional decisions."

Later he stated:

"Our social services inspectorate, in consultation with the field agencies, will offer a more comprehensive and appropriate way of dealing with an issue than a bench of magistrates."

That is putting it more forcefully than the hon. Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters) or I would.

The Under-Secretary of State was not finished with the point, because he said:

"I suggest that a careful examination of the cases which have gone wrong, whether the Jasmine Beckford case or others, does not lead me to the conclusion that to bring the magistrates back into the process at this stage . . . would improve the possibilities of achieving better management in child care cases. Rather, it would lead to delays. It would introduce another court element which inevitably would have a degree of confrontation about it." — [Official Report, Standing Committee C, 19 March 1986; c. 4, 6, 14-15.]

We should bear this major consideration in mind not only in relation to the new clause, especially subsection (5), but throughout our deliberations.

Mr. Chris Smith: I support the new clause tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) for two major reasons. First, we must all recognise, as my hon. Friends the Members for Peckham and for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) have done, that the issue of access is crucial, not simply for the mere fact of access but because access is a preparation for any future change in the relationship between a parent or guardian and the child. If a person who may, in due course, again be given the care of the child does not have access for some months and if the change in care status happens cold, the chances that a successful relationship will develop and hold will be much fewer than if access were available. Access is important not simply for the well-being of the child and for the peace of mind of its relatives or parents but because it prepares people for what might happen later. That is an extremely important point.

Secondly, I am sympathetic to the new clause because it seeks to enable not only parents but other relatives to apply for access. Hon. Members have commented on the importance of grandparents. One example in my constituency immediately springs to mind because in the past week I have been attempting to assist those involved. A grandparent whose daughter died just before Christmas is developing an extremely close relationship with her daughter's child. The father has disappeared from the scene. The relationship that is developing, in the absence of parents, is mirrored by many similar relationships in Britain. In such circumstances, surely it is right that relatives other than parents should be able to apply for access.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the legislation of my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters) has passed the stage where it was agreed that grandparents with the leave of the court would be parties and would, therefore, have the right to be heard? That is a substantial achievement.

Mr. Smith: I am, of course, aware of that fact. I was simply using the example of a case in my constituency to emphasise that not only parents but other relatives have an interest in the welfare of the child and in building up a good relationship with him. I am delighted about the improved status of grandparents which has been achieved by the hon. Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters). I would not wish to imply that I was not delighted about that.

I make one caveat about the new clause. I imply no criticism of my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham, because she has to work within the existing legal framework. It is difficult and daunting for many people to approach any sort of court in the present legal system to apply for access or to make any other request concerning their relationship with their child.

I should like to make one other point. I may be straying a little from the new clause but, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I hope that you will allow me to press the point. I hope that the efforts by my hon. Friend the Member for Torfaen (Mr. Abse) and other hon. Members to try to establish a completely different system for court consideration of such matters will have greater success than they appear to have had hitherto. The more we can do to make court and legal proceedings less daunting and less difficult for parents, grandparents and other relatives the better. Given the legal system under which we have to operate, this new clause is a sensible provision and will enlarge the scope for those involved in the welfare of children and enable them to seek access. I support the new clause.

Mr. Whitney: I agree with hon. Members who have spoken about the importance of access in child care cases.

[Mr. Whitney]

That is why in the Health and Social Services and Social Security Adjudications Act 1983, or SSASSA, as we call it in my trade, we introduced a new arrangement under which parents, guardians or custodians could appeal against termination or refusal of access to a child who was subject to a care order. In December 1983, we published a statutory code of practice under the provisions of that Act.

The work of the social services inspectorate is an important part of the DHSS operation. It has recently been concentrating on this area and has completed an inspection. We recognise the importance of access and are taking practical steps to ensure that it is improved. Our now much-trailered proposals on the reform of child care law will, as the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) suggested, cover this area.

The hon. Lady's clause goes much further than the suggestions in our review document, where a total package is proposed. That package differs considerably from the scope of the present clause which has serious and unacceptable implications. For example, it would allow a wide range of relatives to apply for access. It would bring in a new procedure that would apply to voluntary care and was drafted in the expectation that an order would delineate in advance all the main parameters of the arrangements. It suffers from all the main disadvantages of the original clauses 1 and 2 of the Bill. My hon. Friends the Members for Westbury (Mr. Walters) and for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) have already said that it would necessitate the detailed involvement of the court. I hope that the hon. Lady will accept that we recognise this area as important.

Ms. Harman: Does not the Minister think that it is totally unsatisfactory that, when a number of new clauses are brought before the House and he acknowledges that they raise important points and will be dealt with when the legislation arising out of the child care law reivew comes before the House, he fails to give us a date for that? He recognises the importance of the issues but says that for technical reasons he will not at this time accept the new clause but will wait until some far distant time in the future. That is entirely unsatisfactory and unacceptable.

Mr. Whitney: I do not accept that. The hon. Lady normally accepts that one of the dangers in this area is piecemeal legislation. We do not object to what my hon. Friend's Bill seeks to achieve, but having set in train the process of the massive review of the child care legislation it would not make sense to pick and choose out of the whole corpus of review material. I shall be charged again with repetition by the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo). I said that these proposals will be published in the autumn as a basis for legislation, but because of the nature of parliamentary arrangements I cannot give a date for that legislation. I hope that the hon. Lady will find it in her heart to be generous enough to accept that that is a firm undertaking. As I have already said, the clause has serious drawbacks. However, we accept the importance of access and the importance of improving arrangements for it, and to the extent that those improvements can be widely agreed we look forward to making recommendations in our own Bill.

Ms. Richardson: This has been an interesting debate. As hon. Members were speaking I felt that we were all thinking of examples of relatives or constituents who had faced these problems. I certainly had that feeling when my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) was speaking. This new clause reflects the recommendation of the child care law review and I am a bit surprised that its acceptance is being resisted when such an august body thought it worth pursuing. This was recommendation 193 and, although I have not read the whole of the review, the fact that it is recommendation 193 leads me to believe that a lot of thought must have gone into putting together so many recommendations. That distinguished body has looked at the subject seriously and the House ought to take its recommendations seriously.

Mr. Whitney: The hon. Lady spoke about recommendation 193. This a complex package that is being instituted, and there are serious dangers in taking little bits and pieces when it is a package that is at issue.

Ms. Richardson: That brings me to the point that was made many times in the debate. We are adding bits on because in a Bill of this sort we have no alternative. If we had a proper comprehensive Bill, which is what I hope we will eventually get, we would not have this problem and would not have to look around for what we see as gaps or tears in the fabric of the patchwork and then try to fill them in. I accept the Minister's point that recommendation 193 is only one recommendation, but I was trying to underline its importance and saying that that was why we sought to put the new clause into effect.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): I apologise to the House for not being in the Chamber during the early part of the debate.

This new clause seems to be moving in the right direction. For a number of years I served on a local authority social services committee, and I remember the difficulties that we faced when we considered precisely the terms of access in cases where children might be at risk and where the officers of the social services department were reluctant to expose the children to risk. We had difficult decisions to make and seldom went against an officer's decision, although occasionally we did. I always had serious misgivings about whether we were doing the right thing. In fairness, local authority social services departments get it right almost all of the time, but it is a tragedy when now and again they do not, because that is what hits the headlines.

I should like to give three examples, from constituency experience, of where the new clause would be relevant and appropriate, and where one parent or relative may have a real sense of injustice if the new clause is not put into effect. The first concerns a case where a child is in care, and where certain access conditions have been arranged, but they have been arranged in the knowledge that the parents are split up—that the marriage has broken down —and one of the parents does not have an adequate home. In this case, I have been approached by the father, who says that his access conditions have not been generous because, when the decision was made, he did not have an adequate home environment that the children could visit occasionally for the weekend. The father is anxious to improve his home to make it better than a bedsitter so that the children could go there. However, if the local authority is not sensitive to that and the father gets better accommodation, he has no guarantee that the limited access given to him on the basis of his bedsitter accommodation will be changed by the local authority to take account of the improved housing conditions.

12 noon

I know from my experience that the limited access that may result from housing conditions causes much distress to a separated parent. A separated parent may feel that, even if the housing conditions improve, he may not automatically get better access, which he would have obtained if he had had a proper flat when the decision was made. That is a distressing example. I hope that it does not happen too often.

The second example concerns other relatives who wish to have access. A grandmother who, I believe, was of Jamaican origin was very distressed that she was not allowed to have access to her grandchild, although the father had access. She felt shut out of a relationship that was traditional to her background and culture, and felt extremely upset that there was no way that she could challenge the decision. The father had access and the mother, who was the grandmother's daughter, was a long-term patient in hospital. The grandmother felt that her traditional family responsibilities could not be exercised. She wanted better opportunities to do so, but that was not possible.

I mentioned the third group of people — fathers — obliquely in my first example. I am not one who says that fathers alone have a sense of grievance about this, but on occasions fathers have complained bitterly to me that they have had only limited access to children in care following the breakdown of the marriage.

I cannot help thinking that the new clause would give a better opportunity to those three groups of people — those in housing difficulties, other relatives, and fathers who feel that their wish to have more access and establish a closer relationship with the child in care is frustrated because the local authority is not always sensitive to such pressure. I cannot help thinking that the Minister's arguments against the new clause, while I understand them, do not carry the weight that one would normally expect when a sensible suggestion is made. I do not fully understand why he took such a hard line against a modest but sensible proposal. After all, the courts would still have to consider the matter and could still take all the facts into account. It is not a matter of opening the door to unlimited access by people who might be thought to be not totally desirable by the social services department that has care of the child. It is a matter of the courts being a second line of appeal, as it were, for people who have a sense of grievance and injustice. I hope that the Minister will think again. The new clause is moving in the right direction.

Question put and negatived.

New Clause 5

REGULATIONS AS TO ACCOMMODATION AT HOME OF CHILDREN IN CARE

'(1) After section 22 of the Child Care Act 1980 there shall be inserted—

"Regulations as to accommodation with parents etc.

22A.—(1) The Secretary of State may by regulations make provision as to the accommodation under the charge and control of a parent, guardian, relative or friend of children who are in the care of a local authority.

(2) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1) above, regulations under this section may—

(a) make provision as to the making by a local authority of a decision to accommodate children under the charge and control of a parent, guardian, relative or friend and, in particular, as to the persons who must be consulted before such a decision is made and the persons to whom notification of any such decision must be given; and

(b) impose requirements on a local authority as to the supervision of medical examination of children in such accommodaton or their removal from such accommodation in such circumstances as may be specified in the regulations.".

(2) In section 85 of that Act (regulations and orders) in subsection (4) after the word "21A" there shall be inserted the words "22, 22A".

(3) In section 43(5) of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1973 (which provides that the exercise by the local authority of their powers under sections 18, 21 and 22 of the Child Care Act 1980 shall be subject to any directions given by the court) for the words "and 22" there shall be substituted the words ", 22 and 22A".'.

—[Mr. Whitney.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Whitney: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second Time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following:

New clause 7 — Parent's application for care and control—

'.—(1) The parent, guardian or custodian of a child in care under an order as specified in subsection (2) of this section may apply to the Juvenile Court for an order that the child be placed in their care and control.

(2) Subsection (1) shall apply to children in care under:

(a) a care order made in the Juvenile Court; or

(b) a resolution under section 3 of the Child Care Act 1980; or

(c) an order under section 2(1) of the Matrimonial Proceedings (Magistrates' Courts) Act 1960 or an order under section 10(1) of the Domestic Proceedings and Magistrates' Courts Act 1978; or

(d) an order under section 2(2)(b) of the Guardianship Act 1973; or

(e) an order under section 17(1)(b) of the Children Act 1975 or section 26(1)(b) of the Adoption Act 1976; or

(f) an order under section 34(5) or section 36(2) or (3)(a) of the Children Act 1975.

(3) This section does not apply to a child in the care of a local authority in consequence of an order made in the High Court.

(4) Subsections (2) to (8) and (10) to (13) of section 1 (as amended) shall apply to this section as they apply to section 1.

(5) The parties to an application under this section shall be the applicant, the local authority and the child and such persons, if any, as the court thinks fit having regard to the welfare of the child and the interests of justice.'.

Amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 5, leave out clause 1.

No. 2, in clause 1, page 2, line 4 leave out from '(2)' to end of line 5.

No. 3, in page 2, line 7 after 'fit', insert

'and as the relevant social services department certify as practicable'.

No. 4, in page 2, line 14 at end insert

'or the parents or the child.'.

No. 5, in page 2, line 17 leave out from first 'with' to end of line 20, and insert—

'The local authority shall have a duty to remove a child where there is a breach of a condition only if the juvenile court so ordered when making the condition. In any other case the local authority should seek the directions of the Juvenile Court.'.

No. 6, in page 2, line 19, leave out from 'removed' to end of line 20.

No. 7, in page 2, line 23, leave out

'and shall give special attention to the safety of the child'.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker]

No. 8, in page 2, line 26, leave out 'respondents shall be', and insert

'respondent shall be the child and the court shall have power to join as parties'.

No. 9, in page 2, line 26, leave out from 'be' to end of line 28 and insert

'the child and the parents and such other persons (if any) as the court thinks fit having regard for the welfare of the child and in the interests of justice'.

No. 10, in page 2, line 36, leave out subsection (11).

No. 11, in page 2, line 42, leave out 'not exceeding seven days'.

No. 12, in page 2, line 43, leave out 'seven' and insert 'thirty'.

No. 13, in page 3, line 7, leave out clause 2.

No. 14, in clause 2, page 3, line 17, leave out from second 'if' to 'and' in line 22, and insert

'the court is satisfied that—

(a) the child has been, or another child in the same household has been, subjected to serious physical injury or sexual abuse,'.

No. 15, in page 3, line 24, leave out 'the relevant local authority' and insert 'any of the parties'.

No. 16, in page 3, line 26, at end insert—

'(3) An appeal from any direction of a Juvenile Court made under subsection (1)(ii) above shall lie to a Judge of the High Court Family Division and such appeal shall be by way of a fresh hearing of evidence.'.

No. 30, in clause 7, page 5, line 29, leave out subsections (1) and (2).

No. 31, in page 5, line 33, at end insert—

'(2A) Section [Regulations as to accommodation at home of children in care] above shall come into force on such date as the Secretary of State may by order made by statutory instrument appoint.'.

Mr. Whitney: I may have to delay the House a little on this group of amendments because it is a substantive change, as my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters) will be the first to agree. It is the essence of the debate that we have had not only this morning but in Committee and on Second Reading.

There is no doubt about the objective that we all share. Child abuse represents an abhorrent challenge to society. Our search is for practical steps to prevent it as far as possible and to protect children. Equally, we all accept that it is an insufficient response, in terms of the welfare of the child, simply to ensure that an abused child is kept safe by never returning him to his parents. If that were an adequate response, the responsibility of child care agencies would be much more straightforward.

The reality is that in many cases the needs and wishes of the child will best be met by a return to the natural parents or parent and the advantages of restoring and re-establishing those natural relationships will be seen as justifying such a step, even though the possibility of risk to the child cannot be entirely eliminated. So the agencies responsible for child care cannot simply pursue a safety-at-all-costs policy. They have to be prepared — in the interests of the child and in the right circumstances—to make balanced decisions, weighing carefully and professionally all the evidence and opinion available to them, which may necessarily involve some measure of risk. The debate that we shall have about new clause 5 and on the amendments to delete clauses 1 and 2 is essentially about how those decisions can and should best be made in the interests of the children concerned, not whether they should be made at all.

It will help our debate if I begin by referring to clauses 1 and 2. Those two clauses have taken up most of the time of the House both on Second Reading and in Committee. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury has regarded them as the central feature of his Bill. The clauses were supported in Committee, but concerns were expressed about whether the role envisaged for the courts was appropriate, about the practical effects on children in care, and about whether it would in practice achieve its primary purpose of protecting children who might be abused if returned home on trial.

Since the Committee my hon. Friend has been kind enough to have several discussions with me and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services. In those discussions we have been able to go into our reservations about his clauses and also let him know of the results of the wide-ranging consultations we have had since the Committee stage with bodies representing local authority, social work, legal and voluntary child care interests to ascertain their views on the proposals and on the Bill as amended in Committee. I shall not give details of those reservations today or elaborate at length on the comments from interested organisations — for reasons that I hope to make clear a little later. But I must summarise again the main reservations that we have, as I believe it important, when we are all anxious to do what is right in the interests of children, that it should be clear why the Government do not feel able to support a measure which was so clearly intended to benefit children.

Our reasons, in brief, are these. The first relates to delay. The imposition of a requirement on the local authority to go back to court, in the circumstances specified in the Bill, before returning a child in its care home on trial will inevitably lead to lengthy delays before cases can be heard. That is especially so as the Bill now provides for the court to be able to appoint a guardian ad litem for the child, and the demand for guardians in care proceedings is already leading to delays. Delay in decision making for the children in question can be particularly damaging and have long-term consequences, reducing prospects for successful return home of the child or other settled placement.

Secondly, we have concerns that the very making of a direction under clause 2 could discourage local authorities from attempting rehabilitation and lead to an undesirable categorisation of children in care. Alternatively, they may seek prematurely to discharge a care order without a prior period home on trial.

Thirdly, the imposition of conditions by the court which would apply until altered by the court would restrict the local authority's ability to respond flexibly and professionally to the child's and the family's needs and to optimise the use of its resources to help all the children in its care.

In addition to those practical objections, we have reservations about the principle of court involvement in the decisions. Courts must, of course, make and discharge care orders. They involve the transfer of legal rights between parents and local authorities and are often strongly disputed. Such decisions cannot be left to local authorities to take without there being a possibility of challenge and the case taken to court for a decision. The decision by the local authority to return a child home on trial while subject to a care order is different in character, although not necessarily less important from a child welfare angle, because there is no transfer of legal rights —the local authority remains responsible in law for the child as its legal parent and, unlike most care order proceedings, there is no dispute to be resolved between parents and local authority, so no need for a third party to settle the matter.

The argument that the court authorised the removal from home and that, therefore, the court is an appropriate forum to authorise the return is a misunderstanding of the rationale of care proceedings. Such decisions are more appropriate for the local authority, as part of its responsibility under the law to safeguard and promote the welfare of the child, than for the courts.

Following what I have said, there can be no certainty that involving the courts in sanctioning return home on trial will prevent such children from subsequently being abused. We would never know whether the clauses had their desired effects. We would know in how many cases the courts refused to sanction return home, but not what might have happened had they allowed the child to return. However, we can be more certain that the delays and restrictions which the clauses would impose on the good professional management of cases would damage the interests of many children in care, which I know is the opposite of what my hon. Friend wishes to achieve. It is clear from the consultations that we have undertaken since the Committee stage that our reservations about clauses 1 and 2 are widely shared by a broad spectrum of organisations.

Of course, many organisations advanced as part of their cases the belief that it would be wrong to have further piecemeal legislation adding yet more complexity to what is already recognised as an area of law where the need is for greater consistency and clarity. Many said that it would be especially undesirable to do so at a time when the Government are known to be considering a comprehensive major reform of the law, following the extensive review that we initiated at the end of last year. But there was no evidence from the consultations we have undertaken that the organisations concerned would like provisions on the lines of those in clauses 1 and 2 to be incorporated into the comprehensive legislation that we plan to introduce. Indeed, the reverse is the case. The consensus is that the clauses would not necessarily achieve the objectives the sponsors of the Bill wish, but would be potentially damaging to the interests of many children in care along the lines that I have described.

In our discussions with my hon. Friend, he acknowledged and took note of the views of the Government and of the bodies that we have consulted. On the understanding that the new clause to provide the Secretary of State with a regulation-making power is added to the Bill, I understand that he is now willing not to oppose the amendments to delete clauses 1 and 2. In a moment, I shall discuss the substance and purpose of the new clause, but first I wish to place on record my sincere appreciation of my hon. Friend's willingness to listen with an open mind to the views that have been put to him and his willingness at this late stage to accede to the argument that an alternative approach should be followed, despite his strong personal commitment to the idea of an independent check through the courts.

The alternative approach to which I referred starts from the premise that the right way to promote the welfare of abused children is, in broad terms, through improving the performance of the local authorities which are statutorily charged with that task. There can be no satisfactory external substitute for the involvement of experienced staff acting within a well-considered framework of policies directed towards and centred on the welfare of the child.

We shall soon publish a draft guide for local agencies on working together in dealing with child abuse, and the report of inspection by the social services inspectorate of assessment by social workers of children who have been at risk of abuse and the supervision of social workers handling child abuse cases. That inspection focused on work with children placed home on trial. Both documents in their different ways will, we hope, help local authorities to improve practices and procedures where a child is returned home on trial, in respect of the decision itself and the subsequent arrangements for the care and well-being of the child at home, including health, growth, and development. Both documents reinforce the need for professionals working with the child and family to remain child-centred, and always to have the welfare of the child as their first consideration, as the law requires.

Mr. Lawrence: Were there no regulations, restrictions, guidance or a framework for supervision before the Jasmine Beckford case?

Mr. Whitney: Of course there were, and there was a great deal of experience, but the experience is developing and lessons are being learnt. We may argue about this, but the Jasmine Beckford case in no way supported the suggestion that magistrates get the answers right and social workers get them wrong. Mistakes can be made in any area. We are anxious to strengthen the professionals working in this area, although neither I nor any member of the Government would suggest that we have found perfection. We must continually strive to co-operate and educate and to ensure that the best practice, which is very good, is spread and becomes the norm. That must be the way forward.

I hope that my hon. and learned Friend will be reassured if I say that the Government do not believe that there is no place for the further involvement of the law in these matters. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services announced that following extensive consultations on their child care law review the Government intend to introduce a comprehensive Bill on child care law as soon as parliamentary time allows. That Bill is likely to include some changes specifically aimed at increasing the powers of local authorities and the courts to protect children who may be at risk.

The Government broadly share the views of those who have argued that, pending the introduction of comprehensive legislation, there should be no more piecemeal changes in what is already a complex and confusing legal framework, but the opportunity provided by this Bill gives us scope for making limited changes where they can sensibly be made ahead of a major Bill. The new clause to which I shall now speak falls into that category.

The new clause would give the Secretary of State power to make regulations in respect of the discharge of the responsibilities by local authorities for children in their care where a return home on trial is contemplated. The lack of such a power to make regulations in this area is clearly anomalous as powers already exist, and are exercised, to regulate arrangements made by local authorities for other placements for children in care—in children's homes or boarded out with foster parents. The regulation power proposed by the clause will cover not only placements at home with parents, but placements with other relatives and friends not covered by the boarding-out regulations. It would apply in respect of all children in care regardless of the reasons for their entry into care.

Subsection (2)(a) would enable requirements to be set governing the way in which decisions are taken to return a child home on trial. That would enable requirements to be laid down, for example, to ensure that the local authority always obtained the views of the health authority where it had been concerned with the child, and that other interested persons — for example, foster parents and concerned relatives — were formally notified of the intention to return a child home and could have an opportunity to comment before any decision was put into effect. This subsection would be wide enough also to provide for some involvement of local authority members in the decision-making process, should it be thought desirable. I stress that the Government have reached no view about that at this stage.

Subsection (2)(b) would enable the regulations to cover matters such as the arrangements for the supervision by the authority of the children concerned and for securing regular monitoring of their health as well as their social well-being.

The detailed content of the regulations would, in the usual way, be the subject of consultation with local authority and other interests before they were made. It would be important to strike the right balance between providing for the desirable degree of legal requirement to support and promote good practice in all cases, and being over-prescriptive in ways which would hamper the local authority's ability to act flexibly and responsibly to the requirements of the individual circumstances. I hope that our consultations will help to get this balance right. However, I am sure that there is a sound prospect here of providing what I described earlier as a valuable statutory underpinning of good professional practice, and of reducing the possibility of standards of decision-making and practice falling below acceptable levels in any individual cases.

The Government accordingly believe that regulations to govern return home on trial can play a positive and useful role in improving the prospects both of improved child protection and positive work for rehabilitation. In the Government's view, this is the right way ahead, rather than seeking an increased role for the courts in local authority arrangements of individual cases.

I speak in favour of amendments Nos. 1 and 13, which leave out the existing clauses 1 and 2 respectively, and of amendments Nos. 30 and 31, which provide for the new clause to come into force by order made by statutory instrument. I do not wish to take up the time of the House by discussion of new clause 7, which seems to suffer from the same objections as clauses 1 and 2, or the other amendments bracketed with it which concern the existing clauses 1 and 2, which I hope the House will decide to drop. I commend new clause 5 to the House.

Mr. Walters: Any hon. Member who has followed the need for legislation is anxious to see the introduction of speedy comprehensive legislation. The Minister referred to it and said that it would come soon. I believe what he says, and hope that it will come very soon. We shall follow the progress with much interest.

I greatly regret that the Minister's new clause will negate and replace the original clause 1, although the scope of that clause was considerably redefined and restricted in Committee. I still believe, as do many hon. Members from all parts of the House, that the reintroduction of the magistrates court to review in certain limited and specific cases, and only when the magistrates making the original care order had so decreed, the decision taken by a local authority to return a child in care to the home from which it had been removed by court order on grounds of cruelty, neglect and moral danger, would have had a significant and beneficial effect. It would have introduced an experienced body of people, detached from the case under consideration, to review a decision taken by a group of people closely associated and involved, and, on certain occasions, too closely involved, both with the child and all members of its family.

I remain convinced that such a review by a judicial body detached from the in-house atmosphere of the decision taken by social workers would have been salutary. Moreover, in a small but significant number of cases, it would have provided an important additional safeguard for the child, although I accept that in some other cases, perhaps more numerous, it might have slowed the process of the return of the child.

In Committee my hon. Friend the Minister and the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) were the only two Members present to vote against the clause. However, despite the sympathetic hearing given to me and some of my hon. Friends by the Minister and Secretary of State, we failed in our efforts to persuade his Department.

I also had to take account of the fact that, although I received widespread popular backing for the measure, the wholehearted support and valuable assistance of the Family Law Bar Association, and, in private, the support of a number of senior judges, the Law Society and several other organisations concerned with child welfare did not accept the strength and validity of our argument about magistrates courts. Perhaps I may say how much the Bill owes to the enormous work and help given by the Family Law Bar Association, particularly by Mr. Robert Johnson, QC and Mr. James Holman.

There is a certain illogicality in accepting that magistrates should make the original court order which places a child in care, and the need recently announced by the Lord Chancellor for expanding training for magistrates dealing with care orders, but not accepting their competence to deal with the limited number of cases to which I have referred. Perhaps the daughter of the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) will agree with that. Logical or not, that was the position that my supporters and I had to face. Therefore, we agreed that it would be sensible in the circumstances to accept the Government's amendments, thus preserving other valuable proposals in the Bill.

Although more limited and different in character, the proposals in the Government's new clause provide useful additions to the present state of the law which will considerably strengthen the protection of children at risk within the existing parameters.

Although the clause introduced by the Government differs substantially from the proposals which I envisaged when drafting the original clause, I am wholly satisfied that a considerable improvement will have been achieved as a result of its introduction. Therefore, I welcome it.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): I speak as a lay person on the Bill, but I wish to make a number of points.

First, I congratulate the hon. Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters) on the hard and sincere work which he has done on the Bill and on his attitude towards it, which was illustrated by his speech. I can hardly wait for the family courts which the Minister has promised us. They are a major step forward, and I hope that the Minister's deeds will be as good as his words because those courts are the essential missing link.

I am particularly glad that grandparents and others in the family will come within the Bill's provisions. I believe that the new clause will give force to making provision for accommodation for children. After all, they are our primary concern. But there is also provision for parents, guardians and friends to be involved in proper consultation and supervision.

12.30 pm

We are discussing this issue because authorities often inadvertently neglect their responsibilities. I would hesitate to say that we are talking about only a few cases. There are probably more than we know about, and many cases probably exist under the surface and do not come to light. If new clause 5 means improved supervision, and that we can reach some of those cases under the surface, we will have made a substantial step forward.

The guidelines are being laid down, and the Secretary of State will impose requirements on local authorities to ensure that they follow them. If that too means the more effective supervision of children, I welcome that step and recognise it as an improvement to the Bill.

Mr. Lawrence: I rise to oppose the new clause and its attendant amendments, and to voice my strong objection to the Government's effective decimation of an eminently sensible, necessary and widely supported Bill, which I have had the privilege of sponsoring. It is widely supported not only in the House but in the country.

I do not blame my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters) for accepting the situation. If he had not done so, the entire Bill would have been lost, and saving something good is better than losing everything good. Those of us who are concerned about child welfare and the need to stop Jasmine Beckford-type cases recurring greatly appreciate the fact that my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury has chosen this subject for his Bill from among many other important subjects for legislation. He has, moreover, pursued the Bill with great skill and determination.

But I do blame the Government for what is, in effect, a craven surrender to the pressure of the social workers' lobby. As a result, a measure will be rejected that might otherwise have slightly but intelligently extended the rule of law. Both these effects are as unlikely manifestations of the Government of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister as it is possible to imagine.

Mr. Whitney: Does my hon. and learned Friend believe that the Law Society has been recruited by what he describes as the social workers' lobby? Can he explain the role of the magistrates in the Jasmine Beckford case? Was he happy with their role then, and does he believe that it justifies his case now?

Mr. Lawrence: I shall mention the magistrates shortly. However, my hon. Friend the Minister is quite right—I bracket the Law Society with the Government for their craven surrender to the pressures of the social workers' lobby.

Ms. Harman: In his list of those craven people who have surrendered to the social workers' lobby, does the hon. and learned Gentleman include the Association of County Councils, the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, the Justices Clerks' Society, the Magistrates Association, the Children's Legal Centre, the Law Society, the Association of Directors of Social Services and numerous other organisations? Have they, too, suddenly and most uncharacteristically been led by the nose by social workers?

Mr. Lawrence: The social welfare workers' organisations are very persuasive. They have considerable influence over local authorities, because they are advised by social services officers. Social services officers have close and necessary liasion on a day-to-day basis with social workers. It should come as no surprise to the hon. Lady that a few people who feel strongly about an issue and who are in close day-to-day contact with those who have to take the wider decisions can influence them. We all know that that happens, and it has clearly happened in this case.

I object to what the Government are doing for four reasons. First, what they are doing is contrary to the wishes of the majority of our constituents—the very people who sent us to Parliament. They trust the courts but they do not always trust social workers. They admire and value the dedication of social workers, as we all do, but they do not always trust them to operate without adequate supervision and control. They do not trust them to act without proper control because they read about cases such as that of Jasmine Beckford. There are rules and regulations, a framework for action and a structure for adequate supervision and yet, left to the devices of the social workers, these poor babies and children are abused and their lives destroyed.

That is because the system as it exists is inadequately supervised and controlled. That may be because social workers are under extreme pressure through the size of their caseload — some people are not able to make proper judgments when they are under supreme pressure. Or it may be because they become friendly with, close to, sympathetic to and committed to the families concerned. I do not blame them for that, for anyone would do so in any circumstances. However, it means that the system as it has hitherto operated has been shown to be inadequate, and gravely and tragically inadequate in some instances.

The people support the idea that there is a need for the court to supervise social workers' actions. That is not because the court left to itself would know best. As the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) said, the court would not have the necessary experience, despite all the training programmes, to make decisions on its own. However, the courts would make decisions on the advice of social workers, tested by others who have representations to make, and it would act as an objective filter, a protection or a final test, before potentially harmful and risky decisions were taken.

I believe that that is what the people understand to be the function of the magistrates court in child welfare cases. I believe that the people wanted a Bill to take account of that. That is why I think that the Government are going contrary to the people's wishes.

Secondly, what the Government are doing is contrary to the wishes of the House, which on 31 January granted a Second Reading to a Bill which contained the very provision that is now being snuffed out. The very essence of the original Bill was to give the magistrates court which made the care order the power to decide whether the child, the subject of the care order, should be returned to parents whose behaviour has resulted in the state's protection to the child being given in the first place.

When the Government first showed signs of beginning to crumble at the behest of the care organisations and the social welfare workers' lobby in Committee—and the Law Society, for which I hold no brief, financial or otherwise—my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury offered a compromise — always look for the compromise. My hon. Friend offered a sensible compromise that had the effect that cases would be referred to the magistrates court if the magistrate who made the original care order stipulated that that should happen before the child was allowed home. The good sense of that compromise was that it ensured that in the most worrying cases magistrates could reserve to themselves the right to reconsider the case.

The Government rejected even that compromise. As a result, they had to suffer two indignities. The first indignity was that of being defeated on a vote by their own supporters, who were reflecting the will of the House on Second Reading. The second indignity was having as their only supporter the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman)—as bizarre a union between my hon. Friend the Minister and the hon. Lady as it is possible to conceive of in this astonishing place. By overruling the Committee's decision today, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State is clearly going against the wishes of the House.

My third objection to the Government's emasculation of the Bill is that they are concentrating almost total power, subject only to some relatively small although perhaps important improvements that my hon. Friend is to make, in the hands of the social workers. The Government have done this, despite the fact that in a few but nevertheless important cases social workers have been found wanting. That is why, alone, I believe among Government Back-Benchers, I went into the Lobby in support of new clause 1 because it gave to the courts the power to consider all matters with a little more care and thoroughness.

If the social worker lobby had accepted its errors and taken full responsibility to purge its lapses by a self-regulating reform of the system, perhaps one could have had more confidence in it. However, in the Jasmine Beckford case, some of the social workers tried to blame what they did on the juvenile court that had made the care order. In his hardly completely objective or unbiased report, Mr. Louis Blom-Cooper said that they were misled by the chairman of the court having said that it was hoped that the child would be returned—

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Will my hon. and learned Friend give way?

Mr. Lawrence: Perhaps my hon. Friend will allow me to finish this point. If the people that we are about to trust with unfettered power and judgment cannot recognise that a statement from the chairman of a bench was no more than a gesture of long-term hope and optimism, the court having taken the child away from its parents, it cannot fill us with much confidence about the judgment of social workers.

It is manifestly clear that on that occasion the Willesden juvenile court said that the child must go into care, that the social workers would give the matter their urgent, continuing attention and that one day it was hoped that things would be better and the child would be able to return home. That is not the same as saying that the child must be returned at the earliest possible moment, perhaps to be put at risk, without considering whether the parents were fitted enough to have the child back, since they had been responsible for the damage to the child that resulted in the care order. For social workers, or anybody speaking for them, to say that it was not really their fault because the court had given a strong indication that at the earliest possible moment Jasmine Beckford should be returned to her home was a distortion of any moderate and objective reading of the situation.

The social worker organisation is wonderful, but it needs to be controlled, like any other organisation that is closely connected with the wrongdoing section of our society. The same applies to a probation officer when he gives evidence in court. However many armed robberies there may have been, or however many serious assaults may have been committed, a very responsible probation officer can usually be found to say, "Poor fellow, he had a bad childhood and he has a bad past. He is trying to put it all behind him, but he lost his temper. The proper sentence is to put him under care, where we can keep an eye on him." We understand why probation officers sometimes come to that conclusion, but it brings home to those of us who are involved in the law the necessity for another body to make an objective judgment over and above the opinion of a witness that is so committed to the individual concerned that their judgment may for the time being be clouded as far as the wider interests of society or the particular interests of the child are concerned. After all, social workers cannot talk to very young children. They cannot say to the baby of one or two years, "Would you like to go back to your parents?" They hear only one side of the story, and it is very difficult to assume that always, in every case, even the best-meaning social worker will not make a misjudgment.

Of course social workers do not like to have their empire interfered with—nobody likes that. That is one of the forces of behaviour with which we incessantly come to grips in this place. That is all the more reason why we should be careful before we accord to them the absolute powers as this emasculated Bill now more or less does. Social workers want to keep their power—the question is whether it is wise to let them.

My final objection to what the Government are doing is that their stated justifications seem to be without much substance. It is said that the social workers are more professional than the lay magistrates in child care. That is true, and if the Bill gave to the courts the power to examine, check and filter before deciding to return the child to the parents' care, with no part played by the social worker, I should not support it. However, we are talking about the court acting on the advice of the social worker and after testing that advice against other people's representation, and the court applying its objective experience and good sense to the problem.

It was said in a letter to The Times of 19 March 1986 by Mr. Blom-Cooper, who conducted the panel of inquiry into the Jasmine Beckford case:

> "In our view, the experience of Jasmine Beckford's death —and some others—is that magistrates in juvenile courts lack the necessary professionalism to be able to make the difficult judgments which have to balance the risk of future abuse against the need to reunite families."

If it is not too technical for magistrates to decide whether a child should be taken away in the first place, why is it too technical for magistrates to be able to decide whether the child should be returned to the parents? My hon. Friend the Minister said that that point is a misunderstanding of the mysteries of the child care world and what it is about. That is manifest nonsense—it is gobbledegook to protect empires. There is no substance in the criticisms that magistrates are technically incapable of making the second part of the decision once they are capable of making the first part.

It is then said that the Bill that was given a Second Reading would mean delays before a child properly returnable to his parents could be allowed so to do. However, if there are delays it will be because it is better to be careful, thorough and safe than to be sorry. It may be that there would be delays, although there are shorter delays in the magistrates courts than in the High Court, and that the magistrates courts delays can be speeded up. A priority could be given to cases of reconsideration of a care order. It is not necessary that such a case should go to the end of every list, and that one should have to wait for two, three or four months before the matter is reconsidered, but it is conceded that there will be delays. If those delays lead to thorough and careful reconsideration they will be well worth having.

It is said by some that the Bill with its original clauses 1 and 2 is a piecemeal change in the law and therefore bad. I agree that reforming the law in a piecemeal way is not ideal. Even the Minister agreed with that. Some of the Bill's opponents say that it is better to wait for comprehensive reform of the child welfare law than to tinker. If they wait for comprehensive change, they have a long wait coming. I asked the Minister earlier whether he could guarantee that such legislation would be introduced within the lifetime of this Parliament. He could not give that guarantee. Still less can he guarantee that such comprehensive changes will come in the lifetime of the next Parliament, or of the Parliament after that.

We have been waiting for years for family courts. We have been waiting for years for comprehensive legislation. Since we must wait for years and years for the comprehensive, we must do the piecemeal. We never object to that. Most of the Government's legislation is piecemeal. The argument that it is better not to have the piecemeal but to wait indefinitely for the comprehensive might end in the deaths of more Jasmine Beckfords throughout the country. That is wholly and utterly undesirable.

The Government's action in effectively killing the substance of the Bill has saddened me because it has been done with little or no justification. I forbear from dividing the House only because that would take up valuable time which my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) might need for his important and widely supported Bill and because I have a feeling that not sufficient hon. Members are here to ensure that the Bill survives if we divide against it.

I hope that the Government will have second thoughts and that if they do not have second thoughts of their own volition the noble Lords in another place will have second thoughts for them. If they do, a measure that has the support, not only of the House of Commons on Second Reading, but of the people in the country, a sensible, wise and intelligent improvement in the law will be restored and a measure that has the support of the whole House of Commons will go on to the statute book. I hope that the original measure is not yet wholly dead.

Mr. Mikardo: The hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) has a well-deserved reputation as a doughty fighter in the House, in the courts and in other forums. Today he engaged—it was quite a performance —in two separate civil wars. He engaged in a civil war between hon. Members on the Government Benches and in a civil war between various eminent people and various branches of the legal profession. I do not wish to interfere in any of those quarrels, certainly not in the quarrel between the stratospheric lawyers. I am a mere mortal, groping around in the foothills. Who am I to pass judgment upon the legal immortals sitting at the top of Mount Olympus?

I was puzzled by one part of the hon. and learned Member's speech. He began and ended by telling us what the people of the country want. I wondered what his authority was for saying that. I wondered whether he conducted a referendum and how he took the census. We all tend to judge subjectively from what we hear in our constituencies and at our surgeries.

I have heard a lot of criticism of social workers in relation to child care cases. However, I have heard many more of my constituents complaining about the behaviour of the courts. In both cases, no doubt, their views were affected by subjective considerations. So I reckon that I do not know what the people want, and that the hon. and learned Gentleman does not know either. It was uncharacteristically pretentious for him to pretend that he does.

Unlike the hon. and learned Member for Burton, I believe that the new clause improves the Bill. It still has some defects, but it will be better for the inclusion of the clause. If I had any reservations about voting for the Third Reading of the original Bill, I have few, if any, about voting for the amended version.

I agree with almost everything that the Minister said, but one passage worried me. I am not sure that I heard him aright, because he was galloping along at a fair old pace. He reminded me of a colt running its first race in a five furlong maiden on hard going. However, if I did not misunderstand the Minister, he cast doubt on whether any say in these matters should be given to the elected members of a local authority who serve on the social services committee. If the Minister said that, I disagree with him.

I said earlier that I have great regard for the overwhelming majority of social workers and directors of social services, but we must not get away from the principle that all local authority officers, like all officers of Government Departments, must be subject to the supervision and control of the elected representatives of the people. Otherwise, we shall slip out of being a democracy and into being a bureacracy.

Eighteen amendments have been selected for debate with the new clause. My hon. Friend the Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) and I are responsible for seven of those amendments, but if the first—to delete clause 1—is accepted, the other six will fall, so I shall not waste the time of the House by referring to them, except to say that the fact that it was possible reasonably to table so many amendments to a single clause demonstrates that the drafting of that clause was defective. I join the Minister in saying farewell to it without pangs of regret.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo). I have much more sympathy for his judgment on these matters than for his judgment on the views expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill). I should like to feel that the hon. Gentleman's judgments on those two issues are not related.

I have great sympathy with the arguments of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) who put the case for those of us who felt strongly in Committee that clause 1 should remain in the Bill. However, I take issue with what my hon. and learned Friend said about the responsibilities of social workers and the way in which they conducted themselves.

The British Association of Social Workers was among the first to come forward with a detailed and rigorous code of practice for social workers in child abuse cases. It included not pious words, but ways of managing and enforcing the practice set out in the code.

Some of us felt extremely strongly about the court that had had a part to play in the difficult decision to return to his home the child who had already been subjected to injury, abuse or moral danger in his home. We felt that the matter should go back before the court for approval. We did so for a number of reasons. I acknowledge that we failed to convince not only the Government but the many well-meaning voluntary organisations which play a part in influencing public opinion. Perhaps we must take some responsibility for not having worked harder to explain our reasons and thinking behind the steps we took.

I accept the concern about delays. I agree with my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton that, if there is a will, there is a way, and that the problem can be overcome. I am concerned about the cut-off period of seven days. A child can be returned home up until seven days without returning to court. It has been put to me that the increase takes place gradually. A child who has been going home regularly for two, three or four days may decide that he wants to stay for seven days. In that event, the court has to give approval. I recognise that parents have weight in that respect. Approval would have to be obtained from the court if older children at boarding school want to go home during the holidays. I can see the sense in that.

I find it difficult to understand why the Government were unable to agree to the court setting conditions for the return home. In the review of child care law, great weight was put on the desirability of enhancing a supervision order so that requirements set down by the court can be made in the supervision order. For example, the supervisor should be informed of the child's address, the supervisor should have access to the child, the child should be medically examined, the child should comply with the supervisor's directions to attend at specified places for specified activities, the child should receive medical and psychiatric treatment where necessary, and the child should comply with directions on education.

That recommendation of the child care law review would allow great intervention of the court in the future treatment of a child. It has been suggested that half a loaf is better than no loaf at all and that, if we can move some way at this stage, perhaps when we come forward with comprehensive proposals there will be greater scope for encouraging the court's intervention.

There is another area in which I feel the court makes a valuable contribution. Too much is made of the Beckford case in the sense that there were faults on all sides. Of course, the magistrate should never have said, "We hope that you will be reunited," or whatever. That was straightforward bad practice. I am pleased that the Lord Chancellor is setting up a training scheme for juvenile court magistrates. It has been made abundantly clear that the magistrates' advice was unwanted and unuseful.

One cannot help but say that the social worker involved in the case failed to see the child on her own. One cannot fulfil one's parental obligations as the representative of a local authority if one fails to see the child for whom one is discouraging those responsibilities alone.

I believe that it would be of value to have an independent hearing prior to the child returning home. I accept that we have to find different ways of achieving that. It would be an independent element hearing all the evidence and information. I shall make a few comments on the way in which that can be achieved.

Mr. Lawrence: My hon. Friend has put her finger on the real value of a court. The first question that a court would have asked in the Jasmine Beckford case was, "When did you last see the child at the home?" The answer would have been, "I have not seen the child at the home." It is inconceivable that the court would then have allowed Jasmine Beckford to go home to her parents until the matter had been looked into further. My hon. Friend has put her finger on a wonderful example of the value of the judicial process as a test.

Mrs. Bottomley: If my hon. and learned Friend will bear with me, my understanding is that the child had been seen before she returned home. The incident occurred when the child was at home under the care order. If it were a condition that the child attended a medical examination, that would ensure that the child was seen. A court hearing would have the value of ensuring that there was a thorough reappraisal of the history of the case, the factors concerned and the personalities involved.

We are being encouraged to move down the line of regulations. I believe that there is a need for an independent element. It is abundantly clear that a case or review conference cannot be chaired by a person with management responsibility for the person implementing the decision. It cannot be chaired by the supervisor of the social worker concerned. A person with direct management responsibility for the key worker would not be able to separate himself from resource issues and many other local variables.

A person with a supervisory responsibility for the work involved would be subject to exactly the same procedure identified by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton—great emotional identification with the family, which could sometimes cloud his judgment. We have all identified the fact that that emotional identification with and feeling for the family is one of the best tools for helping the family to improve and get over its difficulties. We should not regard it as distinctly unprofessional.

I am extremely wary about any suggestion that the independent element on the review should be an elected representative of the local authority. I am deeply concerned about recent reports of too much political interference of the most destructive sort in social work practice. We all know about cases in which racial issues have become involved, global aspirations about racial values applied and social workers questioned about particular cases. That is not helpful.

The only aspect which we are not covering in any way is what the parents make of the events and their responsibilities and whether they feel that they have been given a fair hearing. If I had an overall critcism of the voluntary organisations which have responded to the Bill, it would be that they seem to have little understanding of the perplexity of many parents about the way in which decisions are made behind closed doors by do-gooders who, in the parents' view, have already made up their minds. A court hearing on this vital decision would, first, make the parents realise that all the issues had been considered fully and fairly and, secondly, spell out to the parents their responsibilities and the seriousness of the matter.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, in bringing forward the regulations, will consider the way in which parents will be formally addressed—whether there is to be a formal meeting in the local authority's offices, whether there is to be a document setting out the details in writing and whether an official will have the job of emphasising the seriousness of the matter. In some senses, such a formal meeting would have the weight of a court hearing with the parents. It would be similar to police cautioning in the juvenile bureau. Some ceremony would be attached to the procedures. I believe that that would be helpful.

We are being encouraged to follow what one would have to call boarding-in regulations. We shall have to see how they, together with the review of child care law, develop concrete proposals. I regret that the Bill has not been able to move in the direction that we had hoped. I also recognise that that is apparently because we failed to convince a great number of others who are as anxious as ourselves to see that child care practice and provision for abused children should be improved.

Ms. Richardson: I want to speak only to new clause 7 which is down in my name. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) has said, the amendments that we have down will become redundant if, as we expect, clause 1 goes. New clause 7 has a slightly different principle, but the Minister dismissed it in his closing sentence when he said that it was subject to some of the same objections as clause 1. Perhaps it is, but I confess to being a lay person and I do not know whether it is or not.

New clause 7 was drafted by the Family Rights Group which saw it as an extension of the principle contained in clause 1. The existing clause 1 gives the court the power to decide whether or not a child should be placed at home on trial. It is just and logical that the court should exercise this power following applications from families as well as from local authorities.

A common problem faced by children in families is that the local authority does not do the work which would enable the child in care to return home. Although children and parents can apply to discharge orders, the courts are understandably reluctant to discharge an order unless a child is already living at home and the process of rehabilition has been shown to work. If a care order is discharged before any rehabilitation work is started, the child will go home without any preparation and there will be little support or supervision.

The child care law review working party was also aware of this problem, as I am sure the Minister knows. As a result, it recommended that a juvenile court should be able to make orders for phased rehabilitation. We think that new clause 7 is in line with that recommendation. Although I shall not press it, I should like to place it on record that it is intended as a helpful addition to the previous clause 1 of the Bill which, we expect, will now go in favour of the Minister's new clause.

Mr. Sims: I spoke strongly on Second Reading and in Committee in support of clauses 1 and 2 and I do not propose to repeat what I said on those occasions. In any event, the arguments have been well deployed by my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters) and by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence). It is a pity that the clauses are to be dropped. They would have offered additional protection to the child and to the social worker. That is an aspect that has not been considered.

It is a pity that a number of the organisations to which my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) has referred seem to have misunderstood or misinterpreted that which my hon. Friend and his colleagues were trying to do in clauses 1 and 2. Of course, one cannot entirely ignore the strength of the recommendations that they made. I was more impressed by some of their representations than by the case advanced by my hon. Friend the Minister. I am bound to say that his arguments against the clauses did not hold up. I argued against him in Committee and will not repeat my arguments here. He says they introduce the principle of court involvement in these decisions. That is exactly what they do and exactly what we are arguing there should be. Again, I do not need to repeat all the arguments because we have heard them all in this debate. There is perhaps a philosophical difference between us about how cases of this sort should be heard.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton spoke of the Bill being decimated. I would go further and say that the heart is being torn from it. I admire and commend the gracious manner in which my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury has taken the way in which the Bill has been treated. The heart having been torn from it, the transplant is modest, but at least it is better than losing the Bill altogether. The proposals that have been made are an improvement on the present situation. While I accept them, I do not do so with great enthusiasm.

[Mr. Sims]

1.15 pm

Ms. Harman: It is right that clause 1 should be deleted and that new clause 5 should be inserted. That will improve the Bill. None the less, I am unhappy about the situation in which we are discussing new clause 5. The measure is small when one considers the comprehensive framework of child care law. My criticism is that we are discussing it rather than the comprehensive review. However, that is not a criticism of the hon. Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters), by any stretch of the imagination, but it is a criticism of the Government. It is not the fault of the hon. Member for Westbury that he has not introduced legislation giving effect to the child care law review. As a private Member, he is not able to do so. But it is wrong that we should be discussing only the returning home of a child or regulations on accommodation at home of a child in care. We are not allowed to decide on access, revocation or discharge of orders. That has to wait. If the Government had had the political will, they could have brought comprehensive child care legislation before the House, but they simply lack the political will to do so.

I fear very much that nothing we have heard from the Minister gives us any reason to hope that we shall get a child care law review in the lifetime of this Parliament. That will be a great disappointment to all those who want to see a comprehensive improvement. It will also be a great disappointment to all the organisations and people who have worked so hard to achieve a consensus to enable the Government to bring forward a comprehensive Bill. The piecemeal criticism is not a criticism of the hon. Member for Westbury or his Bill, but it is a criticism of the Government.

I am also disappointed that we are discussing new clause 5 and the deletion of clause 1 in the context of the old juvenile court system that we now have, not in the context of family courts. If we had a system of family courts, I do not think that there would be objections to greater involvement of the courts in the decision whether to send a child home. But let us look at what the so-called scrutiny of the courts as currently constituted would have meant under clause 1 when considering whether to send a child home.

First, we know that there would be delays. There already are delays. The Magistrates Association and the Justices Clerks Society are absolutely certain that, without radical changes, an addition to their jurisdiction in that way would cause delay. We heard in Committee and on Second Reading of the real problems that delay can cause. It is not just a technical matter, but concerns the breakdown of relationships during the period when the child is in care.

There is also a problem of continuity. Extra bits of jurisdiction would be given to the juvenile court in relation to family matters, and there might be a different bench each time one comes before the court. One must also consider the lack of experience of a juvenile court because as the jurisdiction of those courts is currently constituted they cover a whole range of matters. However well-intentioned they are and however great their aptitude, they will not gain the experience that will help them to give sensible scrutiny.

People have said, "If juvenile courts are experienced enough to decide to take a child into care and to decide on conditions of access, why are they not experienced enough to decide that a child should be returned home to his parents?" But when a child is taken into care or a parent applies to vary the terms on which access was granted, there are two sides to the case, so the magistrates are still operating in an adversarial system and will have brought before them the two sides of the case between which they must decide.

The trouble with clause 1 is that it deals with cases in which both parties agree. The local authority wants the child to go home, or it would not have applied to the court, and the parents want the child to come home, or it would be pointless for the local authority to bring the matter before the court. The court should consider those cases only if it can exercise an inquisitorial role. If not, all that will happen is that everyone argues on the same side and the court can only rubber-stamp the decision. The hon. and learned Member for Burton asked, "How can social workers make a sensible decision if they have heard only one side of the case?" How can magistrates in a juvenile court make a decision worth all the delay involved if they, too, will hear only one side of the case? They will hear only the local authority and the parents agreeing.

If we had the system that exists in Scotland and that is proposed under the family court, with a mixture of the adversarial and the inquisitorial approach, and with court welfare officers to go behind the unanimity of the evidence presented to the court, such extra scrutiny would be worth the delay and bureaucracy involved. But otherwise the decision would be a sham which would cause delay, confuse the lines of responsibility and provide no better scrutiny.

I regret that the new clause was not introduced in Committee. Had it been, we could have amended it so that it made sense. We have a rough idea of what it means from its title, which is

> "Regulations as to accommodation at home of children in care."

We also have a rough idea of its meaning from the Minister's explanation. But I defy anyone to understand what this means:

> "The Secretary of State may by regulations make provision as to the accommodation under the charge and control of a parent, guardian, relative or friend of children who are in the care of a local authority."

It is legal gobbledegook. Perhaps "charge and control" and other matters are mentioned in other parts of child care law, but that is no excuse for introducing an extremely complicated and muddled new clause to deal with a simple concept. Efforts should be made to ensure that new measures can be understood in their own right and that we need not call upon the services of, for example, the hon. and learned Member for Burton before we can understand what we are discussing.

The hon. Member for Westbury and the hon. and learned Member for Burton talked about public support for the Bill. The hon. Member for Westbury said that it had widespread public support. I agree that there is widespread public support for something to be done about the law and that there is widespread anxiety about what has happened recently to children in care. But that does not mean that there is widespread support for the means by which the Bill tries to achieve those aims. We should acknowledge the feeling that the Government should recognise the widespread pressure for a comprehensive child care law Bill and for the introduction of family courts. I agree that that public opinion exists and that the Government should respond to it by doing what they have failed to do so far —they should guarantee to introduce within the lifetime of this Parliament a child care law review and the implementation of family courts. We would like to see both effected together because some changes in child care law cannot be supported properly without changing the forum in which they are discussed.

The hon. and learned Member for Burton talked about many organisations being led by the nose by the social workers' lobby. That is absolute garbage. The Law Society and social workers have often disagreed. The Law Society and the Legal Action Group have often disagreed. Indeed, I am sure that they disagree more than they agree. The Association of Directors of Social Services finds it easy to disagree with the Association of County Councils, as is its right, and the ACC often disagrees with the Association of Metropolitan Authorities. It is rare to find the Justices Clerks Society and the Magistrates Association agreeing with the children's legal centre.

The fact remains that all those organisations, representing everyone in the field except for the Family Law Bar Association, reached a concensus that clause 1 was wrong and would do more harm than good. It is ridiculous to suggest that somehow they have been swept up in a tide of emotion. They have all separately considered it from their point of view and reached the same conclusion. The hon. and learned Gentleman should accept that, instead of suggesting that they have all abdicated their responsibility and been led by the nose.

I think I heard the Minister suggest that the Government would produce a pamphlet on working together on child abuse directed at encouraging agencies to work together to deal with child abuse. Obviously, agencies must co-operate to ensure that a problem which is recognised in one part of the system does not go unrecognised in another part which might lead to a wrong decision. Obviously, there must be co-operation and planning on an inter-agency basis.

I venture to suggest that health visitors, social workers and teachers in Southwark will probably regard a booklet on working together on child abuse with some degree of cynicism. The ability to work together on a sensible basis requires that one does one's job properly and liaises with other organisations. At present the pressures on the Health Service mean that people leave hospital much sooner than would be the case if they convalesced there. That has increased enormously the pressure on health visitors. The deteriorating housing conditions caused by cuts in capital spending and rate support grant to local authorities, and increasing joblessness, which has increased poverty, has increased pressure on both social workers and health visitors.

A key element in the inability of social workers to respond properly to increased pressures and demands has related to social services spending. The increase in spending on social services was only 0·5 per cent. in the last financial year. Even the Department of the Environment recognises that, just to stand still, there must be an annual increase of 2·5 per cent.

If the ability of health visitors, teachers and social workers to do their job is undermined by a lack of increased spending with which to meet the growing and very real demands on their services, they will not want to be told that the problem can be solved by a booklet on working together on child abuse. Many of them would see that as yet another cynical public relations exercise on the part of a Government, who could really do something about child abuse. For example, they could introduce a comprehensive Bill on child care law or reform the court system by introducing a family court, yet they have singularly failed to do so. They could ensure that the Health Service, housing, and social services have adequate resources. I look forward with interest to the booklet, but I should also like the Government to take some real action. Instead of using the Bill as an important spur to action over an issue about which there is immense public concern, they have used it and the booklet as an excuse for inaction.

1.30 pm

Mr. Whitney: The hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) has taken the opportunity to make her usual plethora of groundless and baseless accusations against the Government and our record of achievement. She has suggested that we do not spend enough on the Health Service. But if a 24 per cent. increase in spending on health is not enough, she must explain what would be enough, and by how much she would be willing to increase taxation. She has also suggested that local authorities do not spend enough. Yet spending is at record levels. Spending on the personal social services is also at a record level.

Ms. Harman: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Whitney: I shall not give way, as the hon. Lady had quite a fair go. She complained that nothing was being done about child care law. However, last October we launched a monumental consultation exercise. We have announced that the proposals will be published as a basis for legislation, and publication will be in the autumn. As the original consultation document was launched in October, we have moved very quickly, and I hope that the hon. Lady will have the grace to accept that.

Ms. Harman: Does the Minister accept that the amount of money going into housing via the local authority, which is the main housing authority in Southwark, has fallen drastically as a result of the Government's policies? Moreover, does he agree that the amount spent on the Health Service in Southwark, in the shape of Camberwell district authority and the Lewisham and North Southwark district health authority, has also fallen drastically? Does the hon. Gentleman accept that?

Mr. Whitney rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I hope that we can now return to the subject of children in care.

Mr. Whitney: I apologise for being led astray by the hon. Member for Peckham, but when she has seen the impact of the Resource Allocation Working Party and the amount of money devoted to the provision of her constituents in Southwark, I hope that she will understand how favoured they are. But it is typical that yet again the hon. Lady thinks that the answer is to take more and more money from the taxpayer. The answer in most of these areas must be to improve performance and procedures, and that is the object of the new clause. I am confident that that aim will be achieved.

I am grateful for the comments—or at least most of them — of my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley). I recognise that the content of the consultation process should ensure that the procedures that finally emerge in the regulations take account of the issues that she raised. The home-on-trial scheme, for example, is an important step and should be recognised as such. That is an area in which we are determined to continue to improve practice. My hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters) made a difficult decision when he decided to co-operate with the Government and agree to a very different provision being inserted in the Bill, but I believe that the new clause will be a useful step forward.

I shall clarify my position on local authority members and whatever role they may play. The hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) suggested that I spoke rather quickly when I last intervened, and I plead guilty to the charge. I was trying to give other hon. Members the chance to participate in the debate. The subsection that the Government have proposed would be wide enough to provide for some involvement of local authority members in the decision-taking process should this be thought desirable. I hope that that clarification will place me on the side of my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West. I must stress that the Government have not yet reached a view on the involvement of local authority members.

Mr. Mikardo: The Minister has used the phrase "should this be thought desirable." Thought by whom to be desirable?

Mr. Whitney: As I explained in my earlier intervention, the framing of the regulations will be preceded by consultation. I am sure that must be right in this difficult area.

I do not want to detain the House for long because I believe that all the ground has been covered, much of it on Second Reading. However, I must refer to the speech of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence), who was rightly described by the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar as a doughty fighter. What we had this morning from my hon. and learned Friend was more in the nature of an intervention by a knight errant or a Don Quixote because he appeared to be tilting at windmills. He has conjured a phantasma out of the air——

Mr. Lawrence rose——

Mr. Whitney: —a phantasma that the Government are cowering against an attack by the serried ranks of mobilised social workers. It appears that others are cowering as well as the Government, including the Law Society, the Association of County Councils, the directors of social services, the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, the Justices' Clerks Society and the Magistrates' Association. That is the windmill at which my hon. and learned Friend, Don Quixote from Burton, seems to be tilting.

Mr. Lawrence: I thought for a moment that my hon. Friend was calling the Government a phantasma. I would reject that description immediately.

Mr. Whitney: I am most grateful. We are now clear between us where the phantasma is established. I hope that my hon. and learned Friend will accept that he is wrong.

I must say in somewhat more serious terms to my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) that I reject his argument that the associations — I shall not go through the list again—did not understand the original proposals. That is not a very tenable position. It is going a little far to suggest that the Law Society and the Government, no less, should not understand the proposals. I was tempted to take up the argument about magistrates but I shall not do so.

It should be accepted that we all share certain objectives. My hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst spoke of a philosophical difference between us, but I do not believe there is. Perhaps the difference between us turns on practicalities in determining how best we can ensure that terrible mistakes are not made. Mistakes will be made from time to time. In the Jasmine Beckford case, terrible mistakes were made by many people, including the magistrates.

The Government believe that the way forward is to continue to improve the way in which cases are dealt with. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West is well aware of that and recognises that that is the way forward. We reject the piecemeal approach when it is in the wrong direction. We do not believe that to go back to the court at this stage in a particular case is the correct way to approach the matter. The airy-fairy dismissive approach, "There may be the odd delay, but does that really matter?" is unjust not only to the particular case that is under consideration but because of the effect that it would have on all child care cases.

We have ranged widely on a number of occasions over these issues. I hope very much that the House will accept new clause 5.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 6

APPEALS

'(1) In subsection (12) of section 2 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1969 (right of relevant infant to appeal against order made in care proceedings) after the words "the relevant infant" there shall be inserted the words "or, in a case where a parent or guardian of his was a party to the care proceedings by virtue of an order under section 32A of this Act, the parent or guardian" and for the word "him" there shall be substituted the words "the relevant infant".

(2) In section 16(8) of that Act (appeals by the supervised person against supervision orders and dismissal of application to discharge such orders) after the words "the supervised person" there shall be inserted the words "or, in a case where a parent or guardian of his was a party to the proceedings on an application under the preceding section by virtue of an order under section 32A of this Act, the parent or guardian".

(3) After subsection (4) of section 21 of that Act (variation and discharge of care orders) there shall be inserted—

"(4A) In a case where a parent or guardian is a party to the proceedings on an application under subsection (2) of this section by virtue of an order under section 32A of this Act, the parent or guardian may appeal to the Crown Court against the making of a supervision order or the refusal of the court to discharge the care order.".

(4) In section 22(4) of that Act (power of High Court, on application of person to whom interim order relates, to discharge order) after the word "relates" there shall be inserted the words ",or, in a case where the order was made in proceedings to which a parent or guardian was a party by virtue of an order under section 32A of this Act, of the parent or guardian,".'.—[Mr. Whitney.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Whitney: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 17, in page 3, line 27, leave out clause 3.

No 18, in clause 3, page 3, line 38, leave out subsection (2) and insert—

'(2) The following subsection shall be substituted for section 16(8) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1969—

"16.—(8) Any party to the proceedings may appeal to a Judge of the High Court Family Division against—

(a) any order made under the preceding section except an order containing only provisions to which the supervised person consented in pursuance of the preceding section;

(b) the dismissal of an application under that section to discharge a supervision order".

(3) The following subsection shall be substituted for section 21(4) of the Children and Young Persons Act 1969—

"21.—(4) Any party to the proceedings may appeal to a Judge of the High Court Family Division against an order under subsection (1) of this section or a supervision order made in pursuance of subsection (2) of this section or the granting or dismissal of an application under the said subsection (2).".'

No. 19, in page 3, line 38, leave out 'Section 6' and insert 'sections 6 and 12(5)'.

No. 20, in page 4, line 6, leave out subsection (4).

No. 32, in clause 7, page 5, line 34, leave out '3' and insert '[Appeals]'.

Mr. Whitney: This new clause amends the Children and Young Persons Act 1969 to allow a parent or guardian who was a party to care and related proceedings by virtue of amendments Nos. 22 and 23 to have a right of appeal to the Crown court.

Subsection (4) also amends the 1969 Act to allow a parent or guardian who was a party to the proceedings in which an interim order was made to apply to the High Court to have that interim order discharged. In this clause the term "guardian" means not legal guardian but refers to the definition in the Children and Young Persons Act 1933 of any person who in the opinion of the court has for the time being the charge of or control of the child.

In Committee I said that clause 3 presented considerable difficulties. The implications of the clause would bring with it unacceptable resource costs in extra High Court judges and legal aid, but I hoped to bring forward amendments which my hon. Friend would support. I had in mind appeal rights for local authorities and for parents when a separate representation order has been made, in each case to the Crown court as at present. In the event, in agreement with my hon. Friend who had hoped we could at this stage agree to transfer to the High Court, I have limited the increased appeal rights to parents. This will close an unfortunate gap which has emerged in recent cases when the appointment of a guardian ad litem after a separate representation order deprived the parents of the opportunity to appeal on behalf of the child. The House will agree that there is an exceptional case for parents where they are made parties to be able to appeal on their own behalf in such cases. There was a case, quite widely known as the "brittle bones" case, raised in the House by my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart). In other cases they can still appeal on behalf of the child.

I am also speaking to amendments Nos. 17, to leave out clause 3, and 32 which covers commencement of the new clause 6. Amendments 18, 19 and 20 would fall if the House accepts amendment No. 17, and I have no further comment on them.

Ms. Richardson: Is the Minister able to assure me either that my points have been taken into account or that they will be looked at, since he plans to introduce other amendments?

Mr. Whitney: I understand that they will be unnecessary if amendment No. 17 and new clause 6 is agreed to.

Mr. Walters: The original clause 3 had two distinct aims: first, to enlarge the category of appellants and, secondly, to transfer the appeal from the Crown court to the family division of the High Court. I greatly regret that, despite the recommendation by the review on child care law, the Government have not found it possible to accept this second and important aim. The involvement of the Crown court in care proceedings is anomalous and widely deplored. While no assurance has been given to me, I very much hope that this will continue only for a short while longer, and that, when we have the promised major review of child care law, it will include an end to appeals to the Crown court.

1.45 pm

In the meantime, I am reluctant to be associated with any increase in appeals to the Crown court. As at the moment parents have no appeal, nor can they, unlike the local authority, take advantage or wardship, I am in support of this modest enlargement of the category of appellants proposed by the amendment.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

Clause 1

PERMISSION FOR THE RETURN OF CERTAIN CHILDREN IN CARE ETC.

Amendment made: No. 29, in page 5, line 27, at end insert—

'(2) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1) above rules of court may make provision with respect to the procedure in any proceedings to which a parent or guardian becomes a party by virtue of an order under section 32A of the Children and Young Persons Act 1969 or a grandparent becomes a party under section 32C of that Act'.—[Mr. Whitney.]

Clause 7

COMMENCEMENT

Amendments made: No. 30, in page 5, line 29, leave out subsections (1) and (2).

No. 31, in page 5, line 33, at end insert—

'(2A) Section [Regulations as to accommodation at home of children in care] above shall come into force on such date as the Secretary of State may by order made by statutory instrument appoint.'.

No. 32, in page 5, line 34, leave out '3' and insert '[Appeals]'.—[Mr. Whitney.]

Mr. Whitney: I beg to move amendment No. 33, in page 5, line 34, leave out '4 and 5', and insert 'and 4 above shall'

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 34.

Mr. Whitney: These are both technical amendments, which provide for the means by which the clause on appeal should come into force. It is intended that the measure will come in as soon as possible.

Question put and agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 34, in page 5, line 35, after 'order', insert 'made by statutory instrument'.—[Mr. Whitney.]

Mr. Whitney: I beg to move amendment No. 35, in page 5, line 37, leave out subsection (4).

This amendment removes the provision that all sections of the Bill shall come into force within one year of the Bill being passed. I assure the House that there is no lack of intent on the part of the Government. We wish to bring in the provisions of the Bill as soon as possible, but it would be wrong to insist that the Government should do all that is necessary within the inflexible provisions of the clause. We shall continue our best endeavours.

Mr. Walters: I am grateful for that assurance because I regret the presence of the amendment, which is designed to remove a long-stop provision for the implementation of the Bill. I introduced the long-stop period of one year in Committee after due discussion with officials in the Department as to a reasonable period for implementing these proposals.

I have referred, as have several other hon. Members, to the deplorable fact that parts of the Children Act 1975 were not implemented until 1985. As I have agreed to accept major compromises, I very much regret that the Government do not accept that what is now enacted should be brought into force as soon as it reasonably can be.

The proposed amendment can only raise fears about the Government's intentions. I am a little reassured by what the Minister says but I should be grateful to him if he repeated his assurance as clearly as possible. I hope that he can assure us that the Government genuinely intend to implement the relatively modest package, which they have now accepted, as soon as possible.

Mr. Mikardo: I should have thought that the Minister could have given us something better. I understand that he cannot fix a firm date and that this is only a long stop. The Minister says that the legislation will be implemented as soon as possible. He should be able to give us some idea of when he expects the measure to come into force. Saying that it will be as soon as practicable is like asking, "How long is a piece of string?" The Minister owes it to the hon. Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters) to be a little more specific.

Ms. Richardson: I understand that the Law Society is a little bothered by the 12-month proposal because it foresees difficulties in putting all the procedures in place. It is not against the proposals, but it envisages problems. It will not be easy to set an absolute time. That is why I tabled a similar amendment. To set a 12-month limit is perhaps too rigid, although we hope that the Bill will be implemented as soon as possible.

Mr. Whitney: I am glad of the opportunity to enlarge upon my earlier remarks. I was seeking to truncate the debate for other reasons. I take note of the remarks made by my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters) and by the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo).

The Government certainly intend to bring the measure into effect as soon as practicable, but it would be wrong and would mislead the House if I said that we could accept an inflexible date. To do that would be rare, if not unprecedented. No Administration would accept such a provision. We must make allowance for unforeseen difficulties and changes in circumstances. I note the awful warning from my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury. We have no intention of following that pattern.

The hon. Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) referred to the Law Society. Adequate time must be allowed not only for regulations and rules to be drafted, but for consultation in the usual way before the instruments are laid and for local authority and court staff to undertake training, where appropriate. The professions concerned will also need time to assimilate the effects of the reforms and changes in procedure before they come into effect. I assure the House, and in particular my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury, that we shall make every effort to deal with the rules and advice for local authorities as quickly as possible.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 8

TRANSITIONAL PROVISIONS

Mr. Whitney: I beg to move amendment No. 36, in page 6, line 1, leave out subsections (1) and (2) and insert—

'No provision of this Act shall have effect in relation to any proceedings which were commenced before the commencement of that provision.'.

This amendment removes the transitional provisions in clause 8 which applied clause 3—appeals—to any order made in proceedings on or after commencement of the Bill even though the proceeding or hearing might have begun before the Bill came into force, and also applied clause 4—party status—and clause 5—transfer of proceedings—to proceedings which might already have begun. It substitutes a clause that any provision in the Bill should apply only to proceedings beginning after that provision came into force.

If the provisions of the Bill were to apply to proceedings already in progress when the Bill came into force there could be confusion and problems if, for instance, a grandparent applied to be joined as a party part way through a hearing. The amendment is intended to prevent any such problems arising by limiting the Bill to cases which begin after the date of commencement.

Amendment agreed to.

Order for Third Reading read.

1.55 pm

Mr. Walters: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

We have had a long Report stage and I shall not detain the House. Introducing the Bill has been a fascinating experience and it has involved an enormous amount of hard work. I thank my sponsors, from both sides of the House, for their help and support.

Taking the Bill through the House has been more difficult than I had expected, and I have not achieved as much as I had hoped. I believe that valuable proposals have been lost on the way, but, given the fact that we live in an imperfect world, I am satisfied that useful measures have been introduced and that a worthy piece of legislation will be placed on the statute book.

1.56 pm

Mr. Mikardo: I intervene briefly to congratulate the hon. Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters) on having carried the Bill this far and, if I may anticipate events, on getting Third Reading for the Bill, which will be sent off to another place where I am sure that it will be looked at as carefully as it has been here.

As I said earlier, the hon. Member for Westbury has been shabbily treated by the Government in having his Bill hijacked and turned into a de facto Government Bill, but I hope that his initiative in introducing the Bill has contributed something to hastening Government action on comprehensive legislation.

I broke a lance earlier with the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence), but I agree with him about the imprecise and unsatisfactory nature of the Minister's comments on the timing of the legislation. Under challenge from the hon. and learned Member, the Minister, like a frightened horse, shied away from giving any assurance that legislation would be brought forward in the lifetime of this Parliament.

People have been appealing for comprehensive family courts legislation for a long time. I do not blame the Minister alone. Many of his predecessors, including some Labour Ministers, are also to blame. It has been a long and sad concatenation of procrastination and it is time that it was brought to an end. If the initiative of the hon. Member for Westbury has exerted a little pressure to that end, on that ground, if on no other, he deserves the thanks of the House.

1.58 pm

Mr. Sims: I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters) on the progress that he has made in circumstances that have proved to be more difficult than he had expected. I share his disappointment that the Bill will not be leaving the House in the form that he and I would wish.

However, I hope that my hon. Friend will not underestimate what he has achieved. The new provisions on child care are an improvement and will be widely welcomed, and he has also precipitated discussion inside and outside the House on an important issue. I suspect that that would not have happened if my hon. Friend had not introduced his Bill.

The hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) said that he hoped to put pressure on the Government in other respects. There is little doubt that that has been done. It is a measure of the success of my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury that the Government's response will be recorded not only in today's Hansard but in yesterday's Hansard. In reply to a question on child care, the Secretary of State for Social Services implied that, because of pressure from my hon. Friend and others, the Government felt that we should know exactly where they stood on the question of child care and family courts. The Government's announcement is a recognition of the high profile that my hon. Friend has given to the matter.

In his reply yesterday, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made it clear that proposals on child care would be forthcoming in the autumn. He was less forthcoming about the family court proposals, other than to say that they would be made soon. My right hon. Friend did not challenge the suggestion that the proposals would be introduced in the next week or so. We have heard such promises so often that I shall believe that when I see it. In his reply, the Secretary of State said:

"Some of those commenting on the review of child care law have said that no changes to child care law should take place in advance of a family court. The Government do not accept this need to be so and continued to see advantage in not delaying desirable improvements in child care law pending possible introduction of a family court." — [Official Report, 1 May 1986; Vol. 96, c. 472.]

We are not asking the Government to delay improvements to child care law; we are asking them to accelerate the introduction of a family court. There is no reason why the two measures should not go ahead. They have been considered for some time. If the family court proposals are introduced shortly, it should be possible to consider them along with a proposed White Paper in the autumn and for the legislation on both to be considered together. One knows the difficulty of achieving co-ordination between Government Departments, but that should not be beyond the wit of man, if the political will is present in the Government.

I am sorry that the Bill will not leave the House in the form that we had hoped—I hesitate to use the aphorism about half a loaf because I think that we are getting no more than a slice—but the time that we have spent on it has been time well spent.

2.2 pm

Mr. Ken Hargreaves (Hyndburn): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters) on his success in getting the Bill through to Third Reading. It must be a satisfying achievement—one which I shall not experience with my Bill. I congratulate my hon. Friend on the work that he has done.

2.3 pm

Ms. Harman: I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters). As soon as I had had an opportunity to study the Bill carefully and to consult those who were involved outside the House, unlike the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security, I made it plain to the hon. Member for Westbury what my attitude and the Opposition's attitude would be. I am not being mealy-mouthed in saying that the hon. Gentleman used the opportunity of coming high in the ballot to focus the attention of the House on the considerable concern about the pressing issue of children in care. Unwittingly, he has carefully exposed the Government for their inaction in not bringing forward child care law legislation and legislation for the implementation of a family court.

At the outset, I was concerned about clause 1. It was important to draw the problem to the public's attention. Following the Jasmine Beckford inquiry report, and after the heated hysteria generated by some elements of the press had died down, it was important for the matter to be considered fully by the House, and on a wider basis. The hon. Member for Westbury has put the debate on child law back on to an even better keel. That of itself created a better climate in which to discuss the issues and to try to resolve the problems. That is very important.

It is worth looking briefly at the background against which children are taken into care. It is important to ensure that children are taken into care only when it is absolutely necessary and that families are broken up only when it is absolutely unavoidable. I should like to consider the background against which the reluctant decision is made by magistrates and social workers alike to take a child into care, and the necessity for that decision.

It is ironic that, although we rightly and collectively condemn mistreatment of children and are horrified, outraged and angered by parents who mistreat their children, and although we collectively feel a sense of shame at belonging to a society which includes people who abuse and even kill their children, all too often our collective sense of shame does not extend to a collective desire to support families with small children.

All too often, the spiral of problems which ends in child abuse is tied up with lack of proper public services, with bad housing and with inadequate income. That does not excuse child abuse and it is not the whole story. Despite having low incomes, bad housing and suffering a complex network of problems, many people manage to be caring, loving and good parents. Lack of day nursery places, day care facilities and decent housing and inadequate income can be the straw that breaks the camel's back and the spark that leads to child abuse in vulnerable families.

We should collectively not only have a sense of outrage but recognise that the children in families where battering takes place are the children not only of that family but of society as a whole. We all have a collective responsibility for them. It is shameful that, compared with the rest of Europe, Britain has the lowest provision of nursery classes and places for children under five. That is typical of the division of attitude between people on the continent and people in Britain. The culture of Europe is much more welcoming to and accepting of children. It recognises that they are part of the community as well as, most importantly, part of their families.

Research has shown that the children in care are the children of the poor. The Government are responsible because of the increasing number of families hit and blighted by joblessness. The problems will be exacerbated by the Social Security Bill, which will result in more families in poverty and therefore more families vulnerable to having a child taken into care. Judging by the Government's figures in the technical annex to the White Paper on social security, 100,000 low-paid families and 100,000 families in which a family member is unemployed will lose out under the legislation. Those low-paid families and unemployed families will be worse off. About 30,000 low-paid families and 10,000 families in which a member of the family is unemployed will be worse off by £5 a week or more.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady seems to be widening the debate in an unacceptable way. She should confine her remarks to the contents of the Bill.

Ms. Harman: I hope that I have shown the link between poverty and reception of children into care, and between poverty and family breakdown. Perhaps I can leave it there. We offer our congratulations to the hon. Member for Westbury on taking the opportunity to use his place in the private Members' ballot to bring before us an important issue.

2.10 pm

Mr. Whitney: Before I come to the points that I want to make, I have to say that it is a pity that throughout these difficult proceedings on a complex and sensitive matter we have been treated in almost every intervention by the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) to her standard litany of promoting her party's distorted views on the present situation. If she is interested in the problems of poverty, unemployment, homelessness and deprivation, she should think hard about how those problems would be exacerbated if her party's policies were implemented. The policies advocated by her right hon. Friends would cost an additional £24 billion. How much social deprivation would there be then?

I should also like to join in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters) on using his good fortune in the ballot to promote a Bill of such importance about a matter that is of great interest to everyone. Whatever views we have about the practicalities and the steps that would be needed, none of us underestimates the great amount of work that requires to be done to prevent child abuse. It presents a challenge to the whole of society and that is why my Department is active in this whole area. Much of the work is of a practical nature and consists of liaison between the social services inspectorate, local authorities and social services departments. The work is not headline-grabbing but nevertheless a great deal of work is being done. I can assure hon. Members that we shall continue to strive to see that the best practice in Britain, which is exceptionally good, becomes as near as possible universal.

In addition to the practical aspects, the law has a role to play. The law is not yet right and that is precisely why we launched a consultation exercise last October and we look forward to producing proposals in the autumn which will form the basis for further comprehensive legislation. I recognise the deep disappointment felt by my hon. Friend about the change in the Bill, but I hope he and our hon. Friends will accept that the Bill as it now stands will do a great deal of good and will be of benefit in this difficult area.

The new regulation-making power about "home on trial" will help to strengthen the existing arrangements for child protection, especially when it is linked to the other steps that we are taking to assist local authorities in their child abuse work, about which I have already spoken.

The new provision allowing parents to have party status where an order for separate representation of the child is made will, if the Bill becomes law, remedy what many people see as a real injustice to parents. Their present inability to appeal against a child care order is a defect and I am glad that we have the opportunity in this Bill to put it right. The measures we have achieved on the status of grandparents will be greatly appreciated by my hon. Friends. Despite their disappointment about clauses 1 and 2, I hope that my hon. Friend and his sponsors will accept that the great efforts they have put into the Bill have had a worthy outcome.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) said, I acknowledge that the wide national debate that has been generated has been a factor in our rapid digestion of the response to our working party report. There have been 200 detailed responses in this complicated area. Thus my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was able to make the announcement to the House yesterday about his proposals in the autumn.

Therefore, I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters) can look with great satisfaction on what he has achieved. I congratulate him on his Bill.

2.15 pm

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I should like to add my wholehearted support and congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters) on moving us a significant and important stage forward in the protection of children at risk.

I have been provoked to speak in defence of my hon. Friend the Minister by a naive and simplistic remark by the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman). Since 1979 there have been dramatic increases in resources for health and personal social services. But much more at the heart of the matter is the fact that, to protect children in care, social workers need professional autonomy, not political interference. I urge the hon. Lady to look in her own back yard for political interference in professional work.

With regard to the Bill, the need to rectify the position of parents and grandparents has been long overdue. I am aware of the interest in that matter of my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mr. Rhodes James).

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on the fact that there has been a sincere, thorough and thoughtful examination of improvements in and the promotion of good practice. Guidelines have been issued by his Department. I join him in his remarks about the work of the inspectorate. At some stages, some of us have wondered whether we were going fast enough, and whether the introduction of a court hearing would help to move things forward. That is borne out by the figures. Every child abuse death is a death too many and a tragic waste. The evidence is that the number of children who are seriously injured or killed has been coming down in recent years. I am sure that that has been achieved through concerted action and the maintenance of good practice. We look to the Minister to move on as fast as possible in comprehensive child care law reviews and the development of good practice.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Health Service Joint Consultative Committees (Access to Information) Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

2.17 pm

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is not my wish to delay proceedings in the House unduly, but I must seek your guidance and protection, as a custodian of the procedures of the House and guardian of the rights of Back Benchers, on a matter concerning the denial of access to information that I consider to be essential to the performance of my role as an elected representative.

I refer specifically to information relating to the report of the Advisory Committee on Irradiated and Novel Foods, which was published on 10 April, and requires the response of the Department by the end of July. I consider that information essential to the formulation of any response. The report itself gives little information and lacks scientific reference. I approached the Library before noon on Thursday 24 April and asked it to provide me with some facts relating to the report. People in the Library set about the business of trying to get that information. After persistent telephone calls each day since then, speaking with the private secretary to the Minister with responsibility for this matter, I find that I am denied that information. This week we have heard justifiable criticism of the lack of information about the possible exposure to radiation of British subjects.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. The hon. Gentleman is unreasonably taking up private Members' time. His statement that the Library has not been supplied with information that he has tried to obtain from the Minister is not a matter for the Chair. The Chair is not responsible for Ministers' replies or non-replies.

Mr. Cook: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I simply wish to say that we complain about the denial of information, yet we are guilty of denying ourselves information. If you do not have the right to rule on this——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman cannot argue in this way when we have private Members' business before the House. I have ruled that this is not a matter for the Chair.

Clause 2

ACCESS TO MEETINGS AND DOCUMENTS OF JOINT COMMITTEES

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 3, line 5, after 'person', insert

', except by way of example for a general case without any identifying name or address included'.

I shall be brief, because I hope that the Bill will receive its Third Reading during the remaining 10 minutes.

The amendment would be useful in enabling a joint consultative committee to discuss in public a general point that might refer specifically to individual medical circumstances without disclosing the name and address of the individual. It would ease matters and marginally improve the Bill. It is a small point, but I hope that the Bill's promoter and the Minister will accept it.

Mr. Robin Squire (Hornchurch): The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) will understand if my speech is even shorter than his. I have not had much time to consider the full implications of the amendment, but, speaking only for myself, and subject to the views of my hon. Friend the Minister, the amendment seems to make sense. However, the hon. Gentleman will understand if I say that I would not wish to jeopardise the measure if there proved to be a handicap to absorbing his suggestion.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): I am advised that the amendment is unnecessary because the clause specifically refers to information about individuals and is clearly intended to preserve their privacy. I hope that the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) will withdraw the amendment.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): The Opposition would have welcomed the amendment, but, in view of the Minister's assurance that its aims are already contained in the Bill, I shall listen with interest to the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith).

Mr. Chris Smith: After that brief but helpful debate, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 3

ACCESS TO INFORMATION RELATING TO MEMBERS OF JOINT COMMITTEES ETC.

Mr. Ian Mikardo (Bow and Poplar): I beg to move amendment No. 3, in page 3, line 40, at end insert—

'(4) On any occasion on which the Secretary of State is made aware that a joint committee has failed to carry any of the provisions of subsections (1), (2) and (3) above he shall forthwith publicly issue a directive to that joint committee requiring it to carry out that provision or those provisions as the case may be.'.

Clause 3(1) states that a joint committee shall have an obligation to do one thing; subsection (2) states that it shall have an obligation to do something else; and subsection (3) states that a joint committee shall have an obligation to do yet another thing. However, the clause does not say what will happen if a joint committee does not do those things. There is no point in having a clause which places duties on bodies if there is no sanction against the non-fulfilment of those duties.

Of course, it is not easy to impose sanctions on a joint committee. Fines would simply remove money that it must use for other purposes. The only sanction that I could envisage was to say that if they do not do what they are supposed to do, the Secretary of State must tell them to do it. What is wrong with that?

Mr. Whitney: The amendment is not only defective but unnecessary. Clause 3 lays clear duties on joint committees and on constituent authorities. If a joint committee or constituent authority neglects to carry out those duties, any member of the public can draw attention to the omission and, in the last resort, although it is hardly likely to come to this, may have recourse to the courts. It is difficult to see what the amendment would achieve that is not already achieved by clause 3.

Mr. Mikardo: I cannot see it in the Bill, but if there is a remedy through the courts for someone who is aggrieved, of course I accept that the amendment is unnecessary. I shall engrave the Minister's words on tablets of stone to make sure that something happens as a result of them. To give me time to do that, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Order for Third Reading read.

2.24 pm

Mr. Squire: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

My comments will be brief. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Dr. Mawhinney) who initiated the process before he was elevated, so to speak, to a higher place on the Government Benches. I thank the community rights project and the Freedom of Information Campaign in general for their assistance. I thank hon. Members on both sides who have supported the Bill and have ensured that it passes to the statute book today. The Bill provides a small increase in access to information, and we should all be grateful for that.

Dr. Marek: I warmly congratulate the hon. Member for Peterborough (Dr. Mawhinney) who originally selected this subject for a Bill, having had the good fortune to be drawn high enough in the ballot. Fortunately for him, he joined the Government, so he could not proceed with the Bill. On behalf of the Opposition, I also congratulate the hon. Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) who has looked after the Bill, and has brought it through Committee and a rather shortened Report stage.

The Bill will add significantly to information available to the public. Any member of the public will be able to find out the members of the joint committees in his local area and what they are discussing. It is a small piece of legislation, which well deserves to be on the statute book. Once again, I congratulate the hon. Member for Hornchurch on bringing the Bill to Third Reading.

2.26 pm

Mr. Whitney: I join in the congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) and my hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Dr. Mawhinney), who is now the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and who first had the foresight to introduce the Bill. I acknowledge the help received from the hon. Members for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) and for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes).

The Government certainly support the concept of a greater degree of public awareness of the committees and their functions, and that is one of the essential achievements of the Bill. I hope that it will produce a greater awareness of information and a greater and better degree of all-round performance of the organisations. Therefore, the Government wholeheartedly support the Bill and renew their congratulations to our hon. Friends.

Mr. Mikardo: I, too, in just a moment or two, wish to express my appreciation of the Bill. It makes one more little dent — and we must keep denting away — in the obstinate carapace of secrecy in our public life. There are much wider, more serious areas of secrecy than that which is the subject of the Bill. I do not say that to denigrate the Bill or its sponsors. Indeed, those wider areas could not possibly be tackled in private Members' legislation. The hon. Member for Peterborough (Dr. Mawhinney) was wise to confine his Bill to an area which, while maintaining the important principle of openness in the conduct of public affairs, was sufficiently restricted to ensure that the Bill had a reasonable chance of reaching the statute book, as this one, happily, will do.

I hope that the Bill will set a precedent, and that all hon. Members who care about open government—one cannot care about democracy without caring about open government — will take a leaf out of the hon. Gentleman's book. If they draw a high place in the ballot next Session, I hope that they will find other similar areas of public life which are at present shrouded in secrecy and about which citizens cannot find out what is going on, and amend them. I am happy to give my full support to the Third Reading.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Obscene Publications (Protection of Children, etc.) (Amendment) Bill

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on amendment proposed [25 April] on consideration of the Bill, as amended (in the Standing Committee).

Clause 2

SPECIAL TEST OF OBSCENITY IN RELATION TO PERSONS UNDER THE AGE OF 18

Which amendment was: No. 12, in page 3, line 17, to leave out '18' and insert '16' instead thereof.—[Mr. Dubs.]

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

Mr. Ian Mikardo (Bow and Poplar): When I was rudely interrupted——

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (Surrey, South-West): Is my hon. Friend aware that my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) has already agreed to all the amendments?

Mr. Mikardo: It might have helped if the hon. Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) had been here to tell us that. But I could not resist giving way to the hon. Lady when she called me her hon. Friend——

It being half-past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Debate to be resumed what day? No day named.

Mr. Christopher Murphy (Welwyn Hatfield): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Before we reach the next item on the Order Paper, the Animal Welfare (Royal Commission) Bill, can you advise me whether its Second Reading can be moved, as the Queen's Consent has not yet been signified?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman can move the Second Reading, but we had better wait to see whether the Queen's Consent is signified.
